SIR: I just thought I'd write and tell you that Josephus Daniels, who used to be Secretary of the Navy, was here last night—here in Boulder, Colorado, I mean. He spoke at our Chautauqua night before last, and last night our Democratic League had a dinner for him at our Country Club—two miles out. We had a lovely dinner and lots of singing. Our song leader used to be a Y. M. C. A. secretary and he is as witty as can be. He always says: "Come on with the agony, everybody," and we all laugh.

We sang a song about Josephus, too. Our song leader wrote it and I am going to send it to Mr. Denby to be used in the singing classes in the navy. It goes like this:

What's the matter with Daniels?
He's all right.
What's the matter with Daniels?
He's all right.
A sterling Democrat through and through;
We vote him true and Navy Blue.
What's the matter with Daniels?
He's all right.

Then Mr. Daniels spoke to us. He spoke to us about the Democratic Party. I don't remember all of the speech—I wish I did—but it went like this: "The party of Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson . . . party of the thinking and the suffering . . . Republican party spoiled the peace . . . there is no peace . . . the party of special privilege and plutocracy . . . in 1924 . . . people will rise up in wrath . . . they demand we take . . .

forward looking . . . progress . . . crying for us . . . God helping . . . will not fail."

That's the way it goes. It was fine. The county sheriff was there and he led the applause and looked around and everybody clapped as loud as they could. Two glasses were broken. Then we all shook hands with Mr. Daniels. He's very democratic. I was in the army and I kind of thought he'd say something about the peace of Versailles, but I guess he forgot. But a lovely time was had by all of us. I think he will leave here tomorrow. I just thought you'd like this for your paper.

Boulder, Colorado, July 10 AN EX-PRIVATE

P. S. I forgot to say that some nice girls called the Sorority Singers are on the same program with Mr. Daniels. I asked the manager about the Swiss Bell Ringers and the Educated Horse, and he said that they would be here later and for me to be sure and come, and I sure will.

North Dakota

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some time since I dropped The Nation with deep regret, but your article on North Dakota reconciles me to its loss.

The "Industrial Program" of the Nonpartisan League, while no panacea, was the assemblage of well-tried and helpful economic and political measures that had proved their worth. The trouble was that they trod on too many financial toes and interfered with transmission of state funds into the pockets of the ramifications of "Big Business." Minnesota was only the "little boy" of the consolidated interests of Wall Street.

The economic prairie fire started in North Dakota had the possibilities of a conflagration, while the little sparklets from Maine to California had been wet-blanketed and ignored. The lying propaganda of "disloyalty" was worked for all it was worth and the leader of the movement was jailed in Minnesota.

Minnesota now comes back with an indorsement of the principles to the tune of 100,000 majority, while South Dakota invests in a state-owned coal mine in North Dakota and now challenges the Standard Oil Trust on prices of gasoline, even as Governor Frazier stopped at once the coal strike by taking over the mines and placing them in the hands of the miners to run and found the confidence not misplaced. The article on North Dakota in The Nation can go down in history by the side of The North Dakota Idea in the Atlantic Monthly a few years ago that placed the bustling little city of Fargo some little distance back from the Red River. The article will further discredit the capability of those who have since the beginnings of time assumed they are the only ones capable of ruling the earth.

St. Paul, Minnesota, August 14 JOEL HENRY GREENE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Among other remarkable items of information (?) given to the world by Robert George Paterson in The Nation for August 8 I find the following: "Later, in the effort to rid itself of Nonpartisan rule, it established another disconcerting precedent as the first State to recall its governor—the inoffensive Nonpartisan figurehead, Frazier—whom it subsequently elected to the Senate in place of the veteran conservative, McCumber." The idea of the Senator's character that is sought to be conveyed is absolutely false, as his enemies, open or otherwise, who have dealt with him on that basis have good cause to know. A fairer-minded or more just man never lived, yet he can be iron through and through when the occasion demands it. It is these qualities and his inherent honesty, his strength as a man, that have made the farmers and workers stick by him when all the combined power of the National Republican and National Democratic machines were thrown against him under orders of what we Southerners and Westerners call "Wall Street," which we are well aware does not inhabit New York City only.

The German Dye Patents

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is not surprising to me that your keen sense of justice should have led you to condemn the seizure of the German chemical patents by the Wilson Administration. As a dyestuffs chemist who has been helping to nurse our infant industry these last seven or eight years I sympathize thoroughly with your point of view as expressed in your editorial Are We Americans Thieves? Yet, for the sake of truth, you should correct certain erroneous statements which you made in that article; there are enough facts to support your case—why resort to misstatements? You say that the German dye patents have become quickly Americanized and point to the bulk of dyestuff business done in this country last year to prove your assertion. Permit me to inform you that very little of that business depended on the seizure of the German patents, which affect only the manufacture of newer products made in Germany only just before the war.

The greater part of the dyes manufactured in this country today have been known for a comparatively long time, and the "secret" of their manufacture has long since passed into our general chemical knowledge. In fact, one of the chief reasons for the inferiority of our dyestuffs—as manifest in one's daily experience with dyed goods—lies in the fact that, while in Germany they have been superseded by others of later origin, we have our hands full with perfecting the process of manufacture of the older ones. ## Pessimistic Journalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What am I to make of this? Here I have been told for years that The Nation had a monopoly on pessimism in American journalism (though I have never been able to see it myself); and this is what I find on the cover of Current History for August:

WOMAN'S NEW PLACE IN THE WORLD
OUR NATION IMPERILED BY THE WETS
DIVORCE THREATENING OUR FAMILY LIFE
WORLD CIVILIZATION ON THE DECLINE

Old Magazines in Demand

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Several weeks ago you printed my letter regarding magazines. May I now ask more of your space to thank you for a very interesting experience and to say a word to those who have written me in connection with my offer.

Before the copy of The Nation in question reached me I received a number of letters, and up to this time have received probably two or three hundred from all parts of the United States, and from Mexico, Germany, Ireland, and other countries. It was stimulating to note that the preference for solid and worth-while reading matter was practically unanimous. This, however, had the effect of exhausting my supply of that class of reading matter rather quickly, much to my regret. I have the letters before me and shall forward what I can as fast as I get them.

In the meantime, I have been wondering whether there are others who have reading matter they would care to dispose of along similar lines. If so, and they will let me know, I shall be glad to send them a list of those from whom I have received letters, stating preferences mentioned. Many of the requests were for reading matter to be sent to Germany, where, apparently, conditions are distressing and becoming worse.

The Press and Its Problems

The Newspaper and The Historian. By Lucy Maynard Salmon. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $7.50.

The Young Man and Journalism. By Chester S. Lord. Macmillan Company. $2.

The Community Newspaper. By Emerson P. Harris and Florrence Harris Hooke. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

The Country Newspaper. By Millard Van Marter Atwood. A. C. McClurg and Company. $1.

INTEREST in the daily press does not decrease commensurably with the public loss of faith in the daily because of its rapid decadence under the stress of modern competition and its debasement by officialdom during the World War. On the contrary, there is a rising flood of books about what those who are part of it believe to be the most fascinating and, in its possibilities, the noblest of professions. This is as it should be. We need not only prescriptions for this grievously ill patient, but analyses of the symptoms and studies of the sufferer's pre-clinical history. The quicker we can concentrate public attention upon press evils the sooner may we expect to find the way out. Hence the appearance of new books dealing with various phases of the problem of the press is welcome.

Particularly is this true of Professor Salmon's remarkable book with its somewhat misleading title, "The Newspaper and The Historian." That designation will, it is to be feared, frighten off not only lay readers, but members of the profession itself, suggesting as it does a dry-as-dust philosophical discourse. On the contrary, Professor Salmon has brought together an amazing mass of information, obviously the result of years of research, which, despite the fact that the press has been handled from its esoteric side, makes of the volume an encyclopedia indispensable to every student of the subject. Here are chapters on the use of the periodical as a historical source, but also others on the development of the newspaper, the daily journal as a personality, the press in its relation to other social activities, the news collecting and news distributing organizations, the special correspondent, the war correspondent, the general correspondent, the interview, the editor and the editorial, etc., etc. Under these and other heads Professor Salmon's industry has compiled facts, opinions, judgments, and experiences of immense value, and this is to be followed by a companion volume "The Newspaper and Authority"—a subject never so tempting as today.

Where so much matter is thrown together as the result of laborious research there are inevitably certain dangers to be overcome in the presentation thereof, and these Professor Salmon has not altogether escaped. One regrets the continual subordination of the author's own views; one loses at times a realization of the author's purpose because of the mass of material. Indeed, one wonders occasionally whether the author has at all times been clear as to the exact field that she meant to cover, and there is also a certain lack of continuity, a jumping from the present to the past and back again, which is somewhat disconcerting, but that diminishes but little the value of the whole. Nor does it tarnish the admirably judicial tone of the work.

It is noteworthy that this detached observer takes a much more favorable view of the press as an historical source than would some of us in the profession. Her conclusions are summarized thus:

> With all its limitations, its inaccuracies, its unworthy representatives, its lack of proportion, its many temptations—not always resisted—to throw prismatic colors inside of a white light of truth on its accounts of the day, the periodical press still remains the most important single source the historian has at his command for the reconstruction of the life of the past three centuries.

This makes us regret that Professor Salmon has not given us as clear-cut a contrast of the value to the historian of the press of 1923 with that of 1858. To our mind there is little comparison, so superior was the reporting of the earlier journalists to that of today, so free from news coloring and partisan bias. Finally, it is but just to point out that Professor Salmon's studies of the news-gathering agencies is by no means complete or exhaustive. That was not her purpose, since her object has been to illustrate her thesis as to the value of the press to the historian. None the less, as has been stated, she has created a reference book of permanent value replete with facts and opinions.

Chester S. Lord's book, "The Young Man in Journalism," comes from one of the best beloved of New York's newspaper men, who was for decades the brilliant managing editor of the Sun of Charles A. Dana. As such he profoundly influenced the lives of many young men who came under his control and began their newspaper careers under his guidance. In those days the Sun was the best school for reporters in the country; no school of journalism had more to offer in the technique of journalism, though the ethical tone of the office under Mr. Dana's leadership was often far from what it should have been. Out of his vast experience, Mr. Lord has written a useful little book, full of interesting anecdotes and intended to be a vade mecum for the would-be reporter and also for whoever may be interested in the mechanics of journalism. Beyond that Mr. Lord touches upon the opportunity of the village newspaper, the daily newspaper in the small city, the rewards of journalism, and similar topics.

One chapter adds no luster to the book or to the profession. In speaking of the influence of newspapers he declares that "newspaper influence had perhaps its finest recognition in the various propaganda of the war. All governments used the press lavishly with intent to guide, to conceal, to accomplish. They 'felt the pulse of the people' constantly and subtly. Proposed policies were tested. Often they were suggested to divert attack from the real policy or to take the sting from it." Mr. Lord either fails to appreciate what this degradation meant to the press of the world, or he glories in its shame. That the free press of the world should have been so prostituted ought to cause every newspaper man to hang his head, for never in the history of journalism has it been so debased. At no other period has it printed such a mass of lies as during and since the war, with the result that it has lost prestige and standing with the masses, who no longer have any faith whatever in the statements of the conventional daily.

Let us contrast two recent statements with those of Mr. Lord. Here is David Lawrence, the widely-read Washington correspondent who has just returned from Europe, declaring of the foreign papers that "in all countries they have ceased to influence public opinion. The power which they formerly possessed has gone, as a result of having been influenced by government pressure, by industrial and financial interests, or by proprietors who are themselves part and parcel of those interests."

And here is C. E. Montague, the brilliant English writer who served so long at the front, giving a whole chapter in his book "Disenchantment" to the utter loss of faith in the press of the millions of men in the British Army:

> They felt they had found the press out. The most bloody defeat in the history of Britain, a very world's wonder of valour frustrated by reckless misuse, of regimental glory and staff shame, might occur on the Ancre on July 1, 1916, and our press come out bland and copious and graphic, with nothing to show that we had not quite a good day—a victory really. Men who had lived through the massacre read the stuff open-mouthed. Anything, then, could figure as anything else in the press—as its own opposite even. Black was only an aspect of white. With a grin at the way he must have been taken in up to now, the fighting soldier gave the press up. So it comes that each of several million ex-soldiers now reads every solemn appeal of a government, each beautiful speech of a premier, or earnest assurance of a body of employers with that maxim on guard in his mind: "You can't believe a word you read."

As one lays down this interesting book with complete disappointment at the lack of any reference to ethical responsibilities and the moral duties of the press, so "The Community Newspaper," by Emerson P. Harris and his daughter, leaves one with a feeling that it has been constructed to aid, inform, and instruct newspaper Babbitts. It is merely a guide book for the country or small city publisher, as to how he can work the community successfully for more advertising and play upon the community spirit for all that there is in it, for himself and his paper. There are several dissertations, for instance, as to how to develop church advertising. The local editor is told that he must stand ready "to further the interest of local government, churches, schools, hospitals, libraries, art museums, lodges, clubs, and all sorts of organizations and activities which make for the fullest life of the town." We are told also what the attitude of the paper should be towards local industries and employers, and that nothing is so necessary as "a constant stream of trustworthy intelligence." But nowhere do we find any intimation that the press might and should be a reforming agency; that it has an ethical duty to the community; that its chief function is to lead, and to lead toward the new and progressive and the better. A newspaper may print reams of trustworthy news about the chamber of commerce and the First Presbyterian Church and the Elks club, and yet have almost no justification for existence. Any conception of a newspaper which makes of it merely a local organ for the booming of local interest is neither stimulating nor elevating.

More attractive is Professor Atwood's little volume on "The Country Newspaper." This is an attempt to assay the value of the country newspaper, and it has many valuable suggestions and facts, but very little criticism—nothing to inform the student, for instance, how largely the rural press has depended upon government pap, upon crooked party favors, and election advertising, which in New York State has done more to degrade the rural press than any other agency. Professor Atwood brings out the fact that the number of real country weeklies in New York dropped 11.2 per cent between 1905 and 1920. From 1915 to 1920 the number of villages having two weeklies was reduced by 8 per cent and the number with three weeklies by 57 per cent. But, on the whole, the note is an encouraging one, though Professor Atwood finds that young men are not being attracted to the country weekly field. Still he feels that if editor and community would work together the future of the local paper would be bright. The rural editor must, however, realize that the old type of paper is outworn, that there must be greater service to the community in the best sense and a much wider range of interest, and far greater intelligence displayed in the editing. The rural public is eager for good papers and there are plenty of examples where they have responded to an intellectual stimulus. But there must be real leadership and not merely "his master's voice," the editor's master being far too often the dispenser of political office or of printing patronage. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Dance of Life

The Nuptial Flight. By Edgar Lee Masters. Boni and Liveright. $2.

THIS book is Mr. Masters's most considerable performance since the "Spoon River Anthology" and places him, in that shabby but useful phrase, in the front rank of American novelists. It is a work as deep, as rich, as concrete as that Illinois soil which Mr. Masters's pioneers went forth to till; it is informed throughout by a philosophical vision wrought out by experience rather than by thought; it is not felicitously written in detail—style, in the narrower sense, does not mark our fiction—but the narrative has a rude, quiet vigor, a patriarchal breadth and solidity that bring home both the tale and its inherent moral to heart and mind.

Mr. Masters tells the story of three generations. Through these he presents a continuous picture of the varying phases of American civilization. But that is by the way. He does not seek to explain the fates of his characters by their historical or sociological background. He is satisfied, where all explanations are doubtful, with the fact of simultaneousness. His chief business is with the personal problems of his people and with a vision which comes to him from the recurrence of these problems and struggles in each generation.

What his vision sees is love as an expression of the total human personality, no isolated instinct amid others that can flourish while it is unsatisfied or warped. When man has satisfied hunger and sheltered his body from the winds, love remains—love that is not only procreation but creation, that is the source of contentment, beauty, aspiration, art. But love does not, unhappily, like the satisfaction of hunger, come to all. A universal need, it is as rare in its full and harmonious fruition as beauty or genius. All are inevitably called to its service, pitifully few are chosen. That and that alone is the pervasive tragedy of human life. Unjust law and intolerant custom sharpen this tragedy and vex souls that might recover and retrieve. But the tragic fact itself is inherent and unalterable.

Such is the inner meaning and trend of Mr. Masters's story. But he is very chary of comment and explanation. He lets his characters and their relations to each other unfold both the tale and its meaning. He centers attention upon three couples of three generations—William and Nancy Houghton, Walter Scott Houghton and Fanny, Alfred Houghton and Ida. Very touching and beautiful is his picture of the first couple. Perhaps it was the pioneering life lived against the sky that made for so much sanity and harmony despite its material hardships. The disharmonies inseparable from a more complex civilization enter with the children of the pioneers. Walter Scott is a thoroughly problematic nature and the terrible Fanny Prentice escapes from the psychical cruelties of a Princeton parsonage to wreak upon Walter and herself the fury of her dissatisfactions, her stifled impulses, her wounded sensibilities in a blind and relentless dance of death. She is a superb portrait, felt by Mr. Masters beyond the point of analysis, apprehended and created with a knowledge of her that has become instinct. She wrings from him one of his rare moments of high verbal expressiveness in that description of her as "locked and glazed in great intensities, hatreds, passions of her own, in vast egoisms which prevented her knowing another soul."

In the third generation, no uncommon thing, an artist is born to the tribe. But Alfred the violinist and idealist derives his early experiences from Whitehall, Illinois. Repelled by the furtive animalisms and outer austerities that he sees he loses himself in a false and misinterpreted vision and lets the terrible Ida—old enough to be his mother—marry him. He is "betrayed by what is false within." Ida, whom Mr. Masters hates a little too bitterly, strips Alfred of life, means, freedom, health. Then she takes her stand on morality and legality, sets church, tribe, and police on his track, murders his love-life and almost himself. There is a concentrated power in Mr. Masters's treatment of this episode, a towering indignation thoroughly controlled that are truly memorable.

Other figures people the story. There is the beautiful and pathetic Elaine, seeking and wandering after love and beauty, the wise Evangeline, the amiable and womanly Sybil, Max Juul, the parasite and bounder, not quite so credible as the others, and the moral scavenger Scull. All these characters, major and minor, interact upon each other in a coherent and intelligible world which is, as every world created by art should be, an interpretative representation that clarifies and explains the welter of things seen by the common eye and thus liberates us from the obscurities and confusions of our mortal lot. Mr. Masters is a fine poet. But I, for one, hope that he will hereafter make the writing of novels his chief occupation. L. L.

Faust Again

The Pilgrimage of Festus. By Conrad Aiken. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

IN this most ambitious of all Mr. Aiken's poems music is still the medium through which the poet speaks and sees. Music, here as before, is more than an inspiration for his rhythm; it is the creator of his diction, the very source of his thought. Mr. Aiken has rendered "Faust" in terms of abstract harmony. For his Festus is a kind of Faust. "His pilgrimage is not real: it is imaginary. It is a cerebral adventure, of which the motive is a desire for knowledge." The search goes on through the familiar avenues of temporal power, philosophy, religion, self, and beauty, only to reach the conclusion that search is futile though good. So much for the theme. What sort of poem has Mr. Aiken made of it?

Merely as music it is superb. In his time Mr. Aiken has manipulated as many charming rhythms as any of his contemporaries, and he is at his best here. The harmonies that sweep from page to page are in themselves always fascinating, irrelevant though some of them may be to the idea in hand. Mr. Aiken's unit is an irregular paragraph, and upon this he has lavished his finest resources of cadence and rhyme.

Festus in starlight watched how the three great rivers,
Bearing perpetual stars on their breasts, roared down
To gorges and chasms and desolate plains
And jungles of death, and labyrinthine cities
Swept to pale harmonies by suns and rains;
And thought of the thousands of nights and days like music
Woven by him, and the roses of love and death
Fallen in petals in the darkness of his heart;
And he sent among them a breath
And set them blowing and trembling again, on graves,
On the stones of streets, by door and path and wall,
Whirled in the air from the boughs of swinging trees
To stream like stars on the wind and slowly fall
For the hands of children, the hair of women, the hearts of lovers,
The coffins waiting beneath the swinging trees,
And the myriad eyes that in his veins went to and fro
Seeking a dream forever and finding no ease.

If words meant nothing at all, Mr. Aiken would still seem to have said a good deal.

But words mean much, and poetry deals first and last with words. Mr. Aiken, perhaps because he is primarily a musician, often fails to make his words mean enough. They serve an alien master well, but they should serve no master. Occasionally a long passage is little more than a snowfall of lovely phrases that descend most beautifully yet never cover the ground. And Mr. Aiken is equally reckless, or equally vague, when it comes to images. One of the marks of a poet is that he examines his facts (or his images) very directly, and quite for their own sakes. Mr. Aiken flings about his rose leaves and his colored stars as if they were painted properties that he felt could take on significance only if swiftly whirled and breathed through with music.

As philosophy also the poem loses whenever it begins to be pure melody. There are too many ellipses, too many points unfixed—as if the poet had satisfied himself in paths beyond our following, had completed his idea in a musical sense and left mere readers of words to find their way by the prose "Argument" at the beginning of the book. That "Argument" is too necessary; the poem is not clear. Nor is it convincing. We do not feel that this Faust gives up anything, goes anywhere, or learns much. To be sure, all that we are asked to do is dream a dream. Festus by design is a minor Faust. Yet there is no earth under us to fall on when the dream is over.

At the same time with all this, Mr. Aiken has stated some things perfectly. Certain lines near the end of his poem—and by no coincidence they are the least musical of all, though they are not the least poetical—contain a subtle and accurate expression of disillusion. The Alter Ego of Festus argues:

And why should we trouble ourselves with a god whom we know not—
A god whom, god willing, we never shall know?
The world is the mirror of god; and we are but fragments.
And how shall a mirror look into its own depths, Festus?
And say that it did—what truly, save mirror, would show? . . .
Ah, Festus, think how foolish would be that mirror
Which, gazing into itself—if it could do so—
And seeing a cloud, and blue sky, imaged there,
Cried out: "Behold how nobler than other mirrors
Am I, who have here conceived a sky, a cloud,
And small birds flying in a blue depth of air!" . . .
Ah miserable destiny, Festus, miserable destiny,
To be, in the blue universe of the sea-pool,
A crab! . . . a crab for the most part silent,
That, softly sidling from coign of rock to coign,
Delicately touching, under the limpid water,
The hard edges of rocks with the tips of his claws,
Yet shakes the pool, or pierces with his back
The azure . . . and routs the star.
Or sadder still
To be a pool inhabited by a crab;
And nightly to lose the image of one's desire
In one's own agitation, like the sea.

It is of such sturdy and lasting mortar that the classics have been made.

Shakespeare

A Life of William Shakespeare. By Joseph Quincy Adams. Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50.

THE progress of Shakespearean research is neither constant nor uniform along its various lines. The emendation of the text began in the eighteenth century and went on for a century and a half, but for the last generation there has been little but the gleaning of a few stray ears. Profitable labor upon the sources and chronology of the plays has all but ceased for about the same length of time. Of critical interpreters of first-rate importance in the twentieth century it is hard to name any besides Bradley. On the other hand, the last twenty-five years have thrown much light upon the theaters, theatrical companies, and stage practices of the times of Elizabeth and James, Shakespeare's achievement has been made much clearer through knowledge of his relation to his contemporaries and the dramatic fashions of his day, exhaustive search in the archives has added some new facts to his biography, and much progress has been made in the understanding of the conditions affecting the publication of his plays. It is such advances as these that justify the attempt to rewrite the biography which has been made by Professor J. Q. Adams in his new "Life."

The volume contains a well-digested and well-arranged compendium of what is known about Shakespeare from his ancestry to the publication of the first folio, and the more personal facts are presented against an adequate background of contemporary activities and personalities. With a precision as commendable as it is rare the author has indicated what is ascertained fact in the life of the dramatist, what is plausible inference, what is legend, and what is mere conjecture. The confusion of these different factors has been for long the main defect of Shakespearean biography, even when written by distinguished scholars. It is a great satisfaction that, in a book which ought to be for a considerable time the standard life, this confusion is avoided. The only instances of a failure in this direction are due rather to a slight occasional yielding to sentiment than to the desire of the author to dogmatize. For example: "'Mary Arden! the name breathes of poetry!' exclaims Knight. May we not safely add that his son's poetry breathes of her? For surely it was at his mother's knee that he acquired his conception of those gentle and noble elements of woman's character which he so effectively embodied in his plays." Now for all we know Mary Arden may have been a shrew and a termagant—so why ask rhetorical questions about her influence on her son's creations? But in the strictly biographical chapters this kind of thing is rare; it is rather in dealing with the more recent results of Pollard, Greg, and J. Dover Wilson on the printing and publishing of the Quartos that he is tempted to present their conclusions with somewhat more assurance than the state of the question warrants.

The most striking feature of the work, however, is that, without the use of surmise and conjecture, the orderly presentation of what we now know of Shakespeare and his environment begins to convey the impression of a living person. The compilations and researches of Halliwell-Phillips and Sir Sidney Lee produced no visualization of a real man—perhaps did not aim to do so; the many imaginative attempts, of which that of Brandes is the most brilliant, mixed fact and fiction so unscrupulously that the result was at best a novelist's triumph, not a scholar's. Professor Adams, I believe, has come nearest to a legitimate and authentic portrait. He makes ample acknowledgment to his colleagues for what they have done to provide him with material, but the effectiveness of the book is due to his own judgment and skill.

As later editions are likely to be called for, it may not be presumptuous to suggest that there be added a fuller critical account of the likenesses of Shakespeare.

American Government

Introduction to American Government. By Frederic A. Ogg and P. Orman Ray. The Century Company. $3.75.

State Government. By Walter F. Dodd. The Century Company. $3.75.

THESE two volumes in the Century Political Science Series are outstanding contributions to the literature of government. The larger, dealing with all aspects of American government, national, State, and local, runs to over 800 pages, Professor Dodd's book to nearly 600 pages. In books which perforce deal with a mass of detailed fact, minute distinctions, and contemporary changes, there is an unusual and gratifying amount of able, thoughtful criticism of the processes—or phenomena—of national and local government.

Designed primarily as texts for class study, with copious footnote references and selected bibliographies, there is a readableness about both books which will make them the more welcome to the non-professional student of our political institutions.

Professors Ogg and Ray have prefaced their volume with seven chapters on The Nature and Problems of Government. They consider the nature and origins of the state, the basis and kinds of government, the position of the individual, and other problems of the philosophy rather than the mechanics of government. The absence of such material has long been conspicuous in our standard texts, an absence which has been increasingly felt as the basis of the teaching of politics has broadened. To the layman, so concise a guide to political theory and its application will be a real boon.

For the rest, the book contains information as to governmental changes of within a year and brings the picture of our political structure down to date. Particularly interesting are the chapters on the Cabinet and the Civil Service, in which the authors develop the chief problems in personnel administration and depict the work of the departments in Washington. The chapter on the reform of county government is an excellent bit of exploration in that "dark continent" of our politics.

Professor Dodd's analysis of State Government is the most significant since Holcombe's pioneer volume, published seven years ago. He covers the whole field of State government, and reaches out into the byways of contemporary problems in political structure and State relations to units of local government, as well as the more immediate questions of the reform of administrative machinery, the organization of State legislatures, and the effect of the judicial process upon legislation and administration.

It would be hard to find two books better constructed to serve as guides to the practice of our government. And there is ample ammunition for the armory of reform tucked away in the observations of these quite practical "theorists."

Orphans

Children Astray. By Saul Drucker and Maurice Beck Hexter. Introduction by Richard Cabot. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

THIS delightful volume fulfils to an unusual degree the aims set forth by its authors in the preface. These aims are: "The gradual creation of a teaching literature for social work," and "to demonstrate the use of orphanages for special cases rather than utilizing such institutions only for the easy and 'normal' problem of child dependency."

In a field occupied for a generation by controversy, propaganda, and dogma, this volume is, indeed, a promising beginning of "a teaching literature." Every aid to mind and eye is supplied by the excellent editing. This includes, after the choice and grouping of the twenty-four children presented, an abundance of significant scheduled facts illustrating the origin, history, setting, and also the previous sorrowful experience which led to the entrance of each boy and girl. Following each of these preliminary condensations comes a brilliant narrative of the treatment intended to build up body, mind, and character, to give to each newcomer everything that ingenuity can contrive of the social heritage into which the little soul had not yet entered.

The value of such a volume obviously depends primarily upon the candor of the writers and the literary quality of the narrative. Both are here in a degree new to the experience of this reviewer.

This book offers a challenge. It compels the reader to ask "What scale is requisite for the most valuable achievement possible for orphanages? Especially for those which intrepidly essay this inversion of the usual proceeding?"

If the rule is to be placing out of normal children and, if, during their sojourn within the orphanage, there are introduced, as a matter of principle, difficult boys and girls to be made fit for placing out (some who have failed in a series of homes after failing in their own), how large must the orphanage be?

Clearly it must enlist the funds necessary for retaining permanently a superintendent and staff of the quality revealed by this narrative. There must also be at all times a body of sound children fairly responsive to wise guidance.

During the six years covered by this work, one hundred and twenty-five difficult children were received. The average total number of all children is not stated. It was, however, large enough to afford steady pressure of wholesome public opinion among the contemporaries of each "problem," down to the little six-year-old girls who appeared together in the superintendent's office, angry and eager because they had failed in their attempt to eject from their ring game a new boy who feared other boys and insisted upon joining in the little girls' play.

The answer to the query as to scale is doubtless the general one that no community can afford less than the wisest and most skilful care of all its orphans; and that communities can, by cooperation, muster whatever may prove needful, once the principle is recognized that institutional care and placing out are permanently necessary in our defective civilization.

Certainly no one can be counted a competent critic of either method, henceforth, who is unacquainted with this masterly work.

Books in Brief

French Literature During the Last Half-Century. By J. W. Cunliffe and Pierre de Bacourt. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This textbook approaches the great figures of modern French literature with a good deal of tolerance even though it is occasionally lacking in understanding. The biographies are comprehensive, if primary, and the criticism intelligent, if stodgy. The authors lean unmistakably to the safe and sane and academic. Their sympathies lie with such writers as Daudet, Maurice Barrès, and Eugène Brieux rather than with Zola, Maupassant, Anatole France, and Romain Rolland. There are solid, informative chapters on the Symbolist Movement and on contemporary work.

Politics and Progress. By Ramsay Muir. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

Does British Liberalism represent a distinctive attitude, differing equally from that of Conservatism and from that of the Labor Party, or is it merely a "middle party" of "moderate men" with no characteristic standpoint of its own? Mr. Muir, who recently resigned the Professorship of Modern History at Manchester University to take up active political work, holds to the former alternative, and in this clear-sighted and well-written handbook he sets forth his own creed. The doubtful question is how far the rank and file of the party would be willing to indorse this unofficial program, especially in its proposals for social reform.

A Friend at Court. By Leon Stern and Elizabeth Stern. The Macmillan Company. $2.

On the theory that "probation is a flowering of justice," doubtless it may be argued that the probation courts are a hothouse of fiction. At any rate, the short and simple annals of the delinquent here provide the basis for a rather solid novel about social injustice and what is being done about it. A book for those who do not care for their sociology straight.

Outburst

THE wisest dramatic reviewers shun Broadway until September. To do so is to approach the season in a less corrupted and a serener state of mind. The early summer is better than the late. The "Follies" have their own kind of beauty, so has the annual show at the Winter Garden, so had, quite notably this year, the "Vanities" at the Earl Carrol Theater. These entertainments, to be sure, are only endless patterns woven of the same strands—lovely fabrics and lovely bodies. But to such a being as man with his inevitable appetences there is about these patterns something native, permanent, and so, in the truest sense, respectable.

August brings plays. In these plays you come upon a far meaner kind of artifice. The chandeliers of girls in the "Vanities" appeal, in however sophisticated a way, to an instinct deep and healthy in itself. The shoddy plays assume the prejudices, tastes, knowingness and psychical greed of an essential corruptness of the mind. The beautiful bodies in the "Follies" and the "Vanities" leave the audiences grave. At "The Mad Honeymoon" (The Playhouse), at "Little Miss Bluebeard" (Lyceum Theater), they snicker. Here there are bedrooms and doors and endless innuendos. The mental age of these audiences is evidently not above sixteen. Here is permanent adolescence in its ungainliest stage. In catering too long to this taste, by the way, Mr. Avery Hopwood has quite lost the suavity and glitter that once marked his farces. "Little Miss Bluebeard" is hard, mechanical, and dull.

The one point of interest of the season so far is a discovery made by Mr. Booth Tarkington. It is the discovery that ideas count in the theater. Mr. Tarkington is still a little frightened at his discovery; he still plays hide and seek with it. He is so in dread of not being commonplace and "folksy" that he will not let himself go. But one observes a distinct gain in clearness and courage that must have been made by him between the composition of "Tweedles" (Frazee Theater), and "Magnolia" (Liberty Theater). In "Tweedles," which was written in collaboration with Mr. Harry Leon Wilson, the idea is a rather feeble one and the execution is both anemic and meretricious. But the idea is there. Snobs are snobs, Mr. Tarkington declares, on whatever social plane you find them, and family pride is both ethically and even biologically nine-tenths pure self-deception. The little play is charmingly acted, especially by Ruth Gordon and Gregory Kelly. But it is so thin and tentative that it threatens momently to go to pieces. "Magnolia," which Mr. Tarkington wrote alone, has far more courage, pertinence, and power. I am tempted—this is not high praise—to call it Mr. Tarkington's soundest dramatic venture. He chooses as his scene the bank of the Mississippi in the early forties—the land of "honor," duels, feuds, profound illiteracy, and elaborate social forms. In this final corruption of the chivalric tradition he shows, with good sense, good humor, some conviction, and some power, the bully and the brute as lord. A really brave and gentle soul is driven to assume the aspect of brute and bully in self-defense. But in the interesting and even at moments subtle last act one is convinced that Tom Rumford has never really changed within and that his impulse toward a saner and a freer life is genuine and practical.

Mr. Martin Flavin's "Children of the Moon" (Comedy Theater), alone of the plays of the early season has a literary touch. The late Louis Calvert directed the play together with Mr. Iden Payne and Miss Florence Johns. Miss Beatrice Terry and Mr. Whitford Kane give performances that bring out beautifully the mood and atmosphere which Mr. Flavin wanted to project. He had, unfortunately, nothing but that mood and atmosphere. I am not convinced by these moonstruck people; I am forced to disbelieve on grounds of reason and experience. Is it a crude criticism to say that, as a matter of fact, such things don't happen and tested experience knows nothing of such lunar influences? Then I must be content to be crude.

The rest, alas, is not silence but rather wretched noise. "In Love with Love" (Ritz Theater), is a slight and silly comedy, the plot of which has totally escaped me in the few days since I saw it. The staging by Robert Milton is good; Miss Lynne Fontanne had pleasant moments reminiscent of her "Dulcy." "The Good Old Days," by Aaron Hoffman (Broadhurst Theater), is an anti-Prohibition play very badly and crudely done on its own sentimental melodramatic plane. Once Mr. Hofman did good jobs of this sort. "The Good Old Days" is not even a good job. "The Woman on the Jury" (Eltinge Theater), and Mary Roberts Rinehart's "The Breaking Point" (Klaw Theater), are both melodramas of competent manufacture, raw force, and great astuteness in the use of the lower emotional appeal. "Little Jessie James" (Longacre Theater), is an agreeable little musical comedy with one good melody, eight uncommonly vivacious chorus girls, and a so-called "Paul Whiteman Band" to whose uncanny skill and aesthetic dreadfulness only a treatise could do justice. In "Artists and Models" (Shubert Theater), the public unswathing of the human body goes one step further.

The New Constitution of Rumania

THE NATION presents herewith what is probably the first publication in English of the Rumanian constitution of March 28, 1923. This latest of the new constitutions of Europe shows some reaction from the radicalism of most of the earlier post-war documents. Of course, the monarchical form is retained. The second chamber, which is by no means a "secondary" chamber, is generously diluted against democracy by members indirectly elected and by ex-officio life members—to the great advantage of the Liberal Party over against the agrarians and the people of the new provinces of Transylvania and Bessarabia. Rumanian is made the official language of the state, although the Transylvanian pact of 1918, which was formally accepted by the king at the time of union, declared that "each people shall be taught and administered and tried in its own language." "Liberty of conscience is absolute," but the Orthodox Rumanian Church is the "dominant" state church, while the Greek Catholic is a second church "taking precedence" over other religions. Self-determination for provinces of widely varying conditions and customs is not sought by the avenue of federalism. Proportional representation, now well understood in Europe and so important to racial minorities, is abolished in favor of something vaguely referred to as "representation of minorities." The clauses providing for the nationalization of minerals and other subsoil resources are no doubt as far-reaching as the provisions for nationalization in other constitutions, except the Russian.

This constitution, framed and adopted by a turbulent assembly (from which it was found necessary from day to day to exclude the members of the Opposition in groups of from eight to ten), is primarily the work of Bratiana and his Cabinet. The following text was translated under the direction of Professor H. L. McBain and Professor Lindsay Rogers of Columbia University.

Title I. The Territory of Rumania

Article 1. The Kingdom of Rumania is a single and indivisible state.

Art. 2. The territory of Rumania is inalienable. The frontiers of the state may be changed or rectified only by virtue of a law.

Art. 3. The territory of Rumania may not be colonized by populations of a foreign race.

Art. 4. The territory of Rumania for administrative purposes is divided into districts, and the districts into communes. Their number, extent, and territorial subdivisions shall be determined in accordance with the forms prescribed by the laws for administrative organization.

Title II. The Rights of Rumanians

Art. 5. Rumanians, irrespective of ethnic origin, language, or religion, shall enjoy freedom of conscience, of instruction, of the press, of assembly, of association, as well as all liberties and rights provided for by law.

Art. 6. The present constitution and other laws relative to political rights shall determine what are, without the Rumanian qualification, the conditions necessary for the exercise of these rights. The conditions under which women may exercise political rights shall be laid down in special laws, enacted by a two-thirds majority. The civil rights of women shall be established on the basis of the complete equality of the sexes.

Art. 7. Differences of religious belief and confession, of ethnic origin, and of language shall not constitute, in Rumania, a bar to the acquisition and exercise of civil and political rights. Only by naturalization may the alien be placed upon equality with the Rumanian in the enjoyment of political rights. Naturalization shall be granted individually by the Council of Ministers upon a certification by a Commission composed of the Premier-President and the Presidents of the Court of Appeals of the capital of the country that the applicant has fulfilled the legal requirements. The requirements and the procedure by which aliens may obtain naturalization shall be prescribed by a special law. Naturalization shall not have retroactive effect. The wife and minor children may avail themselves, under conditions to be prescribed by law, of the naturalization of the husband or father.

Art. 8. No distinction on account of birth or social class shall be permitted in the state. All Rumanians, without distinction on account of ethnic origin, language, or religion are equal before the law and are under an obligation to contribute without discrimination to the imposts and public charges. They alone are eligible for public services and dignities, both civil and military. Regulations for the public functionaries shall be laid down in special laws. Aliens may be eligible for public services only in exceptional cases, specially determined by law.

Art. 9. All aliens who are within the territory of Rumania shall enjoy the protection granted by law to persons and property in general.

Art. 10. All special franchises, of whatever nature, and all class exemptions and monopolies, are forever prohibited in the Rumanian state. Titles of nobility are and shall continue to be unrecognized by the Rumanian state. Foreign decorations shall not be worn by Rumanians except with the authorization of the king.

Art. 11. Individual liberty is guaranteed. No one may be prosecuted or subjected to search except in the cases and according to the forms prescribed by law. No one may be detained or arrested except by virtue of a legal warrant, showing probable cause, which must be shown at the moment of the arrest or not later than twenty-four hours following the detention or arrest. In case of obvious guilt, the detention or arrest may take place immediately, but the warrant shall be issued within twenty-four hours and shall be shown in accordance with the preceding clause.

Art. 12. No one may be withdrawn, against his will, from the judges provided for him by law.

Art. 13. The domicile is inviolable. No domicilary visit may be made except by the competent authorities, in cases specially provided for, and in accordance with the forms prescribed by law.

Art. 14. No punishment may be fixed or imposed except by virtue of a law.

Art. 15. No law may impose the penalty of confiscation of property.

Art. 16. The death penalty may not be reestablished except in cases provided for by the military penal code in time of war.

Art. 17. Property of whatever nature, as well as debts of the state, are guaranteed. For public uses the public authority, by virtue of a law, shall have the right to use the subsoil of all kinds of real property, subject to the obligation of paying indemnity for damage caused to the surface, or to existing buildings or works. In the absence of friendly agreement, the amount of indemnity shall be fixed by the courts. No one may be dispossessed of his property except for public uses and upon condition of being paid just compensation previously determined by the courts. What constitutes a public use and the procedure and method of expropriation shall be determined by a special law. Apart from the instances of expropriation for the establishment or maintenance of public highways, the public health, national defense and works of military interest, public instruction, and of expropriation for the direct general interests of the state and the public administrations, the other cases of public use shall be determined by laws enacted by a two-thirds majority. Existing laws relating to the laying out and widening of the streets in communes as well as to the banks of waterways which cross or flow alongside them shall remain in effect throughout the entire extent of the kingdom.

ART. 18. Only natural born or naturalized Rumanians may acquire any kind of title to or own rural real property in Rumania. Aliens shall have the right only to lease such property.

ART. 19. Mineral deposits as well as all other valuable resources of the subsoil are the property of the state. Masses of common rock, quarries of construction materials, and deposits of peat are excepted, without prejudice to rights acquired by the state under previous laws. A special mining law shall determine the general rules and conditions for the valuation of these properties, shall fix the royalty due the surface proprietor, and shall determine at the same time the conditions under which and the extent to which he shall participate in the exploitation of these resources. Account shall be taken of acquired rights in so far as they correspond to a valuation of the subsoil and according to the distinctions to be made by a special law. Concessions for the operation of mines, instituted or granted in accordance with laws now in force, shall be respected during the period for which they were allowed, and existing mining operations carried on by proprietors shall be respected only for the time during which they actually operate the mines. Concessions in perpetuity shall not be allowed. All concessions and operations provided for in the preceding clause must nevertheless conform to the rules to be established by the law, which will fix a maximum period for concessions and operations not to exceed fifty years from the date of the promulgation of this constitution.

ART. 20. Public highways, the air, and rivers navigable for boats or rafts are parts of the public domain. Waters which can produce motive power and those which can be used in the public interest are public property. Rights already acquired shall be respected or shall be extinguished by expropriation for public use, upon the payment of just and previously determined compensation. Special laws shall determine the extent to which the enjoyment of all the above rights may be permitted to the proprietors, the conditions of operation, as well as the compensation to be paid for use of the surface and for existing installations.

ART. 21. All agents of production shall enjoy equal protection. The state may intervene, by law, in the relations between these agents in order to prevent social or economic conflicts. Freedom of labor shall be protected. Social insurance for workers in case of illness, accidents, etc., shall be regulated by law.

ART. 22. Liberty of conscience is absolute. The state guarantees to all religions equal liberty and protection in so far as their practices do not affect the public order, good morals, and the organic laws of the state. The Orthodox Christian Church and the Greek Catholic Church are the Rumanian churches. The Orthodox Rumanian Church representing the religion of the great majority of Rumanians is the dominant church of the Rumanian state; the Greek Catholic Church takes precedence over the other religions. The Orthodox Rumanian church is and shall remain independent of all foreign ecclesiastical authority, but retains its unity with the Oriental Ecumenical Church in respect to dogmas. Throughout the entire kingdom of Rumania the Orthodox Christian Church shall have a unitary organization with the participation of all the constituent elements, clerical and lay. A special law shall determine the fundamental principles of this unitary organization, as well as the conditions under which the church shall regulate, conduct, and administer, through its own organs and under the control of the state, its religious and educational affairs, and matters concerning its endowments and the management of its property. Spiritual and canonical questions of the Orthodox Rumanian Church shall be regulated by a single central synodal authority. The archbishops and bishops of the Orthodox Rumanian Church shall be elected in accordance with a single special law. Relations between the different religions and the state shall be determined by law.

ART. 23. The acts of the civil state are within the province of the civil law. The completion of these acts must always precede the religious benediction.

ART. 24. Education is free under conditions established by the special laws and in so far as it will not be contrary to good morals or public order. Primary education is compulsory. In state schools this instruction will be given gratuitously. The state, the districts, and the communes shall give aid and assistance to indigent pupils in all the stages of education to the extent and under the conditions provided for by law.

ART. 25. The constitution guarantees to every person liberty to communicate and publish his ideas, his opinions orally, in writing, and through the press, each person being responsible for the abuse of this liberty in the cases determined by the penal code, which, however, may in no case restrict the right itself. No special law may be enacted to deal with this matter. Neither a censorship nor any other measure to prevent the appearance, sale, or distribution of any kind of publication may be instituted. No previous authorization from any authority is required for the printing of any publication whatsoever. No surety shall be demanded of journalists, writers, publishers, printers, or lithographers. The press shall never be subjected to the system of control by admonitions. No journal or publication may be suspended or suppressed. Every periodical publication, whatever may be its character, must have a responsible director and in his absence a responsible editor. The director or editor must enjoy civil and political rights. The name of the director and the name of the editor shall appear plainly and in a permanent manner at the head of the publication. Before the appearance of a periodical publication its proprietor is obliged to state and register his name with the Court of Commerce. Sanctions for the enforcement of these provisions shall be determined by a special law.

ART. 26. So far as non-periodical publications are concerned, the author is responsible for his writings and in default of the author the publisher is responsible; the printer is liable when the author and publisher have not been revealed. For periodical publications the responsibility shall fall on the author, the director, or the editor in the order of enumeration. The proprietor is in all cases conjointly responsible for the payment of civil damages. Crimes of the press shall be tried by jury with the exception of cases hereafter mentioned which will be tried by the ordinary courts according to the usual law.

(a) Crimes committed against the sovereigns of the country, the crown prince, the members of the royal family and of the dynasty, and the heads of foreign states and their representatives.

(b) Direct incitements to murder and rebellion in the cases in which they have not resulted in execution.

(c) Slander, abuse, and defamation directed against individuals or public functionaries, whoever they may be, who are injured in respect to their private lives in their personal honor.

Preventive arrest in the matter of the press is forbidden.

ART. 27. The secrecy of letters, telegrams, and telephonic conversations is inviolable. A special law shall determine the cases in which the courts, in the interest of criminal inquiries, may make exceptions to this provision. The same law shall determine the responsibility of state agents and of individuals for violation of the secrecy of letters, telegrams, and telephonic conversations.

ART. 28. Rumanians, without discrimination on account of ethnic origin, of language, or of religion, have the right to assemble, peaceably and without arms, in accordance with the laws regulating the exercise of this right, to consider all kinds of questions; for this no previous authorization shall be required. Meetings in the open air are permitted except on public highways and squares. Meetings, parades, and demonstrations on the public highways and squares are subject to the laws of the police.

ART. 29. Rumanians, without discrimination on account of ethnic origin, language, or religion, have the right of association in accordance with the laws regulating the exercise of this right. The right of free association does not in itself imply the right of creating corporate personality. The conditions under which corporate personality may be granted shall be determined by a special law.

ART. 30. Every person has the right to address the public authorities by petitions signed by one or more persons, without power, however, to petition otherwise than in the name of the signatories. Only constituted authorities have the right to address petitions in a collective name.

ART. 31. No previous authorization is required for injured parties to sue public functionaries on account of their official acts, provided, however, that the special rules established concerning the ministers shall not be injuriously affected. The conditions for and method of these suits shall be determined by a special law. Special provisions in the penal code shall determine the penalties for the abuse of the right to sue.

ART. 32. No Rumanian without authorization from the government may enter the service of a foreign state without thereby losing his citizenship. Extradition of political refugees is forbidden.

TITLE III. THE POWERS OF THE STATE

ART. 33. All the powers of the state emanate from the nation which may exercise them only by delegation and according to the principles and the rules set forth in the present constitution.

ART. 34. The legislative power is collectively exercised by the king and the national representative body. The national representative body is divided into two houses: the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. Every law requires the approval of the three branches of the legislative power. No law may be submitted for royal approval until after it has been discussed and voted freely by a majority of the two houses.

ART. 35. Legislative initiative is given to each of the three branches of the legislative power.

Nevertheless, every law relating to the revenues and expenditures of the state or to the army contingent must first be voted by the Chamber of Deputies.

ART. 36. Authoritative interpretation of the laws may be made solely by the legislative power.

ART. 37. Promulgation of laws voted by the two houses shall be the duty of the Minister of Justice, who shall retain one of the original copies of the laws voted and shall deposit the second original copy in the archives of the state.

The Minister of Justice is the custodian of the Great Seal of the State.

Each year the Minister of Justice shall publish the collection of laws and regulations, in which the laws shall be arranged in numerical order according to the date of promulgation.

ART. 38. No law, and no general administrative, district, or communal regulation shall be binding until it shall have been published in the form prescribed by law.

ART. 39. The executive power is vested in the king who shall exercise it in the manner prescribed by the constitution.

ART. 40. The judicial power shall be exercised by its appropriate organs.

Judgments shall be pronounced according to law and shall be executed in the name of the king.

ART. 41. Matters exclusively of district or communal interest shall be regulated by district and communal councils according to the principles established by the constitution and by special laws.

CHAPTER I. NATIONAL REPRESENTATION

ARTS. 42-63. (Dealing with open sessions, qualifications of members and election of officers of the two houses, manner of voting, rights of interpellation and of petition, freedom of members from prosecution and arrest, rules of procedure, four year term, and compensation.)

Section I. The Chamber of Deputies

ART. 64. The Chamber of Deputies shall be composed of deputies elected by adult Rumanian citizens by universal, equal, direct, compulsory, and secret suffrage, on the basis of the representation of minorities.

ART. 65. The election of deputies shall take place by electoral circonscriptions. The electoral circonscription may not be larger than a district. The number of deputies to be elected in each circonscription, in proportion to the population, shall be determined by the electoral law.

ART. 66. To be eligible to election to the Chamber of Deputies, it is necessary (a) to be a Rumanian citizen, (b) to possess civil and political rights, (c) to have reached the age of twenty-five years, (d) to be domiciled in Rumania.

Incapacities shall be determined by the electoral law.

Section II. The Senate

ART. 67. The Senate shall be composed of elected and ex-officio senators.

ART. 68. All Rumanian citizens who have reached the age of forty years shall elect, by electoral circonscriptions which may not be larger than a district, a number of senators by compulsory, equal, direct, and secret suffrage. The number of senators to be elected in each circonscription, which may not be larger than a district, shall be determined by the electoral law proportionately to the population.

ART. 69. Members chosen by the district councils and members chosen by the communal councils, urban and rural, meeting in a single body, shall choose one senator for the district by compulsory, equal, direct, and secret ballot.

ART. 70. Members of the chambers of commerce, of industry, and labor, and of agriculture, meeting in separate bodies, shall choose from their own numbers one senator of each category for each electoral circonscription. These special electoral circonscriptions shall be fixed by the electoral law, provided that their number may not exceed six.

ART. 71. Each university, by vote of the professors, shall choose one senator from its members.

ART. 72. Ex-officio members of the Senate, by virtue of their high place in the state and in the church shall be: (a) The heir to the throne when he has reached the age of eighteen years, provided that until he has reached the age of twenty-five years he may have only a deliberative voice; (b) the archbishops of the country; (c) the diocesan bishops of the Orthodox Rumanian and Greek Catholic churches, in so far as they have been elected in accordance with the laws of the country; (d) heads of confessions recognized by the state, one for each confession, in so far as they have been elected in accordance with the laws of the country and represent more than 200,000 believers, as well as the chief religious representative of the Moslems of the kingdom; (e) the president of the Rumanian Academy. The mandate of these senators shall cease at the same time as the dignity or status which qualifies them.

ART. 73. The following shall become ex-officio members of the Senate: (a) Former presidents of the Council of Ministers who have served at least four years as titular presidents, and former ministers who have served at least six years in one or more governments; (b) former presidents of the legislative bodies who have had this dignity in the course of at least eight regular sessions; (c) former senators and deputies elected to at least ten legislatures, regardless of their duration; (d) former first-presidents of the High Court of Cassation and of Justice who have occupied this office or that of president of Cassation for at least five years; (e) generals on the reserve list or retired, who have had titular command of an army facing the enemy for at least three months, or who have exercised the functions of Chief of the General Staff or Inspector General of the Army (Commander of the Army) in time of peace for at least four years. (The number of those of the second category shall not exceed four in order of seniority as vacancies occur.) (f) Former presidents of the national assemblies of Chisinau, Cernautz, and Alba Iulia which have declared for union.

Art. 74. The verification of the qualifications of senators ex-officio shall be made by a commission composed of the presidents of the sections of the High Court of Cassation and Justice under the presidency of the First-President of this High Court. The authentication shall be made officially on the demand of the President of the Senate or of those who have the right. The President of the Senate shall enrol the senators ex-officio on the basis of the conclusions of the commission. The President of the Senate may inquire into and point out to the commission for correction errors certified in the determination of these rights to office.

Art. 75. To be eligible to the Senate it is necessary: (a) To be a Rumanian citizen, (b) to possess civil and political rights, (c) to have reached the age of forty years, (d) to be domiciled in Rumania. These qualifications, except in respect to age, are required equally of ex-officio senators.

Section III. The Legislative Council

Art. 76. A legislative council shall be created for the purpose of giving advice in the drafting and arrangement of the laws whether they are initiated by the executive or by Parliament, as well as in the drafting of general ordinances for the execution of the laws. The advice of the legislative council is required for all bills, except those relating to budgetary credits; provided, however, that if, within a period to be fixed by law, the legislative council does not render its opinion the houses may proceed to the discussion and approval of bills. The organization and method of procedure of the legislative council shall be determined by a special law.

Chapter II. The King and the Ministers

Section I. The King

Arts. 77-91. (Dealing with succession to the throne, the royal oath, regency, ministerial responsibility for acts of the king, appointment of ministers, royal veto, amnesty and pardons, appointments to office, execution of laws, military ranks and decorations, negotiation of conventions, annual sessions, the royal message, dissolution and prorogation.)

Chapter III. The Ministers

Art. 92. The government shall exercise the executive power in the name of the king in the manner provided by the constitution.

Art. 93. The ministers meeting together shall compose the Council of Ministers, which shall be presided over, with the title of President of the Council of Ministers, by the one who has been intrusted by the king with the formation of the government. Ministerial departments and under-secretariats of state may be created or abolished only by law.

Art. 94. No one may be a minister who is not a Rumanian or who has not been naturalized.

Art. 95. No member of the royal family may be a minister.

Art. 96. Ministers who are not members of the houses may nevertheless take part in the legislative debates, without, however, having the right to vote. The presence of at least one minister shall be necessary for debates in the houses. The houses may require the presence of ministers at their debates.

Art. 97. In no case may a verbal or written order of the king relieve a minister of responsibility.

Art. 98. Each of the two houses as well as the king shall have the right to impeach ministers and to arraign them before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, which alone, with all its sections meeting, shall have the right to pass judgments, except as may be provided by law, in respect to civil actions by injured parties and in respect to crimes and misdemeanors committed by ministers outside of the exercise of their official functions. The impeachment of ministers by the legislative bodies may not be passed except by a two-thirds majority of the members present. The inquiry shall be conducted by a commission of the High Court of Cassation composed of five members chosen by lot with all the sections meeting. This commission shall also have the power to determine the facts and to decide for or against the prosecution. The impeachment shall be supported before the High Court of Cassation and Justice by the public prosecutor. Cases of responsibility and penalties applicable to ministers shall be determined by the law relating to ministerial responsibility.

Art. 99. Whoever considers himself injured by a decree or provision signed or countersigned by a minister, which violates the precise text of the constitution or of a law, may demand of the state, in accordance with the customary law, pecuniary indemnities for the damage suffered. During the course of the trial or after the verdict has been rendered, the minister, on demand of the state and following a vote by one of the legislative bodies, may be summoned before the ordinary courts to respond in civil proceedings for the loss claimed or suffered by the state. The illegal act of a minister does not relieve from joint responsibility the functionary who has given his countersignature, unless the latter has protested to the minister in writing.

Art. 100. Under-secretaries of state may be created. Under-secretaries of state may take part in the debates in the legislative bodies under the responsibility of the ministers.

Chapter IV. The Judicial Power

Art. 101. No jurisdiction may be set up except by virtue of a special law. Extraordinary commissions and courts may not be created under any denomination or on any pretext for the purpose of any special, civil, or penal process or for the trial of special persons.

Art. 102. For the whole Rumanian state there shall be only one Court of Cassation and Justice.

Art. 103. Only the Court of Cassation, all its sections meeting, shall have the right to pass on the constitutionality of laws and to declare inapplicable those which are contrary to the constitution. The judgment upon the unconstitutionality of laws shall be confined to the case before the court. The Court of Cassation shall decide, as in the past, on disputes as to competence. The right of appeal in cassation has constitutional warrant.

Art. 104. Judges shall be irremovable under special conditions to be determined by law.

Art. 105. Trial by jury shall be provided for in all criminal matters and for political and press offenses except in the the cases fixed by the present constitution. An action for damages on account of the acts and crimes of the press may be brought only before the same court which has jurisdiction to consider the crime.

Art. 106. Military justice shall be provided for by a special law.

Art. 107. No special authorities of any nature may be set up with jurisdiction over administrative affairs in litigation. Administrative affairs in litigation shall be within the province of the judicial authorities in accordance with a special law. Any person whose rights are prejudiced by a valid administrative act, by an administrative act committed in violation of the laws and ordinances in force, or by the unwillingness of the administrative authorities to satisfy a request based on a right, may demand of the judicial tribunals that his right be recognized. The organs of the judicial power shall judge whether the act is illegal and they may annul it or fix civil damages up to the date of the recognition of the denied right, with jurisdiction also to pass upon and to require an indemnity either from the defendant administrative authorities or from the functionary who is to blame. The judicial power has no jurisdiction to pass upon the acts of the Government or those of the military command.

CHAPTER V. DISTRICT AND COMMUNAL INSTITUTIONS

ART. 108. District and communal institutions shall be regulated by law. These laws shall be based on the principle of administrative decentralization. The members of district and communal councils shall be chosen by Rumanian citizens by universal, equal, direct, secret, and compulsory suffrage, and with representation for minorities, according to the forms provided for by law. To these elected members there may be added, by law, ex-officio and coopted members. Adult women may be among the coopted members.

TITLE IV. FINANCES

ARTS. 109-118. (Dealing with the requirements that taxes, exemptions, monopolies, pensions, and gratuities shall be regulated by law, the annual audit and budget, the Court of Accounts, publication of financial laws.)

TITLE V. THE ARMED FORCE

ART. 119. Every Rumanian without discrimination on account of ethnic origin, language, or religion shall be one of the elements of the armed force, in accordance with the provisions of the special laws. The armed force shall be composed of the active army with its permanent, reserve, and militia units.

ART. 120. Military grades, decorations, and pensions may not be taken away except by virtue of a judicial sentence and in cases determined by law.

ART. 121. The quota of the army shall be voted each year by the two legislative bodies.

ART. 122. A Superior Council of National Defense shall be set up and shall have as its permanent charge the measures necessary for the organization of the national defense.

ART. 123. No foreign armed contingent may be admitted to the service of the state or may enter or cross Rumanian territory except by virtue of a special law.

TITLE VI. GENERAL PROVISIONS

ART. 124. The colors of the Rumanian flag shall be blue, yellow, and red, arranged vertically.

ART. 125. The seat of the government shall be in the capital of the country.

ART. 126. The Rumanian language shall be the official language of the Rumanian state.

ART. 127. No oath shall be required of any person except by virtue of a law which shall also determine the formula.

ART. 128. The present constitution may not be suspended either in whole or in part. In case of national danger a general or partial state of siege may be declared.

TITLE VII. THE REVISION OF THE CONSTITUTION

ART. 129. The constitution may be revised in whole or in part on the initiative of the king or of one of the legislative houses. After this initiative the two houses shall meet separately and shall decide by an absolute majority whether there is reason for the constitutional provision being revised. When the necessity of the revision has been admitted, the two legislative bodies shall elect from their members a mixed commission which shall propose the parts of the constitution which must be submitted to revision. After the report of this commission has been read in each of the two houses twice with an interval of a fortnight, the two houses meeting together in the same place, under the presidency of the elder of the presidents, in the presence of at least two-thirds of the total number of members composing them, and by a majority of two-thirds, shall determine in a definitive way the articles to be submitted to the revision. Following this vote the houses shall be dissolved by law and the electorate shall be summoned within the period prescribed by the constitution.

ART. 130. The new houses shall proceed, in agreement with the king, to the modification of the points submitted to the revision. In this case the houses may not deliberate unless two-thirds of the members composing them are present, and no change may be adopted unless it musters at least two-thirds of the votes. The houses chosen for the revision of the constitution shall have the usual constitutional term, and, except for the modification of the constitution, they shall function as ordinary legislative assemblies. If the houses chosen for revision cannot complete their task, the new houses shall have the same authority.

TITLE VIII. TRANSITORY AND SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

ART. 131. A constitutional dignity attaches to and shall continue to attach to the provisions of the agrarian laws relating to arable land, woods, and ponds suitable for expropriation in whole or in part, to their legal status, to the subsoil, to their valuation, to the method of payment, etc., . . . as they are formulated in the articles below of each of the agrarian laws, which articles shall, in their totality, be an integral part of the constitution and similarly may be changed only in the forms prescribed for the revision of the constitution, viz.:

(Here follows the citation, by number, of articles and clauses of the agrarian laws of July 17, 1921, March 13, 1920, and July 30, 1921.)

ART. 132. For the purpose of satisfying the normal requirements of the rural populations of Bessarabia and Bukovina for firewood and building materials, the state shall designate in the forests on plains, hills, and mountains the sections which are necessary and appropriate. In the old Kingdom and in Bukovina, where the state will not have forests within a radius of 12 kilometers from the center of the commune to satisfy the requirements mentioned above, and in derogation of Article 7, letter c and of Article 8 letters a, c, and b of the law of July 17, 1921, for agrarian reform in Olthenie, Muntenie, Moldavia, and Dobrudja and of Article 5, paragraph a, Clause IV and of Articles 6 and 7 of the law of July 30, 1921, for agrarian reform in Bukovina, expropriation may take place of forests belonging to public or private corporations within this radius, and only for want of this may there be proportionate expropriation of the forests of all the private proprietors within this radius, strictly within the limits of these needs and in every case respecting an intangible area of one hundred hectares in each property. Trees replanted or in the course of being replanted may not be expropriated, whoever the proprietor. Contracts of sale for the exploitation of forests liable to expropriation which are in effect at the time of expropriation shall be respected. Forests thus expropriated shall remain the property of the state and shall be administered and exploited by it in order to give primary satisfaction according to law to the needs mentioned above. The expropriation of these forests shall be accompanied by fair and previous compensation to be determined by the courts. The method of expropriation shall be determined by a special law.

ART. 133. The following extraordinary ordinances are hereby ratified: No. 3,902 of December 29, 1918, published in the Monitor Oficial No. 223 of December 30, 1918, relative to the conferring of civil rights; No. 2,085 of May 22, 1919, published in the Monitor Oficial No. 33 of May 28, 1919, and No. 3,464 of August 12, 1919, published in the Monitor Oficial No. 93 of August 13, 1919, relative to the naturalization of Jews living in the old Kingdom.

Likewise all the extraordinary ordinances for individual naturalization made before the ordinances mentioned above are hereby ratified. Jews living in the old kingdom who have not asserted their right to naturalization within the period provided by the extraordinary ordinance No. 3,464 of August 12, 1919, may make their naturalization declarations in accordance with the extraordinary ordinance No. 2,085 of May 22, 1919, within a period of three months from the date of the promulgation of the present constitution.

ARTS. 134-138. (Dealing with the effect of the constitution upon existing laws and ordinances.)

This constitution has been voted on by the national constituent assembly of Deputies in the session of March 26, 1923, and has been adopted by a majority of 246 votes to 8, with 2 abstentions.

South Africa of Tomorrow

The South African Native Affairs Department has issued an account of the progress of the native community of South Africa during the three years since the war. Mr. Barrett, until recently the Secretary of the Native Department, says that the spread of education and the stirring events of the Great War have had an unprecedented influence on native thought, and have led to a growth of "race consciousness" which will no longer accept present conditions without critical examination. An article in the Manchester Guardian of June 23, in discussing the report says:

> We are reminded that nearly all the veteran champions of native causes have passed away: the two Schreiners, Louis Botha, Maurice Evans, and the two Moffats. The older native chiefs, too, have gone, and the guidance of purely native thought is falling increasingly into the hands of young and ardent educated natives. The native demand for the franchise is still unsatisfied; in Cape Colony alone does the native possess the vote—a heritage of direct British government. Instead of the franchise, General Smuts has given an advisory board of four experts on native policy, but no native has been appointed to this body, and it is already clear that this advisory board in no way meets the demand of a native franchise. The color bar is thus rigidly maintained in the legislative sphere.

THE LAND AND THE NATIVE

The 1913 Land Act, by which General Botha laid the foundations of his ambitious scheme for dividing the 300 million acres of South African land between the races—260 million acres for the occupancy of 1,000,000 whites and 40 million acres for 4,500,000 natives—is slowly pursuing its disentangling process, although legal decisions have limited its operations in Cape Colony, and is thus facilitating native purchases of land, whilst by the same process in the Orange Free State disabilities against purchase of land by natives have received confirmation. The most interesting feature is that the native is apparently less attracted than the white man to individual tenure. The following are the statistics of purchase since 1913:

|---|---|
| Farms purchased tribally | 55 |
| " " communally | 43 |
| " " individually | 24 |

All land tribally purchased must be registered in the name of the Native Commissioner in trust for the tribe; those purchased communally must be governed by articles of association defining the rights of each shareholder; those purchased by individuals are entirely a matter between buyer and seller. The Natal Native Trust is one of the most interesting and successful experiments in African land holding. The trust covers 42 native areas in Natal, comprising 2,192,568 acres and occupied by nearly 300,000 natives. The natives are encouraged to keep clean and healthy herds, lay down plantations, and undertake irrigation works. The trust has 60 officials, who advise and help the natives in their task of dipping 500,000 cattle a week and of keeping in motion some 22 miles of irrigation works.

TAXATION AND EDUCATION

One of the chief complaints of the natives in South Africa is that they are not only taxed without being given a voice in the spending of the money, but taxed far beyond any benefits received. This report shows that for the three years subsequent to the war the direct taxation borne by the four and a half millions of natives of the Union was £2,468,000, or an average of £823,000 per annum. To this must be added Pass Law fees of £325,000, making a total direct taxation of £1,150,000 per annum. To this direct burden must be added the indirect taxation, which, like the indirect benefits received, is only a speculative figure, the two probably canceling each other in operation. What are the direct benefits? The Native Affairs Department, now manned by a staff of 582 persons, cost before the war £287,550; but today it costs £500,000. The total expenditure on education averages on the three years £202,000. Thus the native receives in direct benefits value to the amount of £722,000, as compared with a direct tax burden of £1,150,000—and no voice in the spending thereof!

The educational facilities provided for the natives vary considerably in the four provinces of South Africa, as may be seen from the following schedule:

| | Native population | Expenditure |
|---|---|---|
| Cape Colony | 1,500,000 | £170,000 |
| Transvaal | 1,220,000 | 56,759 |
| Natal | 1,000,000 | 32,502 |
| Orange Free State | 350,000 | 5,273 |

The report on education is disappointing in that it chronicles so little beyond stating what is so obvious—namely, that education is everywhere crippled through lack of financial aid. The South African native college is progressing but slowly, the twenty students with which it was inaugurated have only increased to sixty—sixty from a population, including the protectorates, of nearly seven million!

The total number of natives employed under the oversight of the Native Affairs Department in the last year under review was 278,435.

We thus obtain a picture of 4,500,000 people with a "racial consciousness" which demands an abolition of the color bar to civic and industrial advancement. This mass of humanity is smarting today under a growing sense of wrong: denied the franchise, denied any voice in spending the heavy toll taken from their wages, denied the right to purchase back from whites the land which once they owned, denied by organized white labor the freedom which those very labor unions loudly declare to be the right of every man (other than colored).

A Community of Owners Nation-wide

"Who owns the company?" "What is behind it?" These questions are asked in appraising the soundness of a business and in determining its aims.

The American Telephone and Telegraph Company is owned by more than 270,000 people living in every state in the Union. Could the stockholders of the Bell System be gathered to one place, they would equal the population of a city about the size of Providence or Denver.

They constitute a representative cross-section of American citizenship. Among them, of course, are bankers and men of large affairs; for the idea of ownership in the Bell System appeals to sound business judgment and a trained sense of values.

In this community of owners are the average man and woman, the storekeeper, the clerk, the salesman, the professional man, the farmer and the housewife—users of the telephone who with their savings have purchased a share in its ownership. The average individual holding is but twenty-six shares.

No institution is more popularly owned than the Bell System, none has its shares distributed more widely. In the truest sense it is owned by those it serves.

WORKERS' NON-PROFIT CO-OPERATIVES

A new manual of practical methods for working farmers and wage laborers who wish to co-operate in such a way as to get what they produce. The plans in this book differ from the plans of existing co-operatives in that they offer no interest or dividends on capital, but provide for the return of the capital in yearly instalments. The author was unjustly imprisoned for four years on a charge of inciting the Oklahoma draft riots. He is a veteran organizer who understands the economic problems of the workers and has a practical plan to offer. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.

AMERICA, as we predicted last week, is coming promptly and splendidly to the assistance of the stricken Japanese. In a few short days New York City raised half as much again for the Red Cross as the million dollars that was asked, while other funds brought the city's total to about three millions. The rest of the country is responding as generously. It will all be needed—and more. For, in addition to immediate pressing relief, there will be a long aftermath of disease and destitution which will tax Japan to the uttermost financially and socially. We rejoice in the fine spirit of human solidarity which our country is manifesting. Although not wholly committed to the philosophy of Doctor Pollyanna Pangloss that all is for the best in this best of possible worlds, we do feel that Japan's grim tragedy has pushed aside the menace of war between her people and our own, not so much because it has weakened her resources as because Americans, having stretched out their arms to the Japanese with succor, would find it less easy to reach out with bayonets.

AS a drowning man reaches after straws, we may perhaps find hope in the report that Germany has ordered an end to passive resistance in the Ruhr and is ready to give France such a lien on its industry that the big-business interests of the latter country will compel their government to make terms. In this way impending revolution in Germany may be stayed and the nation permitted, somehow, to totter on. But in the end the price may prove fatally high. Passive resistance was the strongest moral weapon that Germany had. What does she gain by relinquishing it? At most, it seems, the indefinite slavery of her workers to the taskmasters of big business, domestic and foreign.

GOVERNOR PINCHOT recognizes that his settlement of the coal strike is anything but a solution of the problem. He has succeeded in finding a least common denominator that will satisfy the minimum requirements of the union and the operators and will get the men back into the mines. But Governor Pinchot wants to do more than this. He wants to establish some sort of control which will make it possible to increase the wages of miners without increasing the cost of coal to the people. And so he has called upon the governors of the thirty anthracite-using States to investigate the possibilities of price control and then to meet him in conference and decide what to do. All this is laudable and may be useful—but we doubt if it will bring down the price of coal. A profit—even an unduly large profit—is an elusive thing, especially when it is divided among producers and railroads and wholesalers and jobbers and brokers and retail dealers. And when once you have run it down it is extremely difficult to limit or reduce it. Something more than war-time powers of control will be needed to keep prices from going up when wages are increased; the chances are rather that everyone who has a finger in the pie, from producer to retailer, will act as if the whole burden fell on him alone, and the increase will be reckoned by geometric progression. The adjustment of railroad rates by government commission is a simple matter compared with the control of commodity prices. Still it is something to have the facts of profiteering made known, and if Governor Pinchot faces the problem squarely, it is likely to lead him to some radical conclusions.

GRANTING that the report on civil rights issued recently by the United States Coal Commission is inadequate in its recommendations, timid in its conclusions, and far from complete, it is yet in many respects an amazing document. For it admits in a dozen different passages that governmental agencies have broken down in various parts of the mine fields, and that common civil rights do not exist. It is scrupulously impartial in the matter of distributing praise and blame between the union and the operators; but the picture it draws of human conditions in the bituminous coal fields is there for all to see: whole districts belonging physically and politically to a group of absentee owners, districts in which outsiders are treated as trespassers on a private park, in which the population has no more rights than servants in the house of an autocratic master. Says the report: "These groups of villages dot the mountainsides down the river valleys, and need only castles, drawbridges, and donjon-keeps to reproduce to the physical eye a view of feudal days." The story of mine guards and deputy sheriffs paid by the coal company to keep outside organizers out and inside organizers from enlisting their fellows in the union; of leases designed to "close" the mine town against all intruders; of bitterness ready to flame into murder and wholesale riot on both sides—all this is told and properly condemned. The bloody history of Herrin is carefully recounted. An occasional suggestion for improvement is made. And if the report does no more than this, it is because no commission appointed under present conditions is going to recommend the drastic steps that must be taken if coal mining is ever going to become an industry instead of a war.

WHEN Charles E. Hughes talks as a politician he has a lamentable tendency to emit buncombe and bumptiousness; when he talks as a lawyer he has an equal facility for speaking common sense. His start in public life was made as a lawyer in the New York insurance inquiry, and as Governor of that State, in so far as his role was that of a legal mind, it was usually well played. When he left the Supreme Court to stump the country for the Presidency, he descended to outright politics and touched his lowest level. In his career as Secretary of State he appears by turns as blustering politician and clear-minded lawyer. A week ago we attacked his declaration of a super sovereignty in this hemisphere in the name of the Monroe Doctrine; this week we applaud his remarks on war before the Canadian Bar Association in Montreal. Mr. Hughes said:

> There is no path to peace except as the will of peoples may open it. The way to peace is through agreement, not through force. The question then is not of any ambitious general scheme to prevent war, but simply of the constant effort, which is the highest task of statesmanship in relation to every possible cause of strife, to diminish among peoples the disposition to resort to force and to find a just and reasonable basis for accord. It is most desirable that all discussions of international relations should not revolve about questions of policy and expediency, however important these may be, but that along with this necessary discussion there should be the determination to reestablish the law, to quicken the sense of the obligation of states under the law.

The will to peace, in other words; a lofty conception and a practical one. And much would be gained too by the fulfilment of Mr. Hughes's suggestion for the codification of international law. Of itself this would not prevent war, but a uniform and generally accepted statement of these now vague principles would give them far more weight and form a basis for peaceful agreements.

DIRECT action against radicalism or other opinion with which they disagree has recently been attempted in Paris by the five most widely circulated newspapers of conservative tendencies: the Matin, the Petit Journal, the Journal, the Petit Parisien, and the Echo de Paris. These publications gave newsdealers to understand that if they placed on sale the Quotidien, a new daily, they would not be supplied with the issues of any of the five big journals. Assuredly a simple way to suppress unpopular opinion in the press!—what our American police would call an "inside job." But in spite of post-war reaction, France does not seem entirely to have forgotten the tradition of free speech and a fair field which for so many years has been her glory, and there has actually been a demand for the government to intervene and teach the newspapers themselves a lesson in the principles of the freedom of the press. The municipality of St. Etienne has protested against "the tyranny of the consortium of the great Paris journals," while the city of Belfort has prohibited discrimination in the sale of newspapers on the part of the municipally owned kiosks. When in Paris recently H. G. Wells visited the office of the Quotidien and expressed his sympathy with and approval of the newspaper.

> Surely there must be some way in which we can speak to the men we fought and make them realize there is a better way of living among nations than continually battling one another. . . . How can we wish to deal with our former enemies if we haven't the moral courage to get together in peace? . . . Maybe there has been no change of heart among our former enemies. Perhaps there never will be unless we are men enough to carry to them our peace message. . . . Hoarding and keeping in our hearts ancient prejudices will not bring the peace we earned by our victory.

THESE are fine and true words and to the credit of Colonel Owsley, who spoke them before the fourth annual congress of the Interallied Federation of Former Combatants in Brussels. They would ring truer if one did not have to remember that a week previously Colonel Owsley assured the French people, upon his acceptance of the insignia of Commander in the Légion d'Honneur, that "the American Legion, representing 4,000,000 or more soldiers . . . stands with and approves the action of France and Belgium [in occupying the Ruhr]." Nor can we agree with him that the military man would improve upon the politician's failure to make peace. Both, like the bully of Italy, have too long had the habit of mouthing silly phrases about "honor" to have a clear conception of man's proper relation to man. And if the British, oppressed by their war legacy of acute unemployment, had not held out, the Interallied Federation of Former Combatants would undoubtedly have unreservedly approved a resolution "indorsing the occupation of the Ruhr as the legal means to obtain reparations under the Versailles Treaty." As it was the French had to be content with the statement "that Germany can pay, with relatively short delay, the amount of reparations agreed upon in common by all the Allies."

A FAMOUS clown died the other day at the age of seventy-nine who had spent sixty-six years in the sawdust ring. In his last hours somebody asked him if he had not wasted his life "just making people laugh." "Well now just making them laugh isn't the easiest thing," answered Al Miaco good naturedly; "but there's a deeper philosophy than that back of the clown." Then he quoted the sentence of Beaumarchais which Le Figaro of Paris prints every day at the head of its first page: "Praised by some, blamed by others, ridiculing the fools, defying the wicked, I make haste to laugh at everything—for fear of being obliged to weep." Like Beaumarchais, Al Miaco realized that there is no essential difference between laughter and tears, and he was able to move people as he chose because of perceptions a little more acute than theirs. Amid the follies and futilities which surround us, possibly playing the clown is the only occupation in which a serious man can engage without feeling that he is making a fool of himself.

WITH the withdrawal of the American Relief Administration from Russia and repeated reports of a bumper harvest, kind-hearted Americans have felt that the old earth had one less trouble to worry about. That they have turned their thoughts elsewhere too soon is the charge of Henry J. Rosenfelt, national director of the American Jewish Relief Committee, 103 Park Avenue, New York City. He reports that expected contributors have defaulted on their pledges to the amount of $3,000,000 and have almost crippled the work of caring for 1,165,290 homeless children of the Ukraine, made destitute by war, famine, and pestilence. While there is sufficient food in Russia to take care of the whole population, there is a lack of proper distribution of supplies, including medical and sanitary relief. Unless money is immediately forthcoming, winter will bring inescapable death, the committee declares, to tens of thousands of these child wanderers, and the survivors will be virtually savages in the near future. Already they are diseased and brutalized, wandering on the outskirts of the towns, living on what they can grub out of the ground. It is reported that many girls under thirteen years of age, already mothers, are among the number. It is a problem to shock the sensibilities of the world. Surely the people of the United States, so prompt to respond to the needs of any population spectacularly ravaged by the harshness of Nature, cannot be less conscious of their duty to these man-made sufferers—the by-products of war.

THE hand-cuffed, bullet-riddled body of Ben Hart, a Negro farm hand, was picked up on the road near Jacksonville, Florida, shortly after midnight, on August 25. Investigation by the sheriff's office showed that the mob had slain an innocent man who had spent all of Thursday night in a logging camp near Dinsmore, where he worked, and that he could not have been the peeper who looked in a girl's window ten miles away. When an innocent person is thus casually done to death it adds a note of horror to a crime that is black enough when the victim is a convicted criminal. Lynching, as a form of misguided chivalry, has been definitely proscribed by the Women's General Committee of the Commission on Inter-racial Cooperation which met in Asheville, North Carolina, on August 1. The committee said:

> Whereas lynching, at one time practiced only as punishment by the mob for the violation of womanhood, is now resorted to even for robbery, petty crime, or no crime . . . and whereas we are overwhelmed with a deep sense of humiliation that this hideous crime is heralded abroad as the only means available to men for the protection of womanhood, and whereas we likewise suffer because of the seeming impotence of our State governments in the protection of human life and in their inability to find and punish lynchers and members of mobs . . . therefore, be it resolved, that we deplore the failure of State governments to handle this, the most flagrant violation of the Constitution of our great nation; that we definitely set ourselves the task of creating such sentiment . . . that not only sufficient laws shall be enacted . . . but to secure the enforcement of the laws now in existence.

THE politics of Wrangel Island and the motives which sent a band of adventurous ones out to claim it for the British Empire may be considered with mixed emotions, but only the most whole-hearted tribute can be paid to Ada Blackjack, the young Eskimo woman who alone survived out of that unhappy expedition. How she passed through her second winter on a snow-covered mass of rocks with a dying companion to care for, how she taught herself to shoot and set traps, how she was stalked by polar bears and found their tracks outside her tent in the mornings, and how, after the death of the sick man, she lived several months quite alone with her hope of rescue slowly dying, all these make a tale of courage and resource which in fiction would probably be considered too romantic to be credited. To rise in half-light which never grew brighter; to see nothing but ice and snow; to eat nothing but tea, moldy bread, a scrap of dried meat, and seal oil; to live within a hundred yards of the corpse of one's only fellow-being; and finally to feel that rescue was almost impossible—what man would care to risk such an experience; what woman would be expected to survive it? That Ada Blackjack was able to talk coherently of her life during the last few months is the highest measure of her extraordinary fortitude.

THE late William Roscoe Thayer was for years prior to 1918 one of the most valued reviewers of The Nation. A past president of the American Historical Association and long editor of the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, his reputation as an historian was based on his remarkable "Life and Times of Cavour," a book which is the best history of the resurrection of modern Italy that has yet been written. The fruit of years of patient labor and research, its worth is universally recognized. Unfortunately none of Mr. Thayer's later works reached the same high level. His "Life and Letters of John Hay" was a partisan record and his latest book, "George Washington," was still less worthy of Mr. Thayer's powers. Curiously enough, this historian was as much stampeded in his judgments during the war as was any of the ninety-three German professors who signed that shameful memorial whitewashing their guilty government. Mr. Thayer was as rabidly and ferociously anti-German as anybody. In how many, many cases on both sides of the ocean the war destroyed the ability of historians and scientists to probe the facts of current history in that spirit of detachment which helped to make Thayer's Cavour one of the great and lasting biographies of our time! With its author disappears a charming personality, one of the few remaining figures to connect Cambridge with its historic literary past.

THE privileges accorded to genius have often been a source of irritation to the less gifted of us. But the case of Papyrus, winner of the English Derby, whose owners are going to bring him to America, can only excite our sympathy and our lively interest. This beautiful and delicate creature, whose nerves are strung as far above his brothers of the plow and coal-wagon as those of a poet above the coal-wagon's driver, is certainly entitled to special consideration. Some of the necessary precautions to insure his well-being in a strange land are easy: his stall-mate will be transported with him to continue the controversies on the merits of jockeys and the various makes of bridle which have doubtless waxed furious during their residence together; the cat and kittens which walked boldly under his feet will make a small bundle on shipboard and will add a homely touch to the unfamiliar stable; and surely a Secretary of Agriculture will not be so hard-hearted as to deny a petition to bring in Papyrus's own kind of fodder. What is a possible danger to common animals of infection from foot and mouth disease compared to the risk of derangement in the "in'ards" of a prince? Papyrus should have his own fodder, and if he needs a forest preserve to roam in, or Niagara Falls for his watering trough, The Nation, for one, would be unable to say him nay.

Everybody Saves His Face

GREECE and Italy both accept the proposals of the Council of Ambassadors in connection with the murder of Italian members of the Albanian boundary commission, and the tension in Europe relaxes. Italy is satisfied, Greece is satisfied, the League of Nations is satisfied, everybody is satisfied—except perhaps a few people anxious for the future peace of the world and doubtful how it is to be preserved as long as diplomacy remains the mixture of saving one's face, "passing the buck," and trafficking in national advantage which the Greco-Italian incident again reveals it. For that is the predominant impression left by the event: the futility, the dishonesty, the pettiness of diplomacy, and the precariousness of a world that has to depend on that kind of tactics for international peace. For observe what happened:

Italy's "national honor" is outraged because some Italian subjects are killed on foreign soil. In this particular instance the foreign soil happens to be that of Greece, exhausted with foreign war and internal strife, and having title to some Mediterranean territory which would fit nicely into the dream of Italian imperialists of "Mare Nostrum." So Italy makes some rude and objectionable demands upon Greece. Greece knows she is powerless to defend herself, but "national honor" compels her to refuse some of the terms although she knows it may cost a thousand times more than any of them are worth.

Comes then the League of Nations, intended to settle just such disputes, and wants to intervene. But Mussolini, knowing his demands to be unjust, threatens to pick up his blocks and go home; he won't play. France, which has an illegitimate national interest to defend in the Ruhr, sides with him. The Council of the League of Nations is stumped; it temporizes and passes the case "unofficially" to the Council of Ambassadors, a super-legal body, representing only the Allied Powers of the World War.

Meanwhile Mussolini has been visited with the condemnation of pretty much the whole civilized world for his bombardment of Corfu, in which, according to the Near East Relief, sixteen Armenian child refugees were slaughtered. He hesitates and seeks to withdraw if he can save his face. The Council of Ambassadors offers the opportunity. He accepts terms no better than he could have had directly from Greece in the beginning had he been looking for a settlement instead of spoiling for a fight. Greece had refused only three of his seven demands: Italian participation in the inquiry into the murders, the death penalty for the criminals, and an indemnity of 50,000,000 lire within five days. The Council of Ambassadors grants not one of these demands. It provides instead for an inquiry by Allied officials, "exemplary punishment" for the criminals, and merely a deposit of 50,000,000 lire, the actual indemnity to be fixed by the inquiry. (Incidentally no indemnity, no salutes of flags, no salvos of guns, no funeral pomp is provided for the children slain by the ruthless attack upon Corfu. That was not committed by individuals but by a government, and so is not murder but a legitimate gesture in the name of "national honor.")

The League of Nations emerges from the fray a little the worse for wear but still intact. There was a moment when it seemed as if Lord Robert Cecil, supported by the representatives of most of the smaller countries, would compel the League to justify its existence or perish in the attempt. But in the end the selfishness of diplomacy triumphed. The League found a better formula even than

He who fights and runs away
May live to fight another day.

It decided that he who runs away without fighting may get another run for his money. The League goes on, but it is evident that it can be flouted at will.

So much for the diplomacy of the Greco-Italian dispute. But there is a sidelight which reveals even more clearly the trickery and tawdriness of the whole business. About the time that the tension between Italy and Greece was at its height reports emanated from Belgrade that the Jugoslav Government was not disposed to ratify the agreement that its representatives in a mixed commission had accepted in regard to Fiume. Obviously it was the old game. Jugoslavia saw Italy embarrassed with a big adventure and thought the moment propitious to increase her demands. Could one ask for any better commentary on the whole scheme of diplomacy as we know it? It is nothing more than a system of international hold-up or blackmail. Justice does not enter into the adjustment of most questions. It is a problem of finding the weakest spot in your opponent's policy, or an awkward moment in his affairs, and using your knowledge as a bludgeon or a trading-point. But to preserve the system it is necessary that each nation save its face (however dirty), miscalling it "national honor."

And that's what's become of the Greco-Italian dispute. Italy saves its face, Greece saves its face, the League of Nations saves its face—and the old diplomacy goes on.

The Trolley's Battle for Life

THE great strike which has tied up all the trolley cars in northern New Jersey since August 1 has far greater significance than the ordinary struggle for higher wages. What is chiefly involved is whether the New Jersey trolleys shall have competition or not. The great Public Service Corporation, which has for years exercised so malign an influence upon the political life of the State, has made no effort to run cars. Suspending all its service, it attempted to sit back and wait until the motormen and conductors and the officials of the various municipalities came to it hat in hand. That being impossible, the company made a peace offering, which let the cat out of the bag. It proffered higher wages and a lower fare, seven cents, if it were authorized to buy out all jitney buses running on the same streets as the trolleys at a fair valuation to be fixed by arbitration. In other words, it proposed to do away with all competition, and it was able to quote on its side the opinions of three judges who have upheld local authorities in refusing to permit competition with public service corporations by other agencies on the general ground that where the traffic will not support two competitors, but only impoverish both, it is to the public interest that one of these agencies be allowed a monopoly.

To the company's offer a suffering public has returned an emphatic No. A referendum in Elizabeth showed that a trifling per cent of the voters favored the abolition of jitney competition. The Mayor of Jersey City was firm in his opposition; so at this writing the deadlock continues; the battle between jitney-bus and trolley-car goes on. The company insists that it cannot live if the jitneys are permitted to ply, and refuses to attempt to run cars; the Governor of the State threatens to revoke its charter. It is able to sit back because it has other lines of business such as the supplying of light and power, which give it a profitable revenue. But the truth is that the public often prefers the jitneys. They do not ride as smoothly over rough city streets, but they are speedier and more flexible. The jitney has, moreover, always been a one-employee affair, while it is only recently that the one-employee trolley has made its appearance in the larger cities—there are now some to be seen at night in New York City itself. So jitneys have flourished in New Jersey, great sums have been invested in them, and those that have been well managed have made considerable money when the trolleys were losing.

Autobus or trolley—which is to survive? The war played havoc with trolley companies the country over. In New York City they have had to live on a five-cent fare, with the result that the metropolis has possibly the shabbiest, dirtiest, and most neglected trolley cars on this side of the ocean. In rural communities many companies have succumbed. From New London, Connecticut, to the West there are miles and miles of abandoned rails, trolley poles, and wires; the stockholders have lost their entire investment. A company which a few years ago was operating a successful line in the Berkshires has also abandoned its tracks. High costs for labor and materials and the enormous development of the private automobile, as well as the rise of the jitney, have all contributed to the present plight of the trolley.

There has been a tremendous battle raging in New York for a couple of years over Mayor Hylan's effort to run city autobuses, and there has been a great deal of talk about the necessity of building more subways, but nobody to our knowledge has as much as suggested the laying of more rails for additional trolleys. Higher taxes have, of course, added to the difficulties of the trolley companies, and the several cities have made increasingly great demands upon the companies for paving, etc. It is their complaint that the jitneys are not correspondingly taxed, although they are without the huge overhead and maintenance expenditures inseparable from the conduct of a trolley company.

Whatever the facts as to this, the quiet way in which the northern New Jersey public has accepted the enormous inconvenience due to the cessation of the trolleys proves that their sympathies are largely with the jitneys. That makes more pressing the question whether the trolleys can live much longer, even under favorable circumstances. At any rate, the bus has been raised from the dead by the gasoline engine. There was a day when ark-like, high buses on huge wheels rumbled up and down New York City streets with straw on the floor in winter to keep the passengers' feet warm. You poked a nickel at the driver through a little hole in the roof, or dropped it in a box. When those relics of horse transportation went their way nobody dreamed that automotive power would revive them, or rather provide their bus successors. In Connecticut some public service corporations have themselves wisely gone into the motor-bus field; most of the trolley lines have allowed the jitneys to steal a march upon them, precisely as the steam railroads were indifferent to the rise of the paralleling trolleys until the latter had done the railroads irreparable harm, when some of them, like the New Haven, bought up all they could at fancy prices—with disastrous results.

A New Program for Women

IT is not what men do to women, but what they do for them, that keeps women in a state of rebellious subordination. We have long believed that instead of fighting to abolish men's privileges, our militant feminists should fight to abolish their own. And it would be no easy fight, either, for men get more satisfaction out of the sensations of protection than they do out of almost any other form of self-indulgence, and take more pleasure in woman's dependence than in their own independence. If they want really to go to the root of the problem of inequality, the women's organizations of the country should forget matters of mere political importance and draw up a program something like this:

1. No man shall be allowed to give up his seat for a woman unless in like circumstances of age or infirmity he would give it up for a man.
2. With the same proviso, no man shall be allowed to assist women from public conveyances, shove them in at table, rise when they enter rooms, tip his hat, comment on women's personal appearance, or show off.
3. With the same proviso, no man shall be allowed physically to defend, protect, or sustain any woman or resent insults for her or prevent her from fighting her own battles.
4. Absolute equality shall prevail in the matter of paying for (a) carfares and taxi-fares, (b) meals, (c) tickets for amusements, including movies, merry-go-rounds, trips to Europe, etc.
5. No man shall be allowed to support any woman unless she is ill or encumbered with a small infant, and then only until some adequate system of sick and maternity insurance be established.

The program can be almost indefinitely expanded, and should be—down to the most minute details of masculine gallantry and benevolence. We cannot ourselves undertake this task; instead we commend it to the imagination of our feminist readers. But they, and all women who support our program, must understand that the loss of their privileges carries with it the solemn duty of getting on without them. This will probably be easier than most men imagine. In fact, it is hardly more than a delicate humoring of men's passion for protection that makes women appear timid in the face of danger, unwilling to assume the burden of self-support, and innocent of the art of dismounting from street cars, or finding their way about the city, or checking trunks and buying railway tickets. Left to themselves, women may be seen on all sides performing these acts as a matter of course. As soon as they develop sufficient ruthlessness to perform them with similar equanimity in the company of men, letting masculine vanity shrivel and droop as it will, the emancipation of women will have arrived.

One of the first privileges that women must shed is their monopoly of alimony. A Los Angeles judge has taken the proper view of this matter in a recent decision, ordering a married woman to pay her husband $5 a week alimony. The woman was able-bodied and earning a living, the man ill and unable to work. If the time ever comes when judges award alimony solely on these grounds—for both sexes—women may be said to have been lifted out of the humiliating bed of roses on which at present they too complacently repose.

Remaking the Constitution

NO observer of political currents can have failed to notice the revolutionary change that has developed within a decade in the popular attitude toward amending the Federal Constitution. In the early years of this century a feeling had crystallized that no further changes were possible in our organic law. The last of the amendments growing out of the Civil War was adopted in 1870, and a generation thereafter a belief had become general that the Constitution had attained its final and irrevocable form—a belief expressed both by conservatives, who exulted in the stability that this promised to existing institutions, and by progressives, who viewed almost with despair the wall that it raised across the road of political evolution.

Then, quietly, the income-tax amendment was put before the country, and after an interval of almost four years—with no great discussion or propaganda—it was announced, to the surprise of many persons, that the necessary vote of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States had been obtained and the measure was part of our fundamental law. The amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by direct popular vote followed soon after, but it was not until the submission of the prohibition and the woman-suffrage amendments that keen public interest developed or the people came to look upon that kind of legislation as a normal part of their political machinery. Since those proposals, the effort to amend the Constitution has become almost as much a national pastime as baseball or the movies. The last Congress had before it 109 measures to alter the Constitution, more than have been considered by any previous Congress except the Thirty-sixth, which was flooded with proposals intended to avert the Civil War.

This sudden passion to remake our organic law has excited apprehension in some quarters, but the fear is not shared by the legal profession if its attitude is adequately expressed by our former Ambassador to Great Britain, John W. Davis, who in his recent presidential address to the American Bar Association voiced the opinion that to improve and adapt the Constitution was part of the effort to defend and preserve it. Mr. Davis added an observation which we think is the nub of the whole controversy:

> In the making and amending of constitutions, however, it is the people who are entitled to be heard; and it is within reason to demand that in future the ratification of amendments shall be submitted directly to the people of the several States or to legislatures selected after and not before the amendment has been proposed.

The importance of this suggestion cannot be too strongly emphasized. Mr. Davis was referring to the apparently little known fact that the Constitution provides for two methods of submitting proposed amendments for ratification, as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof [the italics are ours], as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

Obviously consideration of proposed amendments by State legislatures is indirect and undemocratic, whereas a convention specially elected for that purpose and no other would constitute a direct popular referendum on the question at issue. In the past, however, the second method has never been selected by Congress. Nor did it matter much until recently. Of all the amendments previous to those on prohibition and woman suffrage it may be said that they had been virtually ratified by public opinion before they were submitted to the State legislatures. Certainly it is true that the principles of the income tax and direct popular election of United States Senators had passed into accepted political philosophy before the amendments to establish them were even proposed by Congress. Therefore the simplest and most economical method of ratification, that by State legislatures, was the best.

It was otherwise with prohibition and woman suffrage. Both were highly controversial questions, still in the crucible of public debate, and no one could say with assurance how a majority of the people felt toward them. Both amendments ought to have gone before specially elected popular conventions in the several States, and it will remain a standing criticism of the democracy of the sponsors of these proposals that they declined this test, insisting upon what they regarded as the (for themselves) safer and easier route of the State legislatures. Whatever the opinion in regard to woman suffrage at the time the amendment was adopted, it seems safe to say that by now, at least, the Nineteenth Amendment has obtained popular approval. As much cannot be said of the Eighteenth Amendment, and one of the greatest obstacles to its practical enforcement is the widespread suspicion (whether founded or not) that prohibition is a minority measure foisted upon the majority during the preoccupation of the war.

Of course it may be objected that even amendment of the Constitution through specially elected conventions does not insure a decision by a majority of the people of the country as a whole, since each State has an equal voice in ratification, regardless of its population. This is a fair criticism, and it has attained enhanced importance in recent times because the variation in the populations of the various States has increased rather than diminished since the Constitution was adopted. Ten of our industrial States contain nearly half of the country's entire population, and it is certainly undemocratic that Nevada, with 77,407 persons, and Wyoming, with 194,402, should have the same influence in amending or preserving our organic law as New York and Pennsylvania, with their ten and eight million inhabitants, respectively. Yet the provision which makes this possible is part of the original idea of our government, which intentionally established a large measure of State sovereignty and aimed to protect minorities against hasty and aggressive action by majority groups. To change this method of amending the Constitution would of itself require an amendment and is probably not on the immediate horizon.

The immediately important issue is that in submitting future amendments of a controversial sort Congress shall be influenced to do it by the democratic method of specially elected conventions. If our Constitution is to be remade, bit by bit, to suit changing ideas, it is essential that we choose a technique which will leave the people with a conviction that the verdicts arrived at are their own.

The Lost Japan[*]

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL

I STOOD on a lonely peak on the downward side of the world. Wind whistled across the steep mountainside. Everywhere outspread, as far as the eye was sovereign, the mighty system of Nikko-zan. Heights and valleys; levels which seemed rolling into a very eternity; incessantly the sound of plunging water. There were white falls. I could see them, though they were a long distance off. I could follow the winding of the slender Daiya-gawa, adventuring far to the eastward. And there was the avenue of the cryptomerias, curving and twining across the world like a mere serpentine pencil line into the haze of the far-away.

The sun threw prodigious shadows over the valley below. They moved with majesty, yet relentlessly, too, like great slow tidal waves, drowning all they immersed. It seemed as though I stood at the very crux of the universe.

Tablelands, valleys, rivers, ridges, trees, and waterfalls—all that a circle-wise sweep of the eye could comprehend—merged with the incorporate, and were given tongue for the time. Yet beyond everything, a stillness which was like Greek carving in marble: more golden than life, profounder than life, and which might not be destroyed by even an Imperial Shogun.

Volcanoes die out slowly. Extinction, even when it comes, is only so-called. Zones of earthquake, eruption, sulphur, thunder, and squawl are zones with endless tales to tell. Tales out of the very center of the earth. Tales, freezing the blood, with nervous beginnings and abrupt terminations. Whispers which sometimes break off as though swift death were dealt. Warnings which may mean nothing. Assurances of protection and peace which may be dread harbingers of disaster. It seems, mysteriously, forever and ever, in regions with an interior turmoil that an essence out of earth rises up and colors the very soul of the man who dwells there.

CONFLAGRATIONS

[Disastrous fires in Japan have been, of course, frequent: congestion, and the peculiar flimsy construction of the houses, invite a rapid spread of flame. Acres may be swept clean in an hour. Tokio and Yokohama have not hitherto been visited by a tragedy comparable to the present. Nevertheless, it is a safe assumption that the same spirit of courage touched upon in this account of a previous conflagration will carry Japan through the most terrible hour of her national life.]

They filled the night with their crimson alarm, and, ere the dawn, had swept acres and acres from a snug and prosperous habitability into dreary, smoking stretches of charred ruin.

So persistent were the visitations of fire that they became a subject for general comment. The newspapers took up the matter. Nearly everyone had something or other to advance—especially the Barbarians. Yet in the face of it all, the Japanese remained perfectly calm and inscrutable.

Perhaps the philosophy liberated by these strenuous occasions partook rather largely of a sense of helplessness; and one may suppose, if one will, that the relative ease with which the Japanese house is negotiated has a little to do with such stoic and even cheerful resignation. It is true, Gentaro need not find himself long roofless. If his dwelling stood within the radius of the disaster zone the fact is of course to be deplored. But it is scarcely a fact to lose very many winks of sleep over; besides, a visitation of the Kami must quite meekly be put up with. In a word, the thing cannot be helped.

No time at all, and Gentaro has a fine new house. All Gentaro's neighbors have fine new houses also. Which leads one directly to speculation concerning the difference between the house of Gentaro and the house of John Smith. It stacks stone over against paper, poises against each other walls of sturdy brick and walls of flimsy plaster. It bids you make your choice between stout timbers and wafer-thin lath. And yet, it becomes a question whether, purely as a business proposition, Gentaro's investment is not sounder than Smith's.

Gentaro builds him a house. It does not, naturally, cost very much. If it burns down (which it probably will, sooner or later) a little scrimping, and possibly a wee bit of mortgage, will evolve a new one quite as good.

But now, Smith. He builds a house and it burns down. The loss is, to put it conservatively, a lot heavier. It will cost correspondingly more to rebuild. Probably Smith has some insurance. Possibly not as much, after the catastrophe, as he could desire. Then there is the personal equation.

When Smith's house burns, most of the family traditions, to say nothing of chairs, tables, sofas, bric-a-brac, and miscellaneous impedimenta, all go up in smoke. And there is a limit to the assuaging force of an even adequate insurance. Smith can hardly restore Junior's framed diploma from the eighth grade or his wife's wedding gown, with its real lace and wistful little sprig of artificial orange bloom, packed carefully away in the attic.

With Gentaro, however, the case is rather different. His house, one must note, is not cluttered with family albums and a prodigality of furnishing. It is simply four walls and some mats. The charm of his house is its emptiness. A Japanese would live in one of our houses only under an extreme compulsion. His eye delights in free space. And, one sees, a new free space easily assumes the prerogative of the free space that has gone up in smoke. Still, there is the dais in the parlor, which must not be overlooked, with its porcelain vase of flowers, its august kakemono full of pictures and script. Yes, even Gentaro is entitled to feel a pang or two.

It was on Friday. The papers were full of fire stories. Three fresh conflagrations overnight had broken out in Tokio alone. Whatever the agency, it was too late to mend matters now. There lay those great smoking plains of ruin, all that was left of four hundred houses in the town's lower quarter. I paid them a visit at noon.

There was no excitement now. The crowd was good-humored. Those who had duties to perform went cheerfully about them, while those who had none chatted about the new disaster and did not seem to get in the way. Men and women plied tirelessly by with buckets. The buckets were full of still smoking debris—or they were empty, on their way back, as the case might be. Where the buckets were being emptied, I don't know. There was an air of mystery about it all. It looked as though this were the way conflagrations were handled in the Empire—carried out rather than put out.

[*] These sketches, written by Mr. Jewell on a recent visit to Japan, describe a lost country. Except for region described in the introductory paragraphs, every section mentioned has been desolated by earthquakes and tidal waves, or by fire.

But there was an infinitely greater marvel than this: something that marked the climax of the entire drama of fire. It was noon. The flames had died out about dawn. Yet already, entirely and securely and trimly hemming in the burned zone, were new board fences, expertly erected—even, it would seem, with a real eye to permanence. But the fences were not all. To have sprung there in so brief an hour might seem an adequate triumph. But that already the fences were densely covered with advertisements made a very profound impression upon me. There was but one decent conclusion to reach. The Nipponese are wonderful!

If, as I came to look more minutely into that vast and largely inscrutable system for which the advertisements stood façade-like, I was to find what seemed flaws and to glimpse ineptitudes the West would hardly be guilty of, these would be, after all, but minor collapses. It was the fences, with their vigorous propaganda sprung since the dawn, which struck the true note of a new Japan.

YOSHIWARA

[This famous and almost unbelievably elaborate segregated district, although far removed from the center of Tokio, appears to have been completely demolished. The Yoshiwara housed thousands of state-licensed shogi, or prostitutes. It was their only home and for the most part they were locked into the houses.]

Like ancient Babylon, I fancied, with its wide, uniform streets and its ornate houses all agleam with lights—a complete little city in itself. There was a spirit abroad in the place which, reflected in the faces of the bright houses as well as their inhabitants, seemed somehow to stir in one a sense of antique voluptuousness.

A place of gaiety and most unbelievable glitter. So huge, so unreal—almost uncanny. The houses were like palaces; three stories, for the most part, and riotously rococo in design and decoration.

Of the traffic or business of the place one was given a glimpse even as one wandered, full of amazement, through the endless glowing streets. It is a traffic or business in souls. You see them on display, all decked in their gayest finery, behind iron bars as you pass. The ground floor is a vast show window. The wares are all there, and one may pick and choose. There is the stock in trade of each brothel-keeper, in a community where every house is a brothel. Like the preliminary performance in front of circus side-shows, the view is altogether gratis. You may gaze to your heart's content. Perhaps your heart will be clutched with pity a little.

Snug in their possession of an official license, all these shogi have to do, while yet the night is young, is sit in a half circle and look pretty. Yes, they are genuine articles—quite bona fide shogi. Yes, they are entitled to look down with a lofty and righteous scorn upon their gipsy jigoku sisters—sisters who have no license.

Each house has a lobby. The manager sits there, like a still, sleek spider. He is ready for you. His goods are at your disposal. All you must do is hand him over your purse. You pay, just as though you were buying theater tickets at the box office.

How much? Oh, I don't just remember. But souls come cheap in a brothel.

She slid back a bit of paper partition, and, with a modest little flourish, bade me enter. Then she made me a tiny courtesy and said: "Chairi-nasai."

Her room was square and rather spacious; I did not count how many mats each way. It was divided in the middle, not by a wall, but by a step running the whole width of the floor. The raised part was where one spread down one's rugs to sleep. There was a wee balcony. From it you looked straight down into the animated street. Near at hand, in the lower end of the room, she had her little parlor and kitchen—heart-breaking affairs, both of them. At one side was a stove, and above this, ranged on little shelves, were the things she used in making tea and serving saké. Beside the stove was a doll's table upon which dainties were spread. There were cushions, quite large and soft. She knelt on one; I, opposite, on the other. The table was between us. And the kettle began to sing.

To reach her I had first mounted a smooth polished stair, and drunk tea in a reception parlor while she was apprised of my approach. The tea was poured by quaint old ladies. Perhaps, in their day of suppleness and beauty, they were yujo too. In the words of Peer Gynt, "time, you know, brings with it many a change" . . .

Poor little deichu no hasu—poor little lotus-in-the-mud! I was a Barbarian; but she had no say in the matter. Her ways were charming and naive. We sipped our tea and talked a little, and she urged sweetmeats upon me. I offered her one of my cigarettes, and we smoked together, she pausing long enough in her dainty ménage de cuisine to accept a light and flash her fine teeth in a smile of thanks.

I could not say that my little lotus-in-the-mud was exactly a beauty. It is written that the face of a shogi must be white as the snows on Futa-ara-Yama. Her eyebrows were very black and her lips were very red. The effect was, upon the whole, a little ghastly. Presently, when she had smoked her cigarette, she took out a tiny pipe from one of the sleeves of her exquisite kimono and began on that.

There were shelves in the parlor as well as in the kitchen. On them she kept her treasures: little fuzzy dogs and pitiful dollies, small fans, diminutive trifles such as children anywhere delight in. I rubbed my eyes and looked again. What were these—relics of a happier time when she had played lightheartedly with other children, never dreaming she would one day carry her toys into such a place as this? Did she still pause to play with them sometimes? A wistful life hers must be, the life of this naive shogi in the Yoshiwara. . . .

We shook hands across the tiny table. The Barbarian humble—almost a bit reverent.

"Good-night, Little Waterfall! Good-night, White Brightness!"

"Mata-irassahai," she murmured. "Please come again."

Outside the stars were shining brightly. The streets were quiet and nearly deserted. From a few casements came the sound of laughter and the strumming of the samisen. Lights shone down through a hundred paper panes.

And I passed by the Willow of Welcome in silence.

SAGAMI BAY

[It has been reported that the coast of Japan, in the vicinity of Yokohama, suffered not alone from earthquake and fire, but also from the inevitable tidal wave. Sagami Bay, Kamahura's resort, is probably today unrecognizable —if, indeed, it has not been altogether swallowed up by the ocean. To the eastward lay Enoshima, popularly known as the "picture island," reported to have disappeared.]

From the protection of a compartment nearly empty, and with rice fields skipping by outside the car window, we watched a sudden downpour of rain. It did not last a great while—only so far as Hodogaya. And then the sun shone, and the rain ceased falling; though the day thereafter was only so-so. It grew hazy and gray. But these qualities in the atmosphere tend to enhance the Japanese picture.

Rice fields. Ever rice fields, with the day growing more and more gray and wistful. All about me the dream of foreign life was deepening. Kamakura at last, and to the Kaihin-in for tiffin. It is claimed for this hostelry that it "is second to none among country hotels of Japan." Of course W. Aoyama, the manager, may be a little inclined to extravagance. Still, the Kaihin-in is undeniably very nice, with its wide, free halls and its general air of spaciousness. Externally its architecture prompted some debate. There was certainly something Elizabethan about it (and fancy anything Elizabethan in Japan!). Yet the effect was subtly turned askew by the introduction of ungraspable Japanese notes.

Through to the coast of Sagami Bay the journey was short and in the sand. It was like a bit of seashore anywhere; and, so thoroughly had the idea taken hold of me that Japan was diminutive—a place of exquisite miniature —that I was wholly unprepared for the bold sweep of coast, with promontories spreading giant arms into the sea, and seeming, just at the first, with their rugged contours, scarcely more within the legitimate picture than the sturdy Elizabethanism of the tavern where we had just eaten.

I stood in the sand. I looked off westward toward the cliffs of Hayama, where the Crown Prince has a villa; eastward toward Inamuragasaki, and the far little island of Enoshima. The sense of miniature left me, never to return in quite its former integrity. After all, here was no geography to be stuffed into your pocket. And the wash of little waves at my feet had back of it all the terrific power of the Pacific, however feebly it might croon and whisper this wan spring afternoon.

Enoshima would be picturesque, only it is too exquisite for so broad an adjective. Steep streets and winding, up and up, with tiny lighted shops brim full of strange and pretty things. It is a little human dream on the edge of a murmuring sea. The place, so foreign and so queer and so boundlessly alluring, seemed stretching shy arms out toward me, smiling a welcome from each corner, through every cordial lighted pane.

A final picture before I turned reluctant steps back down the steep main street. A poor, tiny interior, the principal room in a meager dwelling. I saw a little table spread with tiny pots and dishes. The table was barely a foot high. Its surface was a mere matter of inches. On the floor were mats, and the dais boasted a vase with one drooping flower. So strange, so unintelligible. So lovely in its strangeness. Here was an art in frugality! But lo, the note of sly progress and invasion: over the table blazing in still white glory, an electric light!

I can see the great full disk of the early spring moon, rising up over Nippon. In the west still a wisp of wan yellow sunset. Through the green-tinted sky the moon rises, still lingering, still more yellow than white. The moon tonight is very Japanese. My thoughts stay behind with the friendly people of the little dream city. It is what I see when I turn and peer back over my shoulder that makes the moon Japanese tonight: an island, steep, with rough little streets and quaint houses, with its stalls of curious shells and toys, all agleam with sparkling lights. Some of the houses have occupants visible inside—cheerful silhouettes against the paper panes. And away and away, all up and down the shimmering mainland on the beach the moon silvers the sand and catches into starry points the scattered relics of the sea.

BUDDHA AT KAMAKURA

[There have been news rumors to the effect that not even the gods of Japan were spared by earthquake and fire. At this moment it is impossible for us to know the fate of perhaps the most celebrated religious figure in the Orient. However, since this Buddha is molded in solid bronze of prodigious thickness and weight, it is probable that he still sits there, majestic and unmoved, dominating a plain of utter desolation.]

Once it was a capital, when the Shogunate was young; but now how starved and shrunken a place is Kamakura! I rode through miles of streets in my 'rikisha. They were lined with wretched houses. They were full of scurrying, rough-clad children. And never was I more impressed with the hopeless impermanence of Japanese architecture. Of a once magnificent city there remains now nothing beyond a network of shabby lanes or byways, rather littered than lined with flimsy shacks of paper, light wood, and straw.

And yet—there were temples. And there was the great Daibutsu.

I came upon the superb seated figure from a considerable distance of avenue. Impervious Buddha, molded in the thirteenth century; colossal, silent; symbolizing a cult and expressing a cold scorn of the little squat fishing village of new paper houses. The burdened lids of bronze are never lifted. The free-chiseled nostrils are dilate, as though frozen in the act of breathing a more imperious air. The mouth is curved with eloquence; but the full lips never part. There is a vast repose in the figure. The lofty shoulders are rounded into a trance of deep, perpetual slumber. And yet—a repose such as we know not, evinced by the mystic pose of the hands, the thumbs touching, the fingers curled with a uniformity unattainable in mere flesh and blood.

When Perry stormed the harbor the great bronze Buddha did not stir. Not the lusty political and social and industrial awakening of the nation has sufficed anywise to intrude upon the enormous peace and dreamy sanctity of the Buddha at Kamakura. Not the Russian wars nor the Chinese wars, nor yet the war of wars could win the faintest murmur of response from those lips carved speechless.

If some day those great gold eyes should open—what then? And if those lips should be freed, what would the Buddha say? Would he, too, observe the terrible impermanence of all things Japanese? And would he mind the little kimono-clad urchins tumbling about with ragged familiarity upon the very steps of his altar?

MONTANA: Land of the Copper Collar

By ARTHUR FISHER

SIX months is the longest one may live in Montana without making the decision whether one is "for the Company" or "against the Company." Even some members of that ever-growing stream of automobile pilgrims which enters our hot sage-brush plains from North Dakota's prairies and threads its way westward through the irrigated valley of the Yellowstone are frequently to be found enlisted in one camp or the other before they have zigzagged down from some pass over the Rockies and crept along a narrow ledge above a roaring stream through the canyon into Idaho. The all-pervading and unrelenting nature of the struggle admits of no neutrals. Since the territory's admission to statehood in 1889 the struggle has continued. On the one hand, firmly intrenched, stand the ramifying and interlinked corporate interests centering in the copper industry, now under the leadership of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company. On the other stands the rest of the population which feels it has no stake in the Company's prosperity but suffers from the Company's exploitation of every natural resource and profitable privilege, its avoidance of taxation, and its dominance of the political and educational life of the State. The latter side has the largest potential manpower, although the forces of the Company, including all officers, henchmen, agents, sub-agents, employees who feel their livelihood is dependent upon their public attitude, unaffiliated business interests who sell to the Company and its subsidiaries or who must secure banking credits, and professional men to whom business can be thrown and who desire to rise in the social world—all these total a considerable number. But the opposition is only partially united by farmer and labor organizations led by intermittent crusaders for the democratic idea, frequently by men not entirely devoid of personal political ambition, although even for these the risks and the sacrifices are by no means small. But the Company is led by a single united command of professional soldiers designated in Montana by the term "on the pay roll." The local field office in Butte is popularly known as "The Fourth Floor of the Hennesey Building"—awe-inspiring title. Of the general headquarters back of the lines, ultimate source of all authority, Montanans are never reminded by the local press except when a short news item announces that the private car of Mr. John D. Ryan or Mr. Con Kelly arrived on the Missoula or Great Falls or Butte siding last night—from New York City.

This important event usually occurs just prior to the breaking out of one of the big engagements, the biennial election, when the heavy guns are brought up and the very heavens are torn by the thunder of the campaign artillery and illumined by the fireworks of the press. Money is poured out like water; and men fall by the hundred before the temptations of the bribe-giver or the promise of future preferment, and the fear of the consequences if they do not yield. Frequently the atmosphere is charged to such a point that neighbor hardly dares speak to neighbor, and entire communities are rent in two by passion and fear.

Between the major campaigns ceaseless guerrilla warfare is waged, now and then breaking out in the form of a labor battle in the mining camps, the ambushing of a teacher in the State University, or the shooting in the back of some small business man who talked too independently. In addition a continuous flood of propaganda is poured out by the Company press, which includes nearly every daily paper and most of the weeklies, to maintain morale and win new recruits. Every newcomer to the State is approached through suggestion and advice, through business pressure and social temptation, until the day when he expresses some sentiment which henceforth throws him definitely into one camp or the other. Thereafter he is fair game for the side which he has slighted. And there are no closed seasons. The struggle of the Company to maintain its rule and its privileges against the people's attempts to subject it to democratic control is an economic and political conflict in which the entire social development of the State is inextricably interwoven. But the conflict is more than that. It is the leading sporting event in Montana life.

What the Harvard-Yale game is to intercollegiate football, what the Davis Cup matches are to international tennis, what the Grand National is to the English racing world, the World's Series to baseball, the Mardi Gras to New Orleans, or the Rose Festival to Portland, what a good county court-house trial used to be before the days of the movie, all this and more the battles with the Company are to Montana. They form Montana's epic; an epic told through ten thousand newspaper editorials, ten thousand stump speeches, ten thousand unwritten anecdotes. The universal topic of conversation, it serves as a common interest to unite the people of the State even as at the same time it separates them into two warring camps.

Just now the key to every major operation in the conflict is a short clause in the State constitution, adopted when Montana entered the Union with the purpose of encouraging the mining industry to develop the State, and remaining unchanged since then. This clause provides that mineral lands shall not be assessed for purposes of taxation at a higher value than the price at which the lands were acquired from the Federal Government. As in no case did this amount exceed $5 an acre, and as today many of these holdings in "the richest hill in the world," as Butte proudly boasts, are worth many hundreds of thousands of dollars, it is not difficult to understand why the Company considers expenditure of unmeasured sums for the purpose of winning an election or for "publicity and education" justified by the strictest business considerations.

Just at present the severe agricultural depression through which the State is passing has brought all tax issues to the front and has united the forces demanding a revision of the constitutional provision, so that the Company has succeeded in blocking reform only by the narrowest of margins. Prosperity may disunite the people before the change is effected. But some day, perhaps in five years, perhaps in twenty, this peculiarly crude and obviously discriminatory constitutional privilege is certain to be remedied. It is by no means as certain, however, that this will end the struggle between the people and the Company. The situation in Montana is not the same or as simple as that which formerly existed in most of the Middle Western States in the old days of railway rule. In Montana the railways have long since yielded first place to the Company. They still, of course, employ expert lobbyists, but they attempt no wholesale winning of elections nor purchase of legislatures. In a State with only half a million population, which it takes as long to cross by limited train as it does to go from Chicago to New York, the influence of three transcontinental railway systems is by no means slight. And although there is considerable talk of taking the public into the railways' confidence, there is good reason for suspicion that the bonds of unity of interest reaching out from higher banking circles lead the railways to take the Company more often into its confidence than the public—and to find reasons for siding with the Company in its hottest battles.

These battles will not end so long as the Company remains a combination of all the really profitable privileges and large-scale undertakings in the State. Copper is only the core. Surrounding this core are the largest lumber interests in the State; and the untouched timber resources in the jumble of mountain ranges which cross Montana, reaching their highest point in the Continental Divide, are extensive and are controlled by the Anaconda Company. So also are the principal banks, the largest water-power company, the smelters, coal companies, land companies, public utilities, newspapers, mercantile concerns. Where there is not outright ownership by the Company there is identity of interest and an affiliation which reaches the same end of harmonious and united action. All this is the Company; and the Company is more than this; for it controls in Connecticut the largest American brass company and domestic user of copper, and controls extensive ore deposits in South America and other parts of the world. When the constitutional mining-tax clause is a thing of the past, the struggle will still go on, widened, more complex, more difficult to dramatize, but no less vital to the success of the democratic ideal in our third largest State.

Unlike the situation in some other States, such as Delaware, where the power of the Du Ponts is perhaps even more complete and no less ramifying and carefully protected by every outwork and fortification of control of education and public opinion, the Montana fight is characterized by its openness and the vigor of the champions on either side. There is no supine admission of the hopelessness of the struggle, no silent submission to an insidious all-embracing octopus. In Montana the copper collar shines brazenly forth for all to see. Davids go bravely forth to the blare of trumpets to battle with Goliath. And their whitening bones strew the wayside like the skulls of the bison which once in countless thousands roamed Montana's plains.

The tradition of the open fight began in Montana in the days before the copper industry had been brought under one single dominant control as it is today. The mining interests worked together against the live-stock men and the rest of the State, but within their own ranks there were vigorous clashes in which Irish labor followed Irish mine owner against opposing operators with the traditional loyalty and fighting spirit of the old country clans. The occasion for these sanguinary battles between companies has passed and the Irish blood has been largely replaced by immigrants from Southern Europe but the fighting spirit and much of the Irish leadership lives on. Nor has the fighting spirit failed to draw some sustenance in blood and traditions from districts removed from the mining camps. Montana cherishes her traditions and has developed a form of ancestor worship of which hardly less is heard than in Massachusetts Bay itself—albeit the canvas of Montana's Mayflowers was nailed down on the hoops topping heavy prairie schooners, and her pilgrim fathers bear the locally revered title of "the pioneers." These traditions speak much of vigilantes, of posses, of hangings after quick trials, of cattle wars against homesteaders and sheep men, of Indian wars and Custer's last stand.

The hand-to-hand engagements of most of the battles of today occur in or about the trenches of the Butte hill—that city in size and downtown appearance, perched on a gashed and torn foothill of the Rockies, shafts and drifts and tunnels and ore dumps cropping up between skyscrapers and prosperous downtown clubs and churches, a city, yet no more than "the biggest mining camp in the world." Seen from a distance at night as the limited train starts crawling down from the crest of the Continental Divide it is not unbeautiful, a hill of sparkling lights under a cloudless heaven of stars. At noon with a hot sun beating down from that same cloudless sky upon a jumble of tall buildings and shacks, not a spear of grass or other vegetation in sight, clouds of dust swirling through the streets filled with miners idle through a lay-off, the blacklist, or a preference for bumming to going back into the deep hot mines, it is as forbidding a town as any in the United States. Either in the heat of summer or in the severe cold of the winter it is a town where the thin air of the high altitude stimulates men's nerves and their appetites for the night life of the mining camp; and readily turns the hard-faced restless crowd full of injured, limbless, and diseased men into a mob.

These physical conditions and the nature of the occupation have had none of their raw edges smoothed by the labor policies of the Company. The temperature in the mines is commonly above 100 degrees, and the men's lungs are eaten by the dust and their skin by the drip of the copper-impregnated water on bare, stooping backs. Following periods of tremendous profits, such as that enjoyed during the war, the mines and smelters have been closed without the slightest provision for the mass of the employees or their families. It is not strange that few men undertake the burden of a family which must almost of necessity transform them into abject slaves of the Company. The intemperance, instability, and violence of the Butte labor movement and its publications—foremost of these the sometimes brilliant and always radical Butte Bulletin—are the natural result of conditions in Butte and of the labor policies of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company and the personnel of local managers selected by absentee ownership.

But Butte is not Montana, nor are even the smelter towns of Anaconda and Great Falls and other lesser mining districts Montana in any other sense than that they caricature the ultimate product of the Montana conflict, the symbol of which is the body of the union organizer Frank Little hanging from a railway trestle, or the office of the Butte Daily Bulletin in an abandoned church guarded by a "red guard" of rifles through a night of battle, a night, be it said, not entirely unwelcomed by the members of that "red guard," the fiery writers of the Bulletin, and the officers of the local O.B.U. and I.W.W.

Up to the outbreak of the World War, and even for a year or so thereafter, almost anyone in Montana would have risked the prophecy that another decade would see agriculture the dominant interest of the State. It seemed certain that a new weight was to be thrown into the scales of battle and that the Company would soon have to yield to the new battalions arriving by the trainload, lured by the vivid recruiting literature and enticements of the railroads and the State immigration service—lawyers, mechanics, teachers, factory hands, clerks, doctors, farmers from the Middle West, none familiar with the peculiar problems either of dry-farming or irrigation, all hoping to find their Eldorado. For a few years those who first turned the sparse desert sod in this new migration prospered. They enjoyed better than normal rainfall and better than normal prices for wheat. Then followed four years in which the rainfall dropped from the 16-inch average to 8 inches, and the price of wheat was cut more than in half. Many a dry-land home miles from water or tree knew actual hunger, and all knew privation, disappointment, and misery as they saw green fields wither and die before the hot winds. And even the irrigated districts saw all profits disappear before low prices, high transportation rates, and burdensome charges for water.

So today these acres on the margin of profitable cultivation which are Montana—on the margin both because of scanty rainfall and the cost of placing water on the land—are being foreclosed and abandoned wholesale. In some dry counties of Montana 80 per cent of the farm lands have reverted to the State for failure to pay taxes, and bank after bank has closed its doors. Pressure of population is almost certain to make the irrigated districts ultimately profitable for those who can hang on, or for their successors. In the meantime the Federal irrigation service will have to wait for repayment of its expenditure and even for interest on the money. But whether the great dry-land area of Montana will ever be more than a siren temptress to the uninformed—one good crop year and two failures—remains to be seen. The possibilities of science in soil culture and in plant breeding are beyond prediction; western Nebraska and Kansas, with hardly more rainfall than eastern Montana's average, were once abandoned by the first disillusioned victims of the railway settlers' bureaus. Science in marketing methods and cooperative distributing may also do much. But in the meantime the once-tilled lands of dry Montana are going back to the cattle range, a range scarred and ruined for years to come by the turning of the natural sod.

"Montana's real trouble," said an old rancher to me, "is that her graveyards aren't big enough." He explained that he was not advocating a general resort to the hangings of vigilante days, nor even waiting until a new generation came on the scene, but that more Montanans must come to look upon the State as their permanent home and final resting place. From the first pioneers who washed their fortunes out of the gold placers, with hydraulic pressure turning pleasant hillsides into desolate wastes of boulders, nearly all who have come to Montana have looked forward to the day when they would have accumulated sufficient funds to permit them to live out the remainder of their days in southern California, Florida, or New York. Now and then a big brown stone house is erected on the hilly streets of Helena as a monument to financial success; but the owners are usually found living elsewhere. And the mansion of Montana's richest citizen, who still keeps his local legal residence (whether out of sentiment or to avoid income and inheritance taxes is not known), stands on Fifth Avenue, New York City—the "home" of ex-Senator W. A. Clark.

Unlike such a State as Colorado, where the tourist population almost exceeds the resident population and is one of the State's leading industries, Montana has done little to promote tourist traffic. Glacier Park is the advertising product of one railway and the plaything of the son of a great railway pioneer who opened up northern Montana, James J. Hill. It has hardly yet repaid interest on the investment, though its striking beauty may before long do so. Other sections of Montana's mountains are hardly less attractive; yet they have not been capitalized to the extent even of the establishment of the "dude ranches" of Wyoming. Nevertheless every Montana rancher feels he has neglected his family if he is unable to find some period between planting or irrigating or harvesting or fall plowing when he can pack them all into a car or wagon, leave the stock in charge of relatives or neighbors, and take a camping, fishing, or hunting trip in the hills.

Indeed, a symbol of Montana second only to the copper collar itself is that of a fisherman whipping a trout stream. No single subject in the legislature evokes the statewide attention, the enthusiasm, or the intelligent interest of a debate on the biennial revision of the fish and game laws. But even in this fact the coils of the Anaconda may be seen. Native Montanans who can sell nothing directly to the tourist trade are not enthusiastic about poachers on their fishing preserves; and it is expensive to build roads which will stand up under the wheels of the endless chain of cars which goes trekking across the State piled high and bulging sidewise with tents, extra cans of oil and gas, blanket rolls, and every sort of paraphernalia, the dust hardly given time to settle before it is stirred up by the Ford behind. Although rain may turn this dust into a quagmire of mud—the famous gumbo—in the course of a few moments' shower, and all automobile traffic of whatever nature be forced to suspend, no trip or family picnic is ever spoiled for a native Montanan by rain. In the midst of the hardest downpour or the most prolonged drizzle, whether in town or country, he greets everyone he meets with a broad smile.

"Fine weather, isn't it?" he beams.

"Another million-dollar shower," is the response.

"If we get one more like this the crop is made."

Doubtless even the officials of the Company welcome a real Montana soaker, and watch with satisfaction the official rain gauge creep upwards, in the critical time of year, above the 8-inch minimum to the 16-inch average, even though they never find time to say so in the midst of their praises of the benefits to the State of A.C.M. development and their denunciations as dangerous radicals of every member of farmer organization, labor union, or independent political group. For in a personal way the Company's officialdom and subordinates are for the most part "good fellows" who have risen from the ranks; something of the free and easy ways of the mining camp or the open range still clinging to them; and Montana is still too young and too near to the frontier to have yet produced that worst of human products, snobbery and the glowering resentment of a long-submerged people. In Montana one may still speak to a man as a man —before drilling him or his business or his reputation full of holes.

JOHN L. LEWIS of the United Mine Workers. One of the most attractive gladiators now operating. The face of a giant, crossed from time to time by the convulsed delighted laugh of a child. Smites the rock of the power of the anthracite operators with the economic force of the organization of the miners; and if an increase in wages flows out, then he knows that the water is there and that the operators can afford an increase. If it does not flow out, then he knows that the operators cannot afford it. He seems justly to regard this method as much more reliable than any statistical method. Was once inclined to quail and quake under thunderstorms from enjoining judges. Is now so used to them that he seems barely able to hear them. Has realized thoroughly that arguments get you nowhere in this world unless you have some sort of force behind them. The operators have the force of the ownership of property. He has the force of the leadership of miners who will unanimously stop working. The essence of his diplomacy is to prove that they will. He knows thoroughly that if people got the idea that his army would not march, then they would not care whether the members of his army were able to feed their children or not. He never saw anybody's wages raised by statistics and public opinion and nothing else. He principally provides something else. He occasionally takes his army out for practice maneuvers, just as Roosevelt sent the fleet around the world. It is part of negotiations. Toward the reporters he is as realistic as toward the operators. He knows that the reporters have to make "prognostications" and he does his best to help them to "prognosticate" accurately. He does his best to help them to go right on what is going to happen. He spreads his vast bulk on a settee in a hotel lobby and stretches his massive legs out comfortably before him and clutches a cigar with his broad jaws and tosses back his helmet of thick flowing hair and settles down with the reporters about him to confer on tomorrow's story. He helps them to be right on the actual facts of the actual news developments in that story, and his "propaganda" slides automatically along on the back of his accurate and considerate and appreciated contributions to the reporters' professional needs. Able, formidable, likable.

Samuel D. Warriner, chief representative of the operators. Slender, sophisticated, deeply informed, sharply acute. Plays the role of rapier to Lewis's role of ax. Wears a Phi Beta Kappa key. Is very gentle-mannered. Recoils from rough language—and also from rough stories. Often looks worried. Tries to make Lewis look worried—and feel worried—about the future of the anthracite industry under competition from the bituminous industry. Fails. Lewis and his lieutenants refuse absolutely to do any worrying about it. They profess to believe that bituminous coal cannot oust anthracite coal. Warriner and his lieutenants profess to believe that it can. They know in fact that it sometimes does; because they sometimes lose customers to their bituminous rivals. They profess to believe that they will lose more customers if the price of anthracite keeps going up. They genuinely and sincerely worry on that point, and also on many other points having to do with the conduct of the anthracite industry. The miners' representatives, not being responsible for the conduct of the industry, leave all the worrying to the operators. They realistically content themselves with getting as much as they can for the miners out of the income of the anthracite industry after the operators have done all the worrying connected with the acquiring of that income. Ownership, management, responsibility, and worry for the operators! No part in ownership, no part in management, no admission to responsibility, and no collapse into worry for the miners! Main problem of the industry: to trap the miners into worrying for the industry! Warriner gets paler and more and more worried as the negotiations go forward. Has no personal hostility, however, to Lewis. Likes him. Has no vendetta, either, against the miners' union. Has no plan and no wish to destroy the union. Would like, as he sees it, to persuade the union to be more reasonable. Accepts the existence of the union and hopes for what he would regard as its reformation. Has not thought of any way of accomplishing that reformation. Lights a new cigarette and despairingly demands Lewis's attention for the facts of the anthracite "margin of profit" and for the facts as to what the full eleven demands of the miners would do to that "margin." Gets from Lewis principally an inquiry as to whether $4.08—which is the daily eight-hour wage of some few anthracite mine-workers—is a proper wage. Returns to his hotel and nestles into a chair and gently asks the reporters if Lewis has made a statement to them today. He has. What is it? "If the operators do not yield to our just demands, we will give them the soundest thrashing they have ever had." Warriner smiles very faintly. "Lewis offers force, and I offer arbitration." We write it down. "With force threatened by the miners, and with arbitration offered by the operators, don't you think that the case of the operators ought to be strong with the public?" "Yes," says a reporter, "but your case was just as strong in nineteen twenty-two, and the public gave you no help then." "True enough," says Warriner, and adds: "Now I'll tell you what happened in the conference today from my standpoint." Tells it quietly, clearly, candidly, charmingly. A clean man and a clever man, struggling in a period when his industry has ceased to be autocratic in its relations with labor but has not yet developed any systematic substitute for autocracy.

Swashbucklers. Mr. Searles and Mr. Lyman. Press agents for the two sides. Commonly called swashbucklers ever since the United States Coal Commission said that press agents make everything worse by getting out "swashbuckling" statements. Mr. Searles swashbuckles for the miners, while swapping stories with the reporters jovially. Mr. Lyman swashbuckles for the operators, while swapping stories with the reporters gravely. In the absence of the reporters, Mr. Searles and Mr. Lyman swashbuckle by swapping stories with each other happily and contentedly.

The reporters. They worry less even than Lewis. Lewis at least wants the miners to win. The reporters do not care which side wins. It could be proved in court that the reports of the coal conferences at Atlantic City and at Harrisburg by the reporters for the principal newspapers and for the principal news associations were overwhelmingly as destitute of bias as the reports by the photographers.

Gifford Pinchot. Tense, athletic. High-minded. Rather high-handed. "Mens conscia recti. Integer vitae scelerisque purus." All that kind of thing. Uses his fists. Hits the miners and hits the operators. Also hits the railroads and hits the wholesale and retail coal dealers. Wins a victory all covered with blood.

Calvin Coolidge. Tranquil. Only President in recent years who has failed to see the Republic falling if there was a strike. Also only President in recent years who has failed to say "wicked! wicked!" to striking miners. Stands behind presidential desk, pale, slight, hardy, agile, and determined to keep all troubles securely on the other side of the desk at Harrisburg, Cleveland, Seattle, and other proper places for them. For him, a tranquil White House, if he can get it, and a people saying: "What? Change things in the White House? We haven't heard of any trouble there."

Mussolini Fails

By GIOVANNI GIGLIO

[It has been suggested by more than one observer that Mussolini's arrogant gesture of imperialist defiance, which may yet set Europe ablaze with war, was due in large part to internal difficulties; that in order to preserve the Fascist domination of the country, the Italian people needed the distraction as well as the uniting influence of an affair of honor and a common enemy. One of the important internal conflicts, in which Mussolini's commands and threats have failed of their effect, is described in this article, written before the Greek incident had given the Italian dictator his opportunity to defy the world.]

Rome, August 20

THE class-struggle that Mussolini was to abolish together with its Socialist propagandists and followers, is just becoming more evident in Italy through one of its most characteristic episodes: the big contest between shipowners and seamen. Mussolini has smashed the Italian Socialist Party, but the splinters of the smashed mirror have remained together with the economic and social contrasts that they continue to reflect in Italian life. The Fascist violence which has been able to suppress, imprison, banish, and even to force humiliating capitulations upon the Italian labor movement, has not been able to suppress as yet, nor to banish or cause to capitulate, the struggle between capital and labor. This struggle has remained, and it is growing ever more violent in its attacks against labor. The present fight between shipowners and seamen is a most instructive instance. The most striking feature of this contest, in its present stage, is the personal intervention of Mussolini for the purpose of compelling both parties to come to an agreement, which has turned out, owing to the stubbornness of the shipowners, an utter failure for Mussolini himself. In view of the importance of this failure in Italy's present political situation, it may be useful to recapitulate some of the earlier phases of the struggle.

In the summer of 1919 Captain Giulietti, the secretary of the Italian Seamen's Federation, founded with the money of the federation the Garibaldi Shipping Cooperative Society. The funds were rather scanty, a few million lire altogether, but Captain Giulietti had a rather genial plan whereby he intended to increase them rapidly. The Garibaldi Cooperative Society asked for and obtained from the Italian state the hiring of some tank steamers which had belonged to the Germans. With little expense these tank steamers were by the new owners changed into cargo boats. The Seamen's Federation supplied the crews, and the first ship to start the new traffic of the Garibaldi was the Amilcare Cipriani, which sailed to Odessa with a cargo of victuals and medicals, the first contribution made by Italian workers to Soviet Russia. After that the Garibaldi kept in active service its fleet, consisting of five ships. Thus Captain Giulietti achieved his first object: to insure for the union a powerful weapon of financial resistance, to be able with better success to continue the struggle with the shipowners for an increase of wages. In fact, the federation succeeded some time later in securing most favorable working agreements and reasonably high wages. If some shipowner resisted, Giulietti could easily boycott him, causing the crews of the boycotted master to sail on the ships of the union's cooperative. The first to feel the advantages of such a situation were the seamen themselves, and very willingly they lodged in the treasury of their own cooperative 50 per cent of their increased wages. Thus, during the past three years, the Garibaldi has become one of the richest cooperative societies of this country. The shipowners perceived the trick when it was too late for them to mend matters and when the Garibaldi had already established itself upon a sound financial basis. But the shipowners did not lose courage, and they charged the Garibaldi with "permanently defrauding the state" and induced Parliament to order three public investigations of the management of the Garibaldi. The results of all the three were, however, favorable to the seamen's cooperative. These investigations were made under Nitti's and Giolitti's cabinets. When Signor Facta succeeded Signor Giolitti the political situation in Italy was rather difficult for Giulietti and the Socialist Party. The shipowners took advantage of this, and their next step was to bring about a trial of Giulietti and his assistants for their past "criminal" conduct. Giulietti, to avoid imprisonment, was obliged to take shelter abroad. By this time Fascism was in its most violent stage. As Giulietti could not be punished personally, the Fascisti attacked his residence at San Marino. The headquarters of the Seamen's Federation and the Garibaldi at Genoa were not attacked owing to the fact that Giulietti had put them, during his banishment, under the protection and leadership of Commander Rizzo, a great hero of the Italian war. But the shipowners clamored for the destruction of both the federation and the Garibaldi, and for this purpose they built up a Fascist seamen's organization. To encourage the desertion of the seamen from Giulietti's union they allowed the Fascist organization all the economic advantages enjoyed by the federation.

Matters had grown very hard for the federation and the Garibaldi. Then Giulietti played his last card: the card of despair, which was to save his union and at the same time lose him the good opinion of the international labor movement. Giulietti had rendered great services to D'Annunzio when the latter embarked upon his Fiume adventure. Giulietti had brought to D'Annunzio, at Fiume, a ship laden with six thousand tons of rifles and explosives, and D'Annunzio, as a testimonial of his thankfulness, had joined Giulietti's union as an honorary member. Upon being asked to come to the assistance of the union, D'Annunzio became the arbitrator in the contest between the Fascisti and Giulietti. After long and difficult negotiations, D'Annunzio forced the Fascisti and the shipowners to give up their struggle against the federation and the Garibaldi. Thus a compromise was signed according to which the Fascist seamen's organization was dissolved and incorporated in the federation, which was acknowledged as the sole legitimate seamen's union in Italy, and Giulietti was confirmed in his post as secretary. There remained, however, a real task to perform: to persuade the defeated shipowners to come to an agreement with their terrible foe Giulietti. D'Annunzio tried to overcome this difficulty, and a short time ago invited the shipowners to meet him in his Cargnacco villa. There D'Annunzio submitted to them a compromise of pacification that he himself had written and called the "pactum sine nomini." The compromise draft was submitted to Mussolini, who, as the Government chief, approved it, promising to use all his influence with the shipowners so that they might sign it. The negotiations were finally transferred to Rome and conducted under the personal direction of Mussolini. But in spite of this the peace treaty was not signed. At the eleventh hour the shipowners put hesitation behind them and stated that they could not for sincerity's sake make peace with Giulietti, and that in any case they could never sign a compromise which in their opinion would bind them, hands and feet, before foreign competition.

So the matter stands today. The shipowners have made up their mind to resist the pressure of the Government; and the Fascist press, to defend the prestige of the Dictator, threatens and screams against the shipowners. The latter are now charged by the Fascisti with being the allies of international plutocracy, which is alleged to be conspiring against the Fascist regime. Mussolini, on the other hand, is credited with being determined to break the shipowners' resistance, even to the point of enforcing D'Annunzio's "pactum sine nomini" by royal decree. This is the first time that Mussolini has been so stubbornly resisted by the masters of capital, since the latter helped him to seize power. It is difficult to make any forecast as to the final issue of this contest. My impression is that Mussolini has even now enough strength to face and control this revolt by the shipowners, but it is doubtful whether the Fascist method of dealing with difficulties is the best way to bring the complicated problems of Italian political and economic life to a satisfactory solution.

German Youth and the Pagan Gods

By BRENT ALLINSON

THERE was something almost theatrical about the light of this June evening reflected from a great, floating bank of pink clouds upon the faces and bodies of a hundred youths and girls in colorful outing costume, seated or standing in little groups here and there among the trees. Talking and chaffing together, and calling and chasing about, they made ready a picnic supper from baskets and bundles which they had carried on a long tramp to this sylvan solitude.

It had been hot and oppressive in Berlin, and on the train journey to Zossen, in the Mark, the third- and fourth-class compartments were so crowded with excursionists bound for the country to tramp and sleep out of doors for the week-end that even the platforms were packed and the boys had actually ridden on the roofs of the cars. But here in the woods it was deliciously cool, and after a supper of sandwiches and a little fruit and a drink of water we were ready to tramp on through the gathering dusk to the appointed spot in the deep forest, where the ceremony was to take place. For this was the night of the summer solstice when pagan gods were abroad, and the Wandervögel, the Youth Movement of all Berlin, in their several troops and Ortsgruppen were foregathering for their solemn midsummer festival. I was pleasantly conscious of being one of the very few Ausländer invited to participate in the ritual. What did it all mean, these pagan journeyings and preparations, this romantic stirring of the youth of Germany? What were the aims of this strange movement—part pagan, part religious, part national, part international in spirit? What in the world were the boys and girls going to do tonight, out here in the pine forests of the Mark? As we moved on down a darkening road our column was hailed by another, and another, converging from the east and southeast, composed of somewhat younger boys dressed, like my own comrades of the hour, in short leather, or imitation leather, knickers, embroidered in colored thread and exposing brown knees and sturdy legs, stout shoes, sometimes with knitted stockings, colored and plain, shirts of cotton or flannel, open at the throat, and occasionally a felt cap adorned with a goose-quill or a partridge feather. The girls wore dark skirts of flowered calico, pretty but serviceable, and sometimes bright aprons; and many wore their hair in parallel braids over their shoulders. The costume was like that of some rude and rustic Dolly Varden without a hat, called everywhere in Germany Dirndlkleid. Altogether a picturesque outfit.

On the long tramp through the cool night air the boys sang many an old "Lied" of war and love and longing which they had heard among the peasants on their rambles through the countryside, and which they had revised and published to all Germany and learned by heart.

When, at length, it had fallen quite dark we came to a clearing, a kind of sandy hollow, where everybody sat down and waited. Presently from the dark woods beyond we heard the faint sound of singing. As the sound increased I realized that it was a part-song in which perhaps ten voices of men and women participated, a sad song, and very beautiful. There was no accompaniment, no other sound. The singing continued for ten minutes, seemed to come nearer, and then died away into silence. Then a torch was planted on the uneven sand, and from the wood behind came forth costumed figures who began to speak and to perform a play—an allegorical play in which a princess is led by her curiosity to wander far afield until she is lost and, after many wanderings as an unhappy captive among the gnomes of some demi-world, is rescued by her own faith and the devotion of her kindred and the sacrifice of her lover.

The play over, the sound of singing summoned us to continue our pilgrimage through the dark forest and we followed the guiding voices for perhaps half an hour until we came suddenly to a great open space, a grassy field between two forests, culminating in a rounded hill. Walking over the field and up the slopes of the hill with the crowd, I noticed that the leaders were already setting fire to a great pile of wood and pine branches on the summit in the center of the clearing. As the flames kindled and mounted about the central, supporting tree to a height of ten or fifteen feet, the whole field was illuminated to the edges of the wood which completely inclosed it, and the great crowd of young people, their faces and arms crimsoned by the light, formed themselves into two huge circles and, linking hands, began to move and to run in opposite directions about the blazing fire.

At length everybody sat down in a great ring and watched the fire until it burned down, talking quietly in little groups. Then an older man, one of the leaders, dressed like the rest, stepped to the fire and called for silence. "Bitte, Ruhe!" he said, and held up his hand. After a moment he began to speak, quietly, in a clear, cultivated voice. He apostrophized the fire as the symbol of all life and strength. He spoke of youth, of its freshness and its hope and its purity. He spoke then of the dead, of the lost comrades from every troop—in some cases more than half of the members of the troop—who had given the last, full measure of devotion to the fatherland, and who slept now forever in the fields of France. He called for reconsecration of the spirit to the immortal ideals of strength and righteousness and fortitude and patience which through the centuries the German folk had ever tried to maintain. And out there in the forest under the summer sky crowded with stars, by that dying altar fire in the midst of hundreds of young people, solemn, silent, despairing, or hoping against hope, and listening intently to the quivering voice of that man, I felt that I had never before been witness of a public ceremony half so moving. I felt merged suddenly in the spiritual community of another people, felt initiated into another life. It was a moment of transcendent vision and emotion which comes so rarely in a man's lifetime that, when it does, he never forgets it.

In the earliest hours of morning the young people about the bonfire on the crest of the secluded field slipped away into the woods to sleep on the sand, pillowed by leaves and pine-tufts or folded in a blanket. Most of the boys marched away through the woods and down a long white road under a drooping moon to some abandoned army barracks three miles or more away, where they made themselves as comfortable as possible on straw mattresses in "double-deck" iron bunks to awaken, tired but refreshed, for the athletic games planned for the morning.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter feared that the romance of the road was gone forever. In all ages wayfaring had been wildly or quaintly adventurous. He thought of the Canterbury Pilgrims, the wandering players of Scarron, the traveling journeymen of the Rhine and Elbe, the stage-coach jaunts of all his friends in Dickens and elsewhere and despaired. In a high-powered car a friend had driven the Drifter to Boston. There were "road-hogs" and "speed-hounds" and traffic-cops of varying temper. The road-houses were spuriously elegant; the food was conventional and dear. No, said the Drifter to himself, it is all over. Maybe the hoboes have a little fun and adventure—maybe.

* * * * *

HE knows better now. You must stay away from National Highways and Boston Roads. Somewhere in northern Vermont, with the Adirondacks towering beautifully on one side and the Green Mountains no less beautiful on the other, the Drifter drove a Ford sedan over a white, sandy ribbon of road that wound in wild gyrations in and out of the hills, took breathless turns and unexpected leaps, and finally writhed its way into the tiny capital of Montpelier where under a Lilliputian gilded dome the State senate still deliberates by the light of gas lamps. The Ford sedan, named Susie, hopped and skidded in the sand and flew over rather than on the road. Inns were advertised at crossings in faded lettering. But when you got to them there was nothing to be had. A long, unshaven, lanky individual would gaze lugubriously at the Drifter and his friend. He had pork. "What else?" the Drifter asked. "Pork," the hirsute gentleman replied with dull finality. Here hunting dinner was high adventure. You lost your way. From afar you spied a sign. "Ah," you exclaimed and stepped on the gas so that poor Susie quaked and trembled. You came up to the sign. It said: "Pigs for Sale."

* * * * *

SUCH incidents smack of the roads of old. And if there are neither pilgrims nor wandering minstrels, there are "hitch-hikers." Suddenly, some hundreds of feet in front of Susie, who was northward bound, appeared three figures who were at once lithe and stalwart. The Drifter stopped and beheld three young women—dusty Valkyries in gray knickers and sweaters and thick stockings, stout-booted, with small, gay caps, knapsacks and cameras slung over shoulders shapely even under the rough, knitted stuff. They wanted a lift. They were New York girls on a vacation determined to beg lifts—that is the method of the "hitch-hiker"—to Montreal. One of them was communicative. "We've had good luck. If our luck holds we'll be hitching into Montreal tonight in time to catch a ferry for Quebec. No, we don't often sleep at inns. Usually there's a Y where we can stop nights. There are thousands of us, of course. Hitch-hiking is always done by twos and threes. We know girls who have hitched all the way to California. There's little trouble and most motorists are pretty good to us. It's a great way of seeing the country." The roads full of "hitch-hikers"! Unless human nature has changed —it hasn't of course—there begins here a life of the road full of romantic and gallant and even brilliant adventure. Even a humble Ford car can rattle through fabled mountains and meet dryads on the way. THE DRIFTER

Jim Crowism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In regard to the article headed Jim Crow in Texas by William Pickens [issue of August 15], while I have no desire to go into any discussion of the law as it now exists in Texas with regard to the races, I do wish to state that all of our trains provide two compartments for our colored patrons, one that may be used as a smoking compartment and the other for women and men not desiring to smoke. Separate toilets for both sexes are provided on all of our trains.

I have long recognized that the colored people pay fare the same as any other passengers, and should receive the same attention and courteous treatment as is accorded other patrons. We provide for the feeding of colored patrons of our line in dining-cars, either before or after white patrons have been served. Not only do we feel that we must comply with the laws as they exist, but we also take into consideration the human element and endeavor to give all of our patrons the attention, service, and accommodations they are entitled to.

Dallas, Texas, August 15 W. G. Crush,
Passenger Traffic Manager, Missouri-Kansas-Texas Railroad Company

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The policy of the Missouri Pacific Railroad in the handling of colored traffic is necessarily in adherence to the regulations prescribed by the State and Federal governments, over the creation of which the railroad had no control whatever. The segregation of races has been built upon a traditionally peculiar racial situation which naturally exists in many of the Southern States, and, in my opinion, it is vitally essential to the peace and welfare of the territory involved.

A reading of Mr. Pickens's article impresses me with a tendency to exaggeration.

St. Louis, August 13 C. L. Stone,
Passenger Traffic Manager, Missouri Pacific Railroad Company

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am a Southerner by adoption, having been born in a Western State and moving to Florida when quite a lad, but I have lived in the North for the last six or eight years. This gives me, I hope, sufficiently varied experience to understand the different and conflicting viewpoints expressed.

I can only say this, just now, that one who has not lived the better part of a lifetime in the South, or made sufficient study and had sufficient actual personal experience to understand the problems of the Southerner, cannot intelligently discuss the question. Whether Pickens will admit it or not, the facts are that the average Southern Negro is never an equal of a white man. He is either his subordinate or superior.

Chicago, August 16 B. M. Jewell,
President, Railway Employees' Department, American Federation of Labor

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I heartily agree with every fact contained in Mr. Pickens's article, so far as personal observation is concerned, and with his conclusion that the whole system is in violation of the spirit of our Constitution and the genius of our institutions, as we so proudly express them. This, together with our whole treatment of the colored race, if not quickly righted, will bring the train of disaster upon us as a people which always follows in the wake of national falsehood and injustice.

Electricity for Railroads

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In commenting on Stuart Chase's Junk, in your issue of August 1, Alice Stone Blackwell says: "The experts know that the best way to run a railroad is by electricity, not by steam, yet our railroads are not electrified and are not likely to be for a good while."

I wonder who the experts are who know that the best way to run a railroad (regardless of whether it is urban or rural or of dense or light traffic) is by electricity. Is it not possible that Miss Blackwell has fallen into line with many other liberals and accepted with little or no investigation the statements of the propagandists for electrification? Or maybe she has read uncritically that portion of the Superpower Survey report dealing with railroads. J. G. Lyne

A Federal Divorce Law

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the August 8 issue of The Nation I was much interested in an editorial upon the prospective Federal marriage and divorce legislation which is now before Congress. It was particularly interesting because of the impression it gave that your editorial writer had not fully digested the content of the amendment to the Constitution and the national uniform marriage and divorce law which Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas and Representative L. W. Fairfield of Indiana introduced into both houses of Congress last January. If he had done so I am sure that he would not have declared that the result of Federal action would be "to fasten a medieval system of divorce on every State and every individual." Furthermore, I do not think that he would have stated: "'As bad as the worst' seems to be the motto of the Federal divorce-law advocate."

As I had something to do with the campaign of education as to the necessity for such a law and conferred with Mrs. Edward Franklin White, who drafted it, I cannot allow these statements to go unchallenged. A law which permits divorce on the grounds of infidelity, physical and mental cruelty, desertion, failure to provide, commission of a crime, and incurable insanity can scarcely be called medieval; nor can it be said to be "as bad as the worst."

As the divorce laws of this country are now, they are either a farce or a tragedy, and a desire of putting an end to the tragic or farcical situation, as the case may be, prompted the General Federation of Women's Clubs and other organizations to take up the campaign for a national uniform marriage and divorce law.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution is not at all tied up to the law itself; and should the amendment be realized and the marriage bill as drawn by Mrs. Edward Franklin White passed, if it were to be found inadequate by succeeding generations, under the empowering amendment, another law could be passed to take its place.

I agree with the writer of your editorial that the Scandinavian law is ideal, but it would be quite impossible to pass such a law in this country at this time. There is no danger of Mrs. White's law "fettering or ruining the happiness of a helpless minority." As I have said, everybody who is entitled to a divorce will be able to get one, and it will prevent men and women from going into States not their own and getting divorces without the knowledge of their wives or husbands. Also it will preclude the present confusing situation by which a man and woman may be legally divorced in one State and not in another; by which they may be legally married a second time in one State and bigamists in another; by which a child by a second marriage may be legitimate in one State and illegitimate in another.

Santayana's Philosophy

Scepticism and Animal Faith. By George Santayana. Charles Scribner and Sons. $3.50.

THIS book is particularly recommended to those—and they are many—who persist in regarding Mr. Santayana as a litterateur rather than as a philosopher. If by metaphysics we mean a sustained and consistent inquiry into the ultimate nature of Being, then no more thoroughly metaphysical book has been written in this generation. Nor will this statement frighten off those who know from previous experience that it is impossible for Mr. Santayana to touch any subject, however abstruse, without transmuting it into poetry and music. In this, his latest volume, he attempts to clear up for himself and his readers those bases and presumptions of his thought which have lain half implied and half expressed in his "Life of Reason." The latter might be described as a comprehensive philosophy of life from the standpoint of the empirical and naturalistic observer. "Scepticism and Animal Faith" seeks to reveal the sources of the instinctive compulsions which make those very beliefs in nature and experience inescapable.

Mr. Santayana's inquiry centers around the question, "How far may skepticism be carried, and what is it impossible not to disbelieve?" He is not engaged in the facile foolery of proving that chairs and tables do not really exist, that the coffee we drink and the music we hear, the landscapes we love and the people we hate are illusions. He is seriously trying to find out what in honest human experience we can and must assume, what it is that logic compels us to question and that life forces us to believe.

A good part of the book, therefore, though perhaps the least original and interesting part, is spent in clearing away the ground, in pruning away gratuitous presumptions and vulnerable faiths. One may with all the logical sanction in the world, as Santayana shows, doubt self-consciousness, change, the very fact of existence itself. "For all an ultimate skepticism may show, . . . there may be no facts at all, and perhaps nothing has ever existed."

Upon the ruins created by a candid, and somewhat playful, logic, Santayana proceeds to erect a surer scaffolding of indubitable realms of Being. Descartes begins with the Ego. This twentieth-century skeptic, having seen the wreck of many young solipsisms, is too wary for that. He begins to rebuild his world with nothing less fragile than the purely logical character of essences or terms. These cannot be doubted, for no claim is made that they exist. One may doubt all the various furniture of experience, and call every item in it a deceit and an illusion. But those illusions have each of them a precise logical quality and character, and each of those phantoms and deceits is its own indefeasible self. "Each will appear in its own world and shining by its own light, however brief may be my glimpse of it; no date will be written upon it; no frame of full or empty time will shut it in; nothing in it will be addressed to me or suggestive of any spectator. It will seem in no world, an incident in no experience. The quality of it will have ceased to exist. It will be an Essence."

The only irrefragable element in Being, therefore, turns out to be this eternal infinitude of reinlogisch characters, like the letters of an alphabet that may never have been used to make words. It includes all that is known and thought and apprehended, and an infinitude that never has been and never will be. "It is the sum of mentionable objects, of terms about which and in which something might be said." This realm of logical characters is certainly not much to start with. It is certainly not the full-bodied nature which we commonly have to deal with and which we commonly have to believe. But this infinite and inalienable realm of essence, thin though it be, is alone immune to the shatterings of logic. For it is implied in the very logic by which that shattering is performed, and in that shattering itself. If life requires for its continuance further belief, that is a matter of vital adventure, of human risk, of animal faith.

It is this career and complication of animal faith that Santayana traces. The bodiless being of Essence may involve no other existence nor any belief. But the intuition or beholding of essences does. "By the mere consideration of the way in which essence presents itself, we snatch from the jaws of skepticism one more belief, belief in discourse or in mind thinking." And granting the existence of mind, we are led sensibly and certainly to belief in experience, in substance, in nature, in other minds, and in the implied and eternal being of truth. And not least are we led to believe in the reality of spirit, that fine flame, generated by nature, expressive of it, and incarnate in it, the flame by the light of which nature is valued and understood.

There is nothing logically compulsive about any of these beliefs. We are welcome to doubt all the observable and malleable features of the world in which we go on living. They are simply instinctive presumptions, animal faiths. They may well be suspect in refinements of speculation, and condemned from the standpoint of a free and poetic spirit as trivial, accidental, and absurd. But this so solid world by which we live, and in the understanding of which we control our fortunes, is not solely a matter for refined dialectic or sportive poetry. It is a construction of an adventurous instinct and a risking reason. In the bright clarity of our logic we may doubt everything save the logical forms of the phantoms which we doubt. But in the very act of living we go further. We take long leaps in the interests of that animal psyche out of which doubt springs, and of which reason and spirit are the instruments and the fruit.

No one at all interested in current winds of doctrine can afford to miss this adroit and honest book. It comes to grips with the deeper issues over the surfaces of which contemporary thought has been glibly skipping. Santayana has provided an Introduction to Realms of Being that probes to the depths of reality without forsaking the light of common sense.

Romantic Ireland

Castle Conquer. By Padraic Colum. Macmillan. $2.

THOSE who have followed the work of Padraic Colum from its beginnings in "Wild Earth" have always looked forward to the novel which one felt he could and would write. That anticipation is not disappointed in "Castle Conquer." In spite of the years that have slipped by since he gave us that first book of poems, since "The Land," "The Fiddler's House," and "Thomas Muskerry" established him in an unassailable position in the Irish Theater, this book betrays nothing of the changed life, the varied activities that have since been his. "Castle Conquer" belongs to the period preceding his hegira, and the perfume of Irish earth clings about it as unmistakably as it breathed out of every page of his early plays and poems. This prose has all the simple charm, the fresh tang that made the poetry of "Wild Earth" irresistible.

The story centers about Francis Gillick, the returned student from the Irish College in Salamanca, who has given up his studies for the priesthood and come to settle down among his own people. As a "spoilt priest" he is too greatly handicapped in the immediate circle of his own friends and relatives, so he goes to another part of the country to work on the farm of Honor Paralon, whose daughters Oona and Brighid befriend him, until inevitably both girls are more deeply involved by their affections than mere friendship. It is to Brighid that Francis pledges himself, and their love is drawn by the author in scenes of a whispered and passionate intensity which contrast curiously with the mawkish sentimentality, on the one hand, and the pathological realism, on the other, which are an essential feature of the average novel of today. In the relations of these two there is a tender shyness, charmingly rendered, which is as characteristic, in its way, as the brutalities of James Joyce, who, too, has described one phase of the Irish attitude in matters of sex. But Colum shows how this idyll, like so many other normal human impulses, is overshadowed in Ireland by the figure of Kathleen ni Houlihan, into whose mouth W. B. Yeats has put words that are not forgotten: "It is hard service they take that help me. Many that are red-cheeked now will be pale-cheeked; many that have been free to walk the hills and the bogs and the rushes will be sent to walk hard streets in far countries . . . and for all that they will think they are well paid."

In such service Francis Gillick gradually finds himself enrolled and in his adventures we watch the beginning of the Land War in Ireland, and see how inevitably the land and the nation became identical in the eyes of many generations. The evolution of Gillick, the pressure of innumerable little circumstances which transform him into a "rebel" in the eyes of the British authorities, and finally, the accusation which lands him in jail —all these elements inseparable from the life of the period are skilfully woven into Mr. Colum's narrative. His great skill lies in the unostentatious way in which he develops this main theme, without ever insisting upon it. This is not just the story of a young Irishman's revolt, for the individual hero is merely the focusing-point of an era and a people. "Castle Conquer" is a true microcosm of Irish country life, the Ascendancy minority, harsh, always insecure and baffled, with its servitors drawn from the people, and then the people themselves, with their own life and traditions, sustained by a definite hope and the will to survive. Padraic Colum knows the Irish countryside, its physical aspects at all seasons, the customs and beliefs of the peasantry, the striking characters who may be found by those who know how to seek them: Michael Philabeen, the weaver; Honor Paralon, young Maelshaughlinn, whose adventure at the fair is one of the most perfect incidents in the book, equaled only by the weaver's story of how he took to the roads with young Owen Paralon—vignettes complete in themselves and having the authentic ring of folk stories.

One lays down a book of this caliber with a regret for all the cheap sentimentalities and trivial humor which make up the usual popular novel of Irish life, against which one wishes to set a "Castle Conquer," or such a work as Seumas O'Kelly's "The Weaver's Grave." The manner of the telling is a delight in itself, a style full of poetry and tenderness and color, touched with laughter which does not depend upon verbal caricature, that great stock in trade of the manufacturers of "Irish" fiction for export. With his first novel Padraic Colum has enhanced the distinction of his already valuable contribution to Anglo-Irish literature, his work as poet and dramatist.

Modern Histories of German Literature

Die Deutsche Literatur Unserer Zeit. Von Kurt Martens. Munich: Rösl & Cie.

Deutsche Literaturgeschichte in Einer Stunde. Von Klabund. Leipzig: Dürr & Weber.

Das Grosse Bestiarium der Modernen Literatur. Von Franz Blei. Berlin: Ernst Rowohlt.

Das Bücher-Dekameron. Von Kasimir Edschmid. Berlin: Erich Reiss.

OF the making of German histories of German literature there is no end. The Germans themselves are conscious of their weakness for systematic presentations of literature; they seem to be ashamed of it, too, but they cannot quit the habit. It was a German who characterized the English as practical, the French as artistic, and the Germans as critical. This is their only excuse: they cannot help it; it is the nature of the beast. And so they continue to excuse themselves and to write histories of German literature. To be sure, there still are scholars who are unashamed. Several "regular" histories of German literature have appeared recently, without excuse, by the well-known scholars Oskar Walzel, Friedrich von der Leyen, Adolf Bartels, Karl Borinski, O. E. Lessing, Julius Wiegand. But more interesting, although not so "solid," are the histories written by non-professional historians. And the serious student of German literature may perhaps take it as a hopeful sign that these historians are all men of letters, writers of ability and imagination. The student will remember that the chief reason for the existence of such an excellent literature of translations in the German language is that men with literary ability have not hesitated to translate the masterpieces of other languages. The German unlike the English man of letters considers translating a good school of training for the young writer; the English writer considers it as hack work. The result is that we have, for example, no Goethe in English. If Shelley had not restricted himself to just two scenes of Faust, we probably should have an English Goethe comparable to the German version of Shakespeare. It was this different attitude that gave to the Germans such translators as Schlegel, Tieck, Schiller, Voss, Fulda, Stefan George, Rilke, Morgenstern, and many others. If literary men are now writing histories of literature, may we not hope for interesting results?

The "literary" historian likes to emphasize the non-academic character and purpose of his writing; he is writing not for the student but for the Volk, the people. Kurt Martens, whom the academic historian calls the novelist of the decadence, says in the preface of his "Contemporary German Literature" that he does not wish to write for the professional student of literature but for all classes of the "folk." He does succeed in his combination of anthology and history in giving samples, characterizations, and classifications of about three hundred modern German writers in a manner to attract many different tastes to many different dishes. It is even a good book for academic use. The reviewer knows of at least one class in an American college that used it as a textbook.

Klabund, whose bourgeois name is Alfred Henschke, is placed by Martens among the "Expressionists and related poets of radical progress." He writes lyrical poems and novels, and now he has written a "History of German Literature in One Hour." (He has also written a "History of Universal Literature in One Hour.") It took the reviewer two hours to travel, under the guidance of Klabund, from the "Wessobrunner Prayer," 800 A.D., to Friedrich Schnack's lyrical poetry, 1922 A.D.,—and it was a pleasant trip. The perspective, the most difficult thing in a brief history, is well preserved by Klabund. He devotes seven pages to Goethe, three-fourths of a page to Hauptmann, and four lines to himself. His style is picturesque, clear, and terse. Men and movements are characterized in a language that is the poet's rather than the scholar's—a language rich in metaphors. It is a beautiful brief presentation of a large subject to the general reader, but it is still more valuable and interesting to one who is already fairly well posted. It would probably shock the poet-author to know this: he has written an excellent and interesting final review for the college student majoring in German.

Those who are most ashamed deny their activity by camouflaging their products under fantastic forms. Franz Blei, whose collected works in six volumes comprise the drama, novel, sketches, essays, and criticisms, directly denies the existence of a German literature with a history. He says: "The less money a man has, the more does he speak of money. No people speaks so much in so many histories of literature of its own literature as the German." And still he cannot help writing about it. He writes a descriptive catalogue, which he calls "The Great Bestiary of Modern Literature." In the manner of the medieval bestiaries and by the methods of comparative physiognomy he tries to determine the character and traits of human, "all too human," writers by comparing them with related (?) forms in the animal kingdom. He is most interested in the German species, but he also examines the foreigner. Indeed, he is more charitable toward the foreign writer than toward the native; the former occur more often not as animals but as students of animals, as "zoölogists." Shaw, to be sure, is a zoölogist who likes also to transform himself into a "zoön," in this case, a goat. Whitman, indeed is "the Great Pan, who has never died, because immortal, he alone among the gods." "Das Wilde," "das Hamsun," "das Chesterton" are foreign beasts: beasts of prey, amphibia, and freaks. Blei's ironical analogies are often illuminating, as the caricature is illuminating, but a consistent and continuous argument by analogy is sure to lose its point. Some of his beasts are, to say the least, very unlike anything in the biology of animal or of man.

Kasimir Edschmid (Eduard Schmidt), novelist and lyricist of the most extremely modern school and author of the authoritative book on Expressionism, has written a "Decameron of Books." The author and a traveling Dutch gentleman are snowbound in a tavern in Tirol. They must pass ten days in their own company, and, to while away the time, the author talks to the Dutchman about literature and the background of literature. Really, the only thing in common with Boccaccio's work is the number ten, ten days of exile; there is nothing of the very human element of the Italian "Decamerone." Edschmid says what he has to say about German literature in the form of one-sided chats—witty, bitter, disconnected. He does not give us a systematic or reasoned exposition—cleverness as contrasted with scholarliness does not permit of such procedure. This raconteur skips from Boccaccio to the German revolution; from the snow-covered landscape to European languages; from the Minnesingers to Expressionism. While answering the question, What is German? he skips delightfully from Goethe to Wedekind. His revolutionary attitude is expressed in the judgment that Goethe and Hauptmann are not as German as Dehmel and Wedekind. Visions that recall the snow scene in Kaiser's "From Morn to Midnight"; grotesque sketches, for example, The Ski's Laughter, serve as introductions to his discussions of literature. The manner and the thought are expressionistic. Brilliancy there is, but, as with so many of the modern radicals, it is a very flickering light with none of the steady radiance of the best stylists. Edschmid, of course, also takes a fling at the histories of German literature. They are paper wagons drawn by wretched lean nags. Von der Leyen's recent work is a heavy truck loaded with machine-guns. Even Martens, whom we have put at the head of our list, finds no grace in the eyes of his contemporary; his history is a "picture-book wagon." In order to preserve the figure of the vehicle, Edschmid's own book might be classified as a rather unsteady "joy-ride machine."

A Human Collection

Teodoro the Sage. By Luigi Lucatelli. Translated by Morris Bishop. Boni and Liveright. $2.

BECAUSE of the absence of comic strips the influence of European newspapers upon the speech and habits of the masses may not be as great as that of their American contemporaries, but thoughtful folk read their editorials, their critiques, and their special articles with greater benefit and appreciation. The reason for that is to be found not in the character of European newspaper readers but in the personnel of the correspondents and staff writers. We, on this side of the Atlantic, may boast of certain eminent men of letters who began their careers as journalists, only to desert the profession when fame singled them out for notice, but the columns of many European newspapers still reflect the views of writers whom cultured opinion has raised to a high place.

Such a writer was Luigi Lucatelli, the famous Italian journalist, who served his paper, Il Secolo of Milan, until his death from fever in 1915 while reporting the clash of nations upon the Western front. Because of the nature of his duties as correspondent and leader writer a great part of his writings could not be saved from the oblivion of newsprint. The collection of fragments that has been published under the title "Teodoro the Sage" represents the best and most durable portions of his journalistic work. In using the word "fragment" I do not wish to imply that these bits of writing seem to have been torn from longer compositions; rather do they appear to be fragments of life itself, clear and startling glimpses of an onrushing panorama that bewilders most observers by the complexity of its vistas and the vertiginous speed of its passing. Lucatelli's heart throbs with pity for the human beings whose ineffectual gropings he describes, but his eyes are not blurred by sentimental tears. He sees straight and has the courage and power to tell what he sees. The man who sees straight and thinks clearly when considering humanity is called a cynic. If the right word bite instead of caress, the writer is a misanthrope and pessimist. Lucatelli's pen pictures of humanity are not flattering or comforting but they resemble the original to a high degree.

The book takes its name from the character Teodoro Nasica, who is the protagonist in the first group of sketches that are included in this volume. Teodoro the Sage is a blundering, bespectacled little brother of Zarathustra. He brings the manner of the philosophy lecture room to his intercourse with the man in the street. The casual reader will find these contacts highly amusing unless he chance to be stirred to thought. Lucatelli's humor is two-edged; it slits our mouths into grins while it slashes our foibles to ribbons. When Teodoro philosophizes himself to death other characters appear upon the scene. Petty clerks, tradesmen, beggars, thieves, prostitutes, artists, rich wives, politicians—as human a collection as ever walked through the pages of a long novel, here caught in a gesture and pictured in vivid flashes. Morris Bishop is the translator and has performed his duty with intelligent artistry.

So much for the clarity of Lucatelli's vision and the vigor of his pen; what remains is the guile of the artist. In his triple distillation of the liquor of life the last drop will give a fillip to a palate that is dulled by literary craft. The author's so-called "surprise endings" seem, when we have reached them, as natural as the tang to the lees of the bottle, and as exhilarating to our brain—if our palates do not continue to crave the sweetish concoctions of the romanticists. ## Is There a Cure?

The Malady of Europe. By M. E. Ravage. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THE malady of Europe, as Mr. Ravage sees it, has two pathogenic causes. The primary cause originates in the remnants of the "bellum omnium contra omnes" ideology of the Middle Age, institutionalized in the European foreign offices whose spirit pervades all the doings of present-day Europe. It is this foreign-office spirit which tears asunder the economical and political unity of the European continent by antagonizing nations, classes, and religions, with no other aim in view than to demonstrate the necessity of the existence of the antiquated system of the foreign offices. The secondary cause of the malady of Europe is the mental depression of the patient who is living in an atmosphere of artificially manufactured hatred and distrust. Nature made Europe a single country, Mr. Ravage asserts, with a multitude of provinces, languages, and creeds. Unless the command of nature is complied with and Europe becomes "international minded" there is no hope for the recovery of its civilization. To make the term "international minded" more palatable for the American reader the author repeatedly declares that "internationalism" is the European equivalent of Americanism.

When analyzing the symptoms of the malady the author finds that although Prussian militarism had been defeated the Prussian idea had triumphed gloriously. He does not see any distinction between reparation and indemnity in the sense the former term is used in the Treaty of Versailles, which he considers as the greatest crime of the age. He insists that as long as the Treaty of Versailles is not abrogated Germany is absolved from her obligations which she assumed under duress. Mr. Ravage is pessimistic about the League of Nations as it is constituted today and avers that if it is given real power it would be nothing short of a centralized system of foreign offices possessing the accumulated vices of its members. He is strongly convinced that the present League of Nations supplied with "teeth" would be the greatest menace to the surviving democratic forces of the world.

The cure the author suggests is the internationalization of Europe, as the ultimate end. As first step in this direction he urges the abrogation of the Treaty of Versailles. He blames France for misappropriating the funds collected as reparations by subsidizing the Russian counter-revolutionary armies instead of building up her devastated northern territories. He offers as a solution of the reparation problem the taking over by America of the reparation burden. For the amount that will be found as just reparation treasury bonds should be issued "under the guaranty of the United States Government." With this money America should rebuild the devastated areas with the advice and cooperation of the states concerned. The reparation debt should be apportioned by a new peace conference. The amounts America advances for reparation purposes should be considered as a loan. But, by all means, America, who wields a tremendous influence in the council of the nations, has to step in and to help disentangle the European imbroglio unless she wants to be entangled in a new world complication.

The dramatic treatment of the topic and the axiomatic remarks of the author furnish the reader with easily digestible aphorisms which while recapitulating the essence of a whole chapter in a few words have another advantage in that they can be stored up easily in the memory for future reference.

General Dawes and the Budget

The First Year of the Budget of the United States. By Charles G. Dawes. Harper and Brothers. $6.

TO any man not too deeply impressed with the importance of being earnest that profane and redoubtable military and civic hero General Charles G. Dawes is bound to be an "amoosin' cuss," and his treatise on "The First Year of the Budget of the United States" an entertaining book. The doughty General kept a diary during that fateful year in Washington, wherein he set down for the edification of God and his own soul a record of the things he did and some of the things he thought he thought. Here are two hundred and forty pages of these modest notes, showing how I got up one morning after sleeping in General Pershing's apartment, saved eight millions immediately after breakfast, lunched with our great President, then coordinated another ten millions out of existence, and rounded out a perfect day by showing a reluctant Congress how I was going to save three hundred and fifty millions this year.

These notes are followed by one hundred and sixty pages of detailed economies effected by the Government under my direction, beginning with oil and washers, of a fair value of 25 cents and a forced sale value of 11 cents, transferred by the Emergency Fleet Corporation to the Public Printer at an estimated (not to say demonstrated) saving of 14 cents to Uncle Sam, who unfortunately is no longer rich enough to give us all a farm. The General's admiration of our late President brays from every page: "I have sometimes been fearful that I would find something disappointing eventually about the present Chief Executive as a business chief. I am now convinced that I will never find anything even as to detail." A scarcely less fulsome tribute to Mrs. Harding is set down "in the hope that she, with others, may some time read this." Now manifestly a passage like this was intended to see the light only after the writer had been gathered to his fathers. We are therefore forced to a horrid suspicion that the reputable firm of Harper & Brothers have stolen this manuscript from the safe deposit vaults of the Central Trust Company under the very eye of the watchful General and his subordinates. Or was it General Dawes, after all, and not Chauncey Depew, who dedicated his own statue at Peekskill a few years since? Making all deductions, the book has value as a record of activities rather than ideas, as a picture of an active business man of a type unfortunately not too rare, and as a collection of documents, largely unimportant ones, dealing with the installation of a more business-like system of handling the affairs of the Federal Government, but chiefly as a first-aid package to those who have forgotten how to smile in a world of income taxes and business-political "bunk."

A Successful American

A Man from Maine. By Edward W. Bok. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

NOT satisfied with exploiting his own success, Edward W. Bok has now given to the world the life story of his father-in-law, Cyrus H. K. Curtis. That is, he has strung together as his fancy dictated, events and anecdotes concerning the life of the president of the Curtis Publishing Company with slight regard for sequence or importance. "A Man from Maine" has no more value as a biography than Judge Gary's account of a steel strike would have as history. And, saying nothing of what Mr. Bok has omitted, the facts he does give frequently contradict statements he makes and tries to prove. For instance, Mr. Bok says all young men have as good a chance to make millions as Mr. Curtis had, because Mr. Curtis had no special advantages such as having money lent him. True, no one lent him money until he needed it badly; in fact, had to have it to succeed, but then F. Wayland Ayer came to the rescue with two hundred thousand dollars' credit with his own firm and guaranteed Mr. Curtis's notes for one hundred thousand with his paper makers. Three hundred thousand dollars' credit would almost seem to be a special advantage. But what can one expect? "A Man from Maine" is family and company propaganda with some Pollyanna philosophizing thrown in.

EUGENIA KETTERLINUS

A Romantic View of China

The Charm of the Middle Kingdom. By James Reid Marsh. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THE writer of "The Charm of the Middle Kingdom" resided for some two years in China as a member of staff of the Chinese Customs Service. He began his acquaintance with China at Mukden in Manchuria, was later transferred to Tientsin, and still later to the frontier of Yunnan in the extreme south. He relates his impressions and experiences in a vivid and charming manner. He has caught into words many characteristic aspects of the daily panorama of Chinese life. His descriptions of things seen with the eye are exceedingly good. His language at times rises to sheer poetry. But his very gifts of colorful writing and artistic imagination seem to betray him into a "fine writing" not always in place. With regard to his personal share in his experiences he is an incorrigible dramatizer. One comes therefore to feel that considerable fancy has become attached to fact in the accounts of his romantic passages with Chinese ladies, the constant possibility of which seems to be the chief element in the charm which the Middle Kingdom holds for the author. The inevitableness with which he perceives that every Chinese lady he meets is beautiful, nimble of intellect beyond her male countryman, and withal is coquetting out of the corner of her eye with him, leads to the suspicion that the writer has something like a complex on the question.

Plainly the author's poetic temperament is not balanced by an instinct for facts. He gives marvelous new translations of the meanings of the well-known names, Fengtien (Mukden), Tientsin, and Peking, none of which can be borne out by the dictionary significance of the ideograms. The samples of Chinese conversation in his narrative contain egregious blunders. These indications by the wayside, together with the absence of a nice modesty with reference to what he tells of his own doings or the display of his rapidly acquired knowledge of things Chinese, warn us not to look to this work for authoritative information.

Rather let the reader take up this book as he would a novel with generous local color, or the sketches of a traveler, and he will not be disappointed. Indeed in all likelihood he will be captivated by its interest. Further, the book abounds in excellent photographic illustrations. But when he is done, by all odds let him turn to such a book as that of Bertrand Russell by which he can be helped into a real understanding of China.

Books in Brief

Rider's New York City. A guide-book for travelers with 13 maps and 20 plans. Compiled under the general editorship of Fremont Rider by Frederic Taber Cooper and others. Second edition. Henry Holt and Company. $4.50.

Rider's Washington. A guide-book for travelers with 3 maps and 22 plans. Compiled under the general editorship of Fremont Rider by Frederic Taber Cooper. Henry Holt and Company. $2.75.

Rider's Bermuda. A guide-book for travelers with 4 maps. Compiled under the general editorship of Fremont Rider by Frederic Taber Cooper. Henry Holt and Company. $1.90.

These are authoritative, well-arranged compendiums for the ambitious "sightseer," offering suggested itineraries based on many facts and figures, telling him where to eat, sleep, shop, or have a sudden toothache treated. Without puffs, pictures, or padding, these guides aim to give every scrap of information which the tourist may legitimately require. The returned traveler of taciturn tendencies may save himself breath by silently handing out a Rider to the "Now-Tell-Us-About-Its" who crowd around. For those who refuse to "sight-see" as a matter of principle but are historically minded, a Rider's Guide is still treasure trove with its fascinating glimpses of Old New York, of the Brooklyn Heights of Walt Whitman and Henry Ward Beecher, of the "embryo Capital" satirized by Tom Moore, and of the islands, now famous but long of evil repute, where was born the first child of the John Rolfe who later married Pocahontas. The present edition of the first volume has been practically rewritten since the first edition put out before the war, the second volume is offered as a "sincere tribute to the capital city" of the land; while the third volume is a labor of love prepared by an editor who hopes one day to retreat to Bermuda.

Things Remembered. Arthur Sherburne Hardy. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Arthur Sherburne Hardy's "Things Remembered" will probably be read aloud next winter in many placid reading clubs and sewing circles. It is the perfect volume of reminiscences for such a purpose, abounding with anecdotes, with trivialities concerning monarchs and diplomats, and humor too often bordering on the facetious. If Mr. Hardy remembers as the highlights of his years in Persia, Greece, Rumania, Switzerland, and Spain his Persian chef's ideographic accounts, the golf course at Athens, or the splendors of the Palacio Real, he is perhaps only giving us a subtle comment on the general insignificance of the minor diplomatic career.

De Pachmann Solves Some Enigmas

LET me confess it now. I called on De Pachmann for an interview, and he gave me a piano lesson. I also, I am ashamed to say, went to laugh, and I stayed, instead, to weep. But De Pachmann played to me, and the beauty he evoked was too rare and, perhaps, too sudden for my nerves. At any rate, he saw, and understood, and played even more divinely, if possible. But I am beginning at the end instead of at the introduction. That, to be perfectly accurate, took place in the hotel corridor outside the master's door and across, not a cup of tea, but a well-filled laundry bag and its custodian, the latter a very earnest and excited little colored girl. After De Pachmann had, with equal earnestness and excitement, disposed of both, I expected him to rush back and do what I had heard him do at a concert many years ago in the South. Justly indignant with an audience which had insisted upon more encores when the concert was virtually ended, he had turned angrily to the Negro janitor who had had to reopen the piano, and had said to him, quite loudly: "I play this piece for you." Whereupon, he had sat down at the keyboard, and dashed off Chopin's famous "Etude on the Black Keys"!

Nothing so enchanting occurred this time, however. He sat down again, it is true, but in a comfortable chair, not on a stool; and mopping his brow, heaved a long and weary sigh. He was, indeed, very tired, for he had been giving interviews all afternoon. And as I had come at the tail end of the day, I found that to gain his interest I had to expand on the relative merits of The Nation and those of Musical America, the Musical Digest, and all the other worthy journals that had already preceded me in the quest.

As luck would have it, I happened upon the one topic that is of vital interest to him at present, and that is his "new method." The accounts I had read of it had left me somewhat puzzled. For in them he claimed to have discovered a wonderful new way of playing with stiff wrists, which, while it necessitated an entire revision of fingering, left him practically untired at the end of a long program. Now, it is perfectly possible that a virtuoso's wrists, no matter how great their suppleness, may gradually stiffen as he approaches his seventies. But it is not at all possible for anyone, young or old, to play through a program with absolutely stiff wrists and not feel the physical strain. And so, to clear up the mystery, I asked De Pachmann. His distress was painful to see.

"They don't understand me, they don't understand me," he cried in despair. "Of course I do not play with stiff wrists. I hold my arms and hands so"—stretching his arms at right angles, with his hands on a straight line with the wrists, "never so"—turning in his wrists—"for then there is immediately a strain. But my wrists are loose and my arms. Feel them." I did so, and found it was true. They both had all the relaxation essential to perfect tone.

Then he went on. "There are five things to remember about my method: (1) Health to the body; (2) lack of fatigue; (3) straight wrists; (4) beauty of hands; (5) tranquillity. No moving about so and so"—twisting his body about as many pianists do.

"See how beautiful the hands are this way," he continued, "how Raphaelesque. A great French artist told me mine were even more beautiful than Raphael's. Of course, I have had to refinger everything. But the tone! I tell you, before, I was like a student. I was like all the other pianists. I had a nervous tone. Only Liszt did not have a nervous tone. That was because he had long arms."

"Is that why," I interrupted, "you do not like other pianists?"

"Yes," he said, "and I do not like their banging. They try to make the piano sound like an orchestra. And the piano is not an orchestra, it is a piano forte." "Why," I asked, "do you think Godowsky is the greatest living composer?" "Because his counterpoint surpasses that of Bach. And, besides, he has discovered an entirely new harmony, and a new technic that is wonderful." And then he spoke touchingly of his friend, who recently underwent an operation. "I really came over here more to see him than to play. I tell you, he is the greatest living composer. Nobody really knows him. You see, there are six great composers, different in style, of course, but equal in genius. They are: Schubert, Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Brahms, and—Godowsky. Behind them, you may put, though just for a few things, Liszt and Grieg."

"But what about Bach?" I protested.

"Bach," he replied, "Bach, Mozart, and Weber should never be played in concert. They are too old. They are for students, not for the public. They are for people like us"—striking his breast. "And, besides," he went on, "Bach did not write for our piano. I know that Liszt and Busoni and others have arranged some of his things. But how dare anyone arrange Bach or Beethoven? How dare anyone change even one note?"

"Then all the others between Brahms and Godowsky, like Debussy, for instance"—

"Trash," he answered, emphatically. "Mr. What-you-call-him, Debussy? Trash, I tell you, trash."

He lives in a world of his own, and knows no other worlds; no other composers than those who serve his needs; no other pianists than those who fulfil his ideals. Worshiping beauty in the absolute, he compromises with no one, not even with himself. "If I should make an ugly tone," he said, "I would shut down the piano." Knowing no other law than that of genius, he does not hesitate to pass sentence on himself. "Before I discovered my new method," he declared, "I played like a pig. Now I play like a god."

And he proved it to me. "Come over to the piano," he called, "and I will show you what I do. First, I play scales, like this, for sixteen minutes every morning. No one can play scales as I do." And no one can! "Then," he continued, "I practice Godowsky, for technic. Every morning I give to Godowsky. Perhaps, too, a few octave studies of Joseffy for legato." Here his fingers melted in some octaves. "And now, listen to this, and look at my fingers. My tone is like velvet, hein? My fingering is colossal, nicht wahr? Liszt told me that he wished Chopin could hear me, I played his Nocturnes so beautifully. He also told me that not even Rubinstein had as beautiful a tone as I. Liszt was then seventy-three, about my age now," he added parenthetically, "and I was a boy of thirty-four or five. But I can play some of his things now even better than he could." And again, to prove his words, De Pachmann played me some Chopin, a few snatches of Liszt, and a shred of a Brahms waltz. And it was then I was guilty of tears. Not the first time, I admit, at a piano lesson, but the first time for such a cause. The action of his fingers, both from a mechanical and mental standpoint, would have been "colossal" for anyone whose fingers had always been trained that way for the music. But to adapt one's entire repertoire, as De Pachmann has done, to a new fingering and technic, after playing another way for sixty years, is an unparalelled tour de force in virtuosity. In spite of his ripe maturity, his medium of expression has grown more exquisite with his art. HENRIETTA STRAUS

Jog-Trot

MR. A. H. WOODS, I am informed, picked up trunkfuls of German manuscripts. One such manuscript by Arnold and Bach he evidently handed to Mr. John Emerson and Miss Anita Loos who made an American play of it and did their job with considerable deftness, good sense, and feeling for character. Satire of Kleinstädterei has always been a solid basis of German comedy of the lower order. And since this is the exact counterpart of the Main Street motive, the adapters could quite naturally transfer the scene to Toledo, Ohio. The result is "The Whole Town's Talking" (Bijou Theater), a sufficiently diverting little play full of concrete and natural touches that illustrate well a thoroughly explored section of the American scene and are embodied with easy skill in the acting of James Bradbury and Grant Mitchell. This account of the play is true enough and just enough. Yet it is necessary to add that the whole thing is utterly unimportant, that it has been done a thousand times from China to Peru, and leaves you with the final impression that, as there is nothing so thrilling as art that has distinction and power, so there is nothing so negligible as art that has neither.

Hence I hoped for something refreshing from the producing managership of Mr. Walter Hampden. I thought it possible, moreover, that Mr. A. E. Thomas might some day again try to write a play of serious workmanship whether in a realistic or a romantic mood. "The Jolly Roger" (National Theater) is not such a play. It is the dramatization of a second-rate kind of "Treasure Island" with a semi-Elizabethan and, finally, semi-Shavian love interest thrown in. The make-up of the pirates is superb. But it remains make-up. Everything is and remains make-up. During five minutes of the last act the play becomes intelligent. It is far too late. Stevenson used to call this sort of thing "toshery." It is feeble in books. It is dishearteningly feeble on the stage. Mr. Pedro de Cordoba's violent efforts conceal neither the fable's lifelessness nor his own; Miss Carroll McComas is comely and appealing. But that is the virtue of neither the play nor the production.

I anticipated a gayer moment at the Théâtre de la Chauve Souris which is back from triumphs in Paris and Berlin and, if one is to credit the astute Balieff, the ultimate isles of the sea. Alas, that brightness seemed tarnished too. The program was old and seemed a little stale. One cannot rejoice forever in either the Wooden Soldiers or Katinka. I was glad to see again the parody of Italian opera. It is the perfection of parody. It is neither gross nor obvious. The music is almost as good as second-rate Italian operatic writing. The comic emphasis upon the rhetorical mood and form of that absurdly overestimated kind of art is never too heavy. Thus this number gives one a subtle and precise sort of pleasure. Like all first-rate parody it is astonishingly good criticism. Other numbers illustrated once more the lovely perfection in the execution of elegant trifles which is characteristic of the Bat Theater. But upon this return engagement what one felt was that these things are, after all, but trifles which would have left a happier memory had they been less noisily "boosted" and more sparingly presented.

And so I come to "Poppy" (Apollo Theater), a mere musical comedy, in itself neither very musical nor very comic, but lifted quite above itself by the presence in the cast of Mr. W. C. Fields. Grave aestheticians rave about Charlie Chaplin. I have always thought there was more than a touch of affectation, of the gracious unbending of the professional highbrow in these raptures. Well, give me the admirable Fields. He is one of the deftest jugglers in the world. His tricks are amazing. His speed, lightness, and precision take your breath away. In addition he is a comedian. He is quiet; he uses no great effort; he never makes you feel that he is saying to himself: "Confound you, laugh!" This is a common vice of broad comedians. Mr. Fields's execution is delicate and a matter, often, almost of understatement. His expression is marvelous. He is Micawber with a touch of Barnum. He is the most delicious scoundrel imaginable. He is the astute medicine man, fakir, confidence man of the ages. Out of juggling and slap-stick material and burlesque make-up and a few quiet gestures and glances he builds up a character worthy of Mark Twain at his best. Until the real theater begins to function this season I give my applause to this gorgeous clown.

Where Mexico Stands

In view of the current discussions in the press regarding the exact nature of the agreement reached by Mexico and the United States, it is interesting to recall President Obregon's statement of the Mexican position, published in that country on August 17, in which he specifically denies making any sacrifices for the purpose of securing recognition. Nothing more than brief summaries of the statement appeared in the press of the United States; the full text follows:

The work of the Mexican-American Commission, constituted by the Hon. Mr. Charles B. Warren and the Hon. Mr. John B. Payne, as representatives of the President of the United States, and Mr. Ramon Ross and Mr. Fernando Gonzales Roa as my own representatives in my capacity of President of Mexico, having been concluded, it is now my duty to inform the country regarding the manner in which that work was carried out, and its significance. To that end I wish to make the following statements:

1. The work of the Mexican-American Commission, which was begun on May 14 and ended August 15, was confined, in accordance with the preliminary negotiations, to a direct exchange of views and information regarding the difficulties which up to the present time have been an obstacle to the resumption of diplomatic relations between the two governments.

2. The Mexican commissioners, after hearing the American point of view in every case, but without entering into any discussion intended to modify our present laws, offered explanations of those parts of our laws relating to American interests in Mexico in connection with the oil and the agrarian questions only; and they also explained the manner in which the present Government, in pursuance of its original policy, has been endeavoring to conciliate with the principles of international law the revolutionary ideals now embodied in our laws.

3. In addition, the Mexican commissioners confirmed the intention of this Government to conclude two conventions for the creation of mixed claims commissions.

This intention was communicated to the Embassy of the United States by our Chancellery in an informal note dated November 19, 1921, and to Congress in my message of September 12, 1922.

Regarding the first of these conventions, our Chancellery, on July 12, 1921, addressed an invitation to all the governments whose nationals had suffered damage in their persons or in their properties through the last revolution in Mexico, and that invitation was based on Article 3 of the decree of May 10, 1913, issued by the First Chief of the Constitutionalist Army, Mr. Venustiano Carranza, and on Article 13, amended, of the law of December 24, 1917.

The object of that first convention would be to create a mixed commission to examine, from the point of view of equity, all the claims which citizens of the United States might have against the Mexican Government for damages arising out of the revolution.

The second convention, having a more general jurisdiction and being of a reciprocal character, was intended to create a mixed claim commission to decide, in accordance with the rules of international law, unsettled claims of citizens of either country against the government of the other country, for acts having taken place since the signing of the convention concluded July 4, 1868, but excluding, of course, those acts falling within the jurisdiction of the first convention mentioned.

4. The conventions referred to will be concluded if the two governments decide to resume diplomatic relations.

5. If the normalization of these relations follows the termination of the Mexican-American conference, such result will not be due to any obligations contracted, nor to any agreements which may have been entered into for the purpose of resuming diplomatic relations, nor to anything that might contravene our laws or the rules of international law, or injure the dignity or the sovereignty of our nation.

Such a happy event should be attributed, as far as these conferences are concerned, to the ability and patriotism of our own commissioners to explain, and to the generous broad-mindedness, free from any unwise prejudices, of the eminent American commissioners to understand the fundamental problem that Mexicao is now facing, namely, the economic and moral betterment of the people in harmony with the development of foreign interests invested in the country, a problem which can only be solved, within the present national possibilities, through a complete realization of the political and social program of the present Government.

I am pleased, finally, to be able to state that the good-will shown by the four commissioners, which but reflects the good-will so frequently shown by the two neighboring countries in so many various ways, made it possible for the commission to carry out its work in a spirit of uninterrupted and friendly cordiality.

Mexico, D. F., August 17, 1923 A. Obregon,

"Fascistization" of Italian Press

Avanti of June 19 contains an article on the Italian press in which it is said:

Genoa also is to have its Fascist daily. . . . The greatest seaport in the country is too much under the sway of the existing order to have any independent papers. A glance at the Secolo XIX, the Caffaro, the Cittadino, and the Corriere Mercantile is sufficient to show what opinions and what programs are expressed in these sheets, which are controlled by the Perrone brothers, the Transatlantic, the sugar interests, and the Piaggio Company. . . . The new Fascist daily is to be called the Giornale di Genova, and is the result of a disagreement among certain factions of Fascism in Genoa and of a skirmish between the Seamen's Federation, D'Annunzio, and the Shipowners' Federation.

After the "Duke" took hold of the government, and the subsequent signature of the marine agreement, news spread of the imminent appearance of a paper edited by Giuseppe Mastromattei, a high official in the militia and a man whose cordial relations with Mussolini and Giulietti were a matter of common knowledge. The new daily was to be called Il Mare d'Italia, and under the guidance of D'Annunzio was to carry on a special campaign in the interests of the sea workers.

Everything was ready. . . . But a warning came from the direction of the shipping interests of the danger of such a Fascist seamen's organ, and the shipowners, taking advantage of the disagreement between Giuseppe Mastromattei and the leaders of the Genoa Fascio, succeeded at the last moment in wrecking the Mare d'Italia. . . . Mastromattei was rescued from the wreckage and transferred to Rome, to the high office of Vice-Emigration Commissioner, while the shipowners worked out their plans, which are now an accomplished fact. . . .

The editors of the Giornale di Genova are to be Lantini and Pala. The former is a member of the Fascist Council, and the latter is provincial fiduciary. And an editor-in-chief is to be imported from Rome. . . .

Genoa, as everyone knows, is the seat of the most powerful shipping companies, as well as of the sugar interests and high finance, which accounts for the fact that the government, in its attempt to "Fascistize" the Italian press, has picked out Genoa as a base.

We have in fact been informed of a huge journalistic trust, with a capital of about 35 millions, which is planning to take over the following papers: Resto del Carlino, Bologna; Secolo, Milan (already accomplished); Idea Nazionale and Impero, Rome; and Giornale della Sera, Naples. A product of this trust is Il Corriere Italiano, the new big daily of Aldo Finzi, Under-Secretary of Domestic Affairs, which will appear within a few days in Rome. The Corriere Italiano, which will represent primarily the big banking and sugar interests, is to have editorial offices for Liguria and possibly northern Italy, with headquarters at Genoa, managed by Corrado Marchi, the well-known journalist, now editor-in-chief of the Corriere Mercantile.

In Rome the Epoca and the Nuovo Paese are to be suppressed, and, since the Mondo is too disturbing an element for the reconstruction government, every attempt is being made to kill it. It is said that this task is intrusted to Tommaso Monicelli, and is to be accomplished with the millions of Senator Agnelli of Turin, who is furnishing the editor of the Giornale di Roma with funds for the purchase of its printing press. Thus, with all troublesome voices reduced to silence, Italy will be "Fascistized" even in the journalistic field; and then who will dare to say that might does not make right?

Wrangel Island

THE discovery of the tragic death of the four young Canadians who set out to colonize the bleak shores of Wrangel Island has distracted public attention from the conflicting claims to the ownership of that Arctic territory. Harold Noice, commander of the Wrangel Island Relief Expedition, discovered on the shore a monument containing a proclamation left by the dead explorers, declaring the island to be the possession of Great Britain. This position is in direct conflict with the claims of Russia as set forth in the following note addressed by Foreign Minister Chicherin to the British Agent in Moscow. It is interesting to note that several American authorities claim that the island belongs to the United States, on the ground that the first person actually to land was an American named Hooper, in 1881.

In connection with reports in British newspapers to the effect that an expedition led by Mr. Vilhjalmur Stefansson had raised the British flag on Russian territory, to wit, on the Isle of Wrangel in the Arctic Ocean, the Government of the Russian Federal Soviet Republic addressed itself to the British Government in a note of May 24, 1923, asking to be informed as to whether this act had taken place with the knowledge and sanction of the British Government.

To this inquiry no reply has been forthcoming. Likewise there has been no reply from the British Government to a second note communicated by the Russian Government to the British Government on May 28, 1923, after the receipt by the Russian Government of additional information intimating that Mr. Stefansson in raising the British flag on the Isle of Wrangel acted in the capacity of an agent of the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

The Government of the Union of the Socialist Soviet Republics, being wholly unable to understand the absence of the requested explanations, and having in the meantime learned that new expeditions are being planned by British subjects to the Isle of Wrangel, finds it necessary again to state that it regards the Isle of Wrangel as an integral part of the Union of the Socialist Soviet Republics.

The Isle of Wrangel was officially incorporated as Russian territory, and the Russian flag raised thereon, by an expedition organized by the Russian Government and led by Lieutenant Wrangel, in 1821-24. Russian sovereign rights to the island have never been questioned by any other government, and it has been generally looked upon as Russian territory. This position is taken by British official sources as well, so, for instance, the British official publication "The Arctic Pilot" (vol. I, 3rd edition, 1918) admits that the Isle of Wrangel was discovered by a Russian expedition. It may also be noted that all geographic maps, including the British "Phillip's New General Atlas" (1921 edition), put down the Isle of Wrangel as Russian territory.

In the year 1910 the Russian Hydrographic Arctic Expedition, under the command of Vilkitsky, made measurements around the island, and built thereon an iron navigation pyramid for the guidance of ships seeking entrance to the southwest part of the island, this pyramid being the first and only erection on the island. Thus the Russian Government took concrete steps to assert its rights and its duties as the possessor of the territory.

Finally, in September, 1916, the Russian Government formally notified all the Allied and neutral governments that the Isle of Wrangel, together with other islands and territories adjoining the coast of Siberia, constituted an integral part of Russian territory. This notification elicited no objections on the part of any of the governments so addressed, including the British Government.

Therefore the Federal Government is compelled to notify the British Government that it regards the raising of the British flag on the Isle of Wrangel as a violation of Russian sovereign rights.

A Tip to Americans

THE Berlin office of the American Express Company is distributing a card among American visitors which reads as follows:

You are a tourist to be here a few days or weeks. Take a tip from one who has been here several months.

You are dwelling among people who have suffered nine years of war, at first military and now industrial. They are a sensitive, cultured people, on the whole as highly civilized as any nation on earth. You should not be surprised if one of them occasionally is out of temper with foreigners.

It is only fair to remember that Berlin is their city and Germany their country, you and I only pilgrims. The streets, parks, concert-halls, restaurants belong to them, and we would show good taste if we gave right of way to them.

As we eat a dollar meal for twenty cents, or listen to a dollar concert for ten cents, remember we are always getting more than our money's worth.

A tip to the wise is sufficient, and what is said applies to all tourists who read English, as well as to Americans.

Of course, Unter den Linden is not a gauge of the distress of the poor of Berlin, nor Friedrichstrasse a gauge of the social morality of the people.

Finally, you know that, if you do not like things here or the people, it is easy to find a train going to the boundary line, and fares are low. A little consideration, however, will prove to be the key to the goodwill of the people, who are courteous and warmhearted, and a good old American smile is better currency even than the dollar.

AN AMERICAN (FROM 1630 A.D.)

From the Young Friends

THE general conference of Young Friends held at Richmond, Indiana, July 27-August 6, sent the following message to the youth of Austria and Germany:

In renewed realization of the physical suffering and spiritual loneliness of the young people of Germany and Austria we have desired to uphold their courage in the search for "that life which takes away occasion of all wars." We ask all men to join us in this expression of comradeship in our common task.

To the youth of Germany and Austria:

In the splendid fellowship of the Fourteenth Annual Conference of Young Friends of America our hearts have been drawn to you. As we have met day after day with representatives of the youth of England and Germany and with those of widely differing thought among our own people we have come to an overwhelming consciousness of the underlying unity of the human race.

The clouds which darkened our minds during the war period are breaking away and we see how impossible it is to judge men in groups. We are convinced that every nation has sinned grievously and our pride in America is humbled when we think of our share in the misunderstanding and suspicion. At the same time there are those in every group who are seeking untiringly to build a world of love and truth.

We have heard from one of your number of your dauntless faith in spite of hunger, loneliness, and disillusionment. Our problems are not your problems, but we join you in seeking through mutual fellowship the path of love. We believe with you that only in the earnest expression of love in the life of each individual, that love supremely manifested in the life of Jesus, can a new world of right and brotherhood be born.

NON-RESIDENT fees in State universities are a common provision, but the University of California has added to its fee of $150 for students from outside the State an extra sum of $50 for all foreigners. Whether they live in the State or not, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, foreign students who have not taken out their first papers must pay both fees. Since Orientals are denied citizenship and since most foreign students have no intention of becoming citizens, this will heavily reduce the number of Hindus and Chinese and Siberians and other Asiatic boys and girls who have flocked to the university. This is a poor time to put up bars against such friendly emissaries from distant lands as college students have proved to be. They come to us because they like us and admire our customs and methods; they carry home and apply these customs and methods—sometimes, to be sure, without due consideration of the results—and with them they carry home a feeling of friendly intimacy. If they are shut out from our great universities by specially devised fees and regulations, we will sacrifice what is probably the greatest influence for peace and good-feeling between us and other lands now existing, and the international tradition of scholarship and learning will be miserably betrayed.

EXIT the problem of Fiume. Italy takes the city and the glory, and Jugoslavia wins the port and the economic advantages. The Free City dies, and with it fades another Wilsonian dream. The business of dotting Europe with internationally "safeguarded" free cities, neutral zones, and independent districts was not born of an attempt to internationalize Europe but of a desire to camouflage the failures of diplomats and to soften the wounds to political prestige. When the statesmen could not agree they created a "free state." They knew well enough that the free cities could not last, but they did not dare admit failure to their constituents. Out of their refusal to face the music has come the threat of half a dozen wars, and more will come. Poland seized Vilna and the disputed territory to the east; Lithuania seized Memel; Italy seized Fiume, and the veil that concealed the fact is now torn away. Some day Danzig will become either German or Polish, and the Sarre either French or German. Internationalization might work were there a genuine concert of the Powers to supervise it; but a League born out of Allied victory, excluding the two great Powers of northern and eastern Europe, is inevitably flouted at every turn and helpless in an emergency.

THE temperamental mayor of Johnstown, Pennsylvania, complains that while he was away his city got in a ferment. "I decided," he said, "that the only thing to do was to send these newcomers out of town and keep them out." These newcomers are Negroes, two thousand of whom have been forced out of town within the past week under Mayor Cauffiel's order that only Negroes who can show seven years' residence be allowed to remain in the city. This is the same mayor that brought nation-wide attention to Johnstown a year ago by his spectacular stand on the sale of beer. So far the Ku Klux Klan has been the only group to praise the mayor for "banning Negroes purely on his own authority, unsupported by any statute of Pennsylvania or the United States." They burned twelve fiery crosses on the hilltops surrounding Johnstown in celebration, apparently not at all concerned by the fact that this thing of disregarding the law may, in the hands of a Governor Walton, prove to their disadvantage.

A REPORT of the Child Welfare Association that child-labor conditions in New Jersey were worse than in any other State brought about a drive on the sweatshop bosses of that State early last July. It was charged that more than a thousand children, most of them between the ages of four and fourteen years, robbed of health, education, and play, were working at their homes in filthy surroundings, embroidering silk underwear, beading gowns, making silk gloves and veils, and working on tin toys destined for happier children. Many of them, tubercular and otherwise diseased, were making "sanitary" powder-puffs and sewing on rompers for talking dolls—a menace to the ultimate consumer. Girls under eight were embroidering "Filipino" night dresses at twelve cents per dozen with a deduction of two cents for floss. Two or three children working with their mothers averaged $3 a week but never rose above $6. Three hundred parents and eighteen contractors were haled into court. Some 400 complaints were made out involving twenty-eight shops in Jersey City and environs and fifteen in New York City. Eight sweatshop bosses were given jail sentences of sixty days in addition to their fines. "The jail sentence," said the judge, "will stamp out the practice." Then suddenly the sentences were suspended or stayed by filing notices of appeal, and the whole campaign dropped out of the news. With the election of Mrs. Nellie T. Smith, the Jersey City school teacher who led the crusade against the sweatshops, as the first woman member of the Executive Board of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, there is a ray of hope that these children may have their childhood in some measure returned to them.

IT appears that we have done Old Sleuth Burns an injustice. We thought the head of the United States Secret Service could see more red to the square inch than anybody in the country; we believed he could concoct a seditious plot with less material than anybody in the world. We were wrong. The officers of the United Mine Workers are entitled to the championship belt for their publicity purporting to show the spread and danger of bolshevism in America. But John L. Lewis and his press agent, Ellis Searles, are four years too late. About this time in 1919 press and public would have lapped up such tales as a cat would fresh cream. Now they are musty bread. The newspapers, to be sure, have printed this serial horror story, but they have consigned it to the inside pages and their readers have yawned and turned to the next column. The one statement that caused even a ripple was the assertion that the massacre last year of non-union coal miners at Herrin, Illinois, was instigated and led by sixty-seven Lithuanian Bolsheviki.

THIS charge was so contrary to all known facts that it has been contradicted by the chairman of the Bituminous Operators' Special Committee and by the prosecuting attorney of Williamson County, the latter stating that of half a hundred persons indicted for the Herrin crime not half a dozen even had foreign names. We have also been reminded that the Coal Commission in a recent report said: "It is true that Communists have made efforts to establish organizations in that county and that a few foreigners were induced to join; but there is no evidence that this had any relation to this lamentable and horrible occurrence." Was Mr. Lewis, then, merely baying the moon? Not exactly. With his eye on the convention of the United Mine Workers, he wanted to secure his position there by discrediting his enemies of the left wing in advance. All's fair in love, war, and labor-union politics.

ALL education is not "Lusked"—even in our United States, where of late years we have seemed in danger of becoming accustomed to government by hysteria. Out of the West (but not from California) comes a superintendent of schools with a recipe for the self-rating of high-school principals, the first system devised, it appears, for measuring the educational "higher-ups." This superintendent believes that the common human tendency to develop an ever-narrowing field of interests and work is a handicap to real education, and accordingly his formula suggests that a principal should be a student of the social and economic life of today in order to make his school "meet the needs of worthy living." The principal who would obtain a passing rank on this test must, with his teachers, study open-mindedly new methods and ideals in teaching as they appear; he must develop a democratic type of school supervision; he must see that his teachers know the importance of developing thinking rather than memory, that they not only give intelligence tests but use the results, and that sufficient attention is given to extra-curricular activities to satisfy the needs of all children. One of the twenty-three questions on this rating-card asks the principal if he reads at least one of a list of seven magazines, all but one of which are devoted mainly to events of the day, the Survey and The Nation being included. While the card indicates that a definite educational ideal is essential, it is made clear that this may be a changing one. To many a high-school principal such a spirit in his superintendent would be as welcome as it would be unfamiliar.

A DUBIOUS asset at all times, marriage will soon become a positive liability to an enterprising young woman. The news from Atlantic City that contestants in the beautiful bathing-girl competition were ruled out if they were married, and that the particularly lovely entry from Brooklyn, N. Y., may lose three silver loving cups because she has since been discovered to have a husband, should result in a heavy loss of fees at the marriage license bureau for weeks to come. Ye gods! Has the time come when an ambitious, honest, hard-working beauty who aims to help decorate the flat in Flatbush with a few solid silver ornaments is discarded in favor of careless young women with no family responsibilities? The judges may argue that the beauty of the married competitor has already done its deadly work; that she no longer needs the advertisement of a cup and a half-tone reproduction in the rotogravure sections. We unhesitatingly discard this suggestion as old-fashioned, and we hope that another disbarred candidate, Miss Alaska, will recover every cent of the $150,000 damages she is demanding from the competition officials. The truth is that behind this whole bitter controversy may be discerned the play of terrific forces; something more effective than a one-piece bathing suit would be needed to cloak the sinister spectacle of economic determinism in its fatal course.

ALL over the country wherever stories of high adventure are loved—and that is everywhere—people are reading and marveling over the exploit of the young Frenchman, Alain J. Gerbault, who quite alone sailed from Cannes to Fort Totten, L. I., in a 30-foot boat—because he "wanted to see New York" and because he loved the sea. A racing sloop about twice the length of a small canoe. Four and a half months alone with following winds for friends and hurricanes and tropical winds for foes. Lost sails, broken booms, shattered bowsprit—and then 1,500 miles of fair weather and warm winds. Then terrific head winds and tropical rains, broken gear, soaked duffle, and days of fever and unconsciousness. More hurricanes, waves that filled the boat and buried it under tons of water wrecking everything, all but drowning the skipper. Days on end without a moment's sleep; weeks without sight of another vessel; and, at last, land after eighty hours on watch. This story ranks among the world's great epics—along with Ulysses and some distance ahead of the adventures of King Arthur's knights. And it is crowned by that touch of gorgeous insanity that makes heroes out of brave men: Alain Gerbault is buying a new boat. His next voyage will be no puny summer-time cruise; it will last three years and lead him around the world.

THE American Civil Liberties Union showed its integrity of purpose when it wrote to H. W. Evans, Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan: "We believe heartily in free speech for Klan as well as anti-Klan, and we offer you our assistance in maintaining that right." At the same time the Civil Liberties Union points out:

> In June, 1922, the home of the Mayor of Columbus, Georgia, was bombed because of his support of law and order as opposed to the Klan's activities. . . . In January of this year a railroad worker in Harrison, Arkansas, a town run by a "Citizens' Committee" of Klansmen, was lynched because he refused to confess to sabotage, of which he was not guilty. . . . The Klan in Harrison recently lynched a man named Lean. Frequent letters from the district inform us that "peaceable assemblage," as well as every other right, is still denied to all but "citizens." . . . Interference with the right of labor unions to organize workers has been one of the principal activities of the Klan. In January of this year J. E. Marsh, a speaker for the Farm Labor Union of Atoka, Oklahoma, was severely beaten by your members and ordered to stop his work for the farmers. A few months later in Bald Knob, Oklahoma, delegates of the Industrial Workers' Union were menaced and searched by a mob of Klansmen and driven out of town. . . . Religious hatred scarcely consistent with your recent defense of "free speech" caused Klansmen of New York to burn churches. . . . School teachers have been dismissed and left without positions in West Virginia and Georgia because of their Catholic faith, and attempts are constantly being made to limit the freedom of children to attend sectarian schools, as witness the recent legislation in Oregon fostered by the Invisible Empire.

TO this indictment might be added the statement from the office of the Governor of Oklahoma that it is the Ku Klux Klan that has led to the need of military rule in Tulsa County. Yet according to the Solicitor General of Georgia, the Klan seems belatedly to be seeking to get rid of the odium it has brought upon itself, by "spending money with apparent sincerity in connection with the local investigation [at Macon, Georgia] and appears to be especially desirous of exposing its own members who have been trapped as participants in the floggings." In Portland, Maine, the Klan suddenly threw its support to municipal reform, thereby, according to the New York Times, almost defeating a good thing by the stigma it brought upon it. Whether the new wine of civic virtue can be poured into the old bottles of Klanism, already condemned by public opinion, is a problem the Klan itself must solve. There is no solution in organizing Red Knights to battle the White Knights. As The Nation has frequently pointed out, nothing is gained for the cause of law and order by extra-legal methods against any organization, though it be the leader of all outlaws.

BIT by bit we make way against disease. Radium in greater quantities than anywhere previously known has just been discovered in Turkestan, and the find promises to reduce the price of this precious commodity, putting it at the disposal of hospitals and people that so far have been unable to afford it. Simultaneously we read in Porto Rico Progress that twenty-five plants of a West African shrub that yields chaulmoogra oil have just been received for setting out at the United States experiment station at Mayaguez. The public is probably not yet familiar with the remarkable results that chaulmoogra oil has had in the treatment of leprosy. Scientists are not ready yet definitely to pronounce it a cure for this tragic disease, but in the early stages it seems almost to have demonstrated itself as such. At the leper colony of St. Croix, Virgin Islands, for instance, five victims out of seventy-five have been allowed to return home on parole, all symptoms of leprosy having apparently disappeared as a result of the use of chaulmoogra oil. Whether these persons are permanently cured, it is too early to say, but at least the disease has been temporarily arrested. Hitherto chaulmoogra oil, obtained from India, has been expensive and hard to procure, but the United States Department of Agriculture has recently discovered a shrub in West Africa which yields the medicine and, owing to the fact that it matures quicker than the Indian plant, promises a sufficient supply for all sufferers in a short time.

SCIENTISTS who mourned their failure to observe the recent eclipse of the sun may console themselves with the thought that all is not lost. If science cannot insure a clear day, business can at least insure against rain and clouds, and did so. The sequel was the payment of premiums to a considerable amount to various observatories foresighted enough to take out insurance policies. Evidently the day of the absent-minded scientist who cannot take care of himself in even the simplest emergency is passing; for even if the Professor insists on forgetting his umbrella, his wife has only to arrange a little policy covering that accident, with nothing to do for the rest of her life but spend the insurance. Of course there were some observers who did not think of protecting their interests in this way; they spent months in the preparation of instruments, they set up a great silk screen on which the shadow might be recorded, they taught an obliging helper the exact speed at which seconds must be counted in order that he might call them out in a loud voice, and the sun unobligingly veiled his face. These unbusinesslike creatures had only their trouble for their pains; if they had only thought to insure the process, how much more comfortable they would have been at its failure.

A BEAUTIFUL silver fish, swimming along at thirty miles an hour, passed over the tops of New York buildings the other day. The sun made its back glisten like a sword blade; from a distance it appeared a grave, deliberate minnow, turning carefully in order not to spill some precious drop from its nose. Pedestrians craned their necks, roofs were thick with watchers, but apparently the fish did not see them, for it swam serenely on. What, said the curious ones, will the fish do in the future, when it is tired of floating in the air? It will drop bombs upon cities, was the reply, and let loose clouds of poison gas; it will fly as a scout over mountains and over armies; it will even cross the sea. True, its use in time of war is not the only use to which it will be put; true, it may carry mail and passengers in time of peace. But it is well to be prepared. The fish, which men have named the dirigible ZR-1, did not indicate what it thought of these proposals. Yet it is not altogether impossible that, in the act of carrying bombs which its passengers drop upon sleeping humans, even the fish, though rigid and helpless, at the mercy of its masters, will shiver with pity to see a noble machine put to such a tragic use.

The Day of the Dictator

RUSSIA, Italy, Spain, Oklahoma. Westward the course of dictatorship takes its way. Is there a common thread running through events in these widely separated regions? We think there is in spite of differences in time, conditions, and temperaments. It would be absurd to push a comparison too far, yet in all these instances there has been something in common. To start with, there has been a failure of civil government to do its job. Whether autocratic or democratic in name, it has been unequal to the situation confronting it. It has not been so much its corruption—which in measure men can tolerate—as its appalling inadequacy. It is this which has led great numbers of people to acquiesce in, if not to welcome, a change of almost any sort. The change in every case has been effected by force—by an overriding of constitutional means—and, if it has survived, has done so because, in spite of everything to be said against it, it has seemed to promise at least to be more effective than the government it overthrew.

In Russia a dictatorship of the proletariat, or of a proletarian party, displaced the shell of a pitifully incompetent and selfish autocracy; in Italy a dictatorship of the middle class superseded a bureaucracy enmeshed in red tape, floundering in an effort to side with labor and with capital at the same time; in Spain a dictatorship of the army has seized power after the tragic muddling by politicians of the campaign in Morocco and the failure to meet domestic needs in any satisfactory way; and, finally, in our own State of Oklahoma we see a governor attempting to make himself a dictator because of the failure of civil government to cope with the Ku Klux Klan. Governor Walton says—and known events in Oklahoma and elsewhere make it credible—that the Klan has superseded civil government. His answer is to supersede both Klan and civil government with his own little despotism. There was a better, and constitutional, way of proceeding. He might have sought the removal of delinquent officials through impeachment or criminal prosecution. But that was too slow—too orderly.

Is dictatorship, then, the only way out of the morass into which modern government seems to have wandered? We think not. In the first place the dictatorships have not yet proved the success of that method. They have achieved no ultimate solution, and they have trampled on much in the way of liberty and democratic tradition which must be restored unless they are to prove only a new kind of tyranny. We doubt the efficacy of force to obtain better political institutions, because political institutions are eventually what human virtues and frailties make of them, and the club has never been shown to be a good method of enlightening men's minds or ennobling their hearts. An Oklahoma newspaper says: "Oklahoma is suffering from two distinct menaces. . . . The creed of the Klan is the creed of the mob. The creed of Walton is the creed of a dictator. . . . The people of Oklahoma . . . want neither Klan nor king."

Admirable! But merely to inveigh against dictatorship accomplishes nothing. It is the product of events—an inexorable sequel of our carelessness and self-absorption. There must be hundreds of persons in Oklahoma who want neither Klan nor king, but what have they been doing to prevent either? Unless we can find through democracy a way to efficiency, justice, and liberty, we shall get dictatorship—and we shall deserve it.

Ready to Learn

THE schools of the country have opened once more. Several hundreds of thousands of children from elementary to high-school age are ready to learn and have no place in which to be taught. Many thousands will have to be content with part-time instruction; many other thousands will be taught during so-called double sessions. There will be wrong hours, overcrowded classrooms, conditions scarcely sanitary and therefore pedagogically absurd. The human organism at its frailest, most plastic, most crucial stage will be both psychically and physically mauled and misshapen. This is no overstatement. No one with a practical experience of teaching can think without horror of hot, overcrowded classrooms, teachers with nerves worn thin, unsuitable surroundings, ineffective equipment. We spend over four-fifths of our national income on wars—past and future. But the children of the country cannot go to school properly.

The scandal is worst perhaps in New York City since that is today the richest city in the world. During this year's session 150,000 children here will receive only part-time instruction, 200,000 will be taught in double sessions. The high-school situation is even more appalling. There will be over 100,000 pupils of whom only one-third will receive their instruction under normal conditions of time and place and equipment.

As unfortunate as the lack of room for school pupils is the fact that many of them have to occupy quarters which ought long ago to have been condemned, and would have been if it were not for the lack of other accommodation. Conditions are notoriously bad in some of the schools of lower Manhattan, in districts populated largely by recent immigrants, thus giving the children of these newcomers the dingiest and most unfortunate early impressions of American life.

It is more than useless to speculate concerning the specific causes of these facts which have been presented with authoritativeness and precision by the World. For whatever the immediate cause the ultimate one is that we are vastly more interested in other things than in education and that our boasted American pride in those schools which, open to all, shall create for all citizens equality of opportunity, is like so many other national pretensions here and elsewhere, more noisy than sincere. It is perfectly clear that no great corporation selling any material commodity, however base, is managed with the lack of foresight, earnestness, and attention to necessary expansion which characterizes the management of our democratic educational system. Men will see to it that, as the population increases, there will be no lack of breeches and cosmetics and ginger-ale to satisfy all comers. Human souls and future citizens can scramble along somehow.

But the case of New York is only the most conspicuous and flagrant. An inquiry conducted by Collier's brings out the fact that these conditions are assuming national proportions. That the larger cities, Chicago and Philadelphia, for instance, should have the greater number of pupils who cannot get proper instruction may at first seem logical. The contrary is the truth. Not only wealth but culture are concentrated in the leading municipalities. If these are slack and careless, what is to be expected of the taxpayers and local authorities of Winchester, Kentucky; Bogalusa, Louisiana; Laredo, Texas; Mansfield, Ohio; or Hamtramck, Michigan? What at all events the very useful inquiry of Collier's has established is that the conditions we have described are countrywide. More than 1,000 cities of over 5,000 inhabitants each have reported so far and all confess to a larger or smaller shortage and deficiency in regard to that minimum of educational opportunity which the democratic state is in honor bound to offer to the children of its citizens.

It is well known, of course, that the conditions in the country schools though different in character are no better and that in progressive and highly industrialized States country-school sessions of six months and even of three months are not unknown. A great deal of printed indignation has also been poured out over the average salary paid to teachers in small towns and villages. And that average is, indeed, farcical. But the difficulty goes deeper. Many of these teachers can earn very little. Their preparation is unbelievably meager. In so comparatively civilized a State as Ohio it is possible for people to teach in high schools who have not even the poor and doubtful guaranty of a collegiate degree of any kind. The real question that arises then is: Do we really care for education? Are we, as a nation, genuinely concerned? It is by a rigid examination of our minds and consciences in this matter that anything will be accomplished rather than by hectic, periodic outcries over one phase or another of our apparent carelessness and parsimony.

Richer—but Happier?

"IN ———, a great number of people read the Bible, and all the people read a newspaper. The fathers read aloud to their children while breakfast is being prepared—a task which occupies the mothers for three-quarters of an hour every morning." What reader can supply the missing word? Strange to say, it is "America." But let us continue the quotation:

> And as the newspapers of the United States are filled with all sorts of narratives—comments on matters political, physical, philosophic; information on agriculture, the arts, travel, navigation; and also extracts from all the best books in America and Europe—they disseminate an enormous amount of information, some of which is helpful to the young people, especially when they arrive at an age when the father resigns his place as reader in favor of the child who can best succeed him.

One scarcely knows which detail of this picture is least characteristic of the American life of today—the breakfast that, without the assistance of prepared foods, needs three-quarters of an hour to make ready; the morning paper that, innocent of baseball reports and crime stories, serves the combined purpose of an encyclopedia and a literary anthology; or the patience of the junior portion of the family, meekly receiving its quotidian dose of edifying knowledge at second-hand from the paternal lips. But this description is of the America not of 1923 but of 1800. In that year Pierre Samuel du Pont de Nemours, the French economist and statesman—whose sons, establishing themselves in Delaware, became the founders of the American family—prepared, at the request of Thomas Jefferson, a scheme for national education in the United States. The first English translation of it has recently been issued by the University of Delaware Press, and it is from this publication that the above extracts are taken.

The educational proposals put forward in this book present many curious, not to say quaint, features. Du Pont suggests, for instance, that history should be treated not as a school subject but as a recreation, and that history books should accordingly not be used in the classroom but given as prizes. Textbooks should be printed under the direction of Congress—the selection being made from competitive manuscripts submitted in response to an offer of prizes for the best primers—and their use should be compulsory in all primary schools in the United States, public and private alike. Ethics should be taught in the secondary school by the French master, the approach to the subject being made through "Télémaque." Botany should come at the end, not the beginning, of a medical course, as a recreation and relief.

But the main interest of this book lies in the side-lights it casts upon contemporary national conditions. Take, for example, Du Pont's argument for teaching the mechanical arts to all pupils:

> The people of this country [he says] have not yet found it necessary or wise to arrange for such a subdivision of labor as now develops the manufactures and commerce of greater nations by limiting the resourcefulness of many of its citizens and intrusting the welfare of multitudes of families to the varying accidents of fashion, or to the unjust and uncertain market of exclusive privilege protected by artillery, or to the perfectly unreasonable hope that other nations will not learn how to work for themselves and may be kept ignorant of the secrets of skilled labor. On the contrary they are now at that fortunate time when every man must increase his talents by some knowledge of all crafts; when the race grows enlightened, strong, and vigorous; when families can live in comfort, can enjoy freely and leave for their descendants the dew from the skies and the richness of the earth, which depend on the whims of no one, with no fear of another nation's jealousy, and can increase their possessions by allowing all countries to profit thereby and so give no cause for envy.

With this may be bracketed the startling sentence with which Du Pont introduces his scheme for a school of mines: "I have no desire that the United States should give much thought to gold mines, which are very rare and happily are unknown in that country."

How terribly stagnant and unprogressive it all seems! Can it really be that America was ever so backward a country as Du Pont depicts it—a country with no "pep," no "hustle," no "getting a move on"? Newspapers, forsooth, that serve an educational purpose and that bear reading aloud! Industries that are limited to farm labor and the mechanical crafts, with no steel mills, or cotton mills, or automobile works, or munition factories! And yet one can imagine some lover of his kind looking back with a wistful regret to the simple conditions of a national life long since transformed beyond recognition. Simple conditions—yes, and more humane conditions, too. In his first chapter, the author emphasizes the special educational opportunities available to the United States of his time from the fact that the "paternal affection" of the Americans "protects young children from working in the fields," so that "it is possible to send them to the schoolmaster." But today, out of a total population of 12,502,582 between the ages of ten and fifteen, no less than 1,060,858 are reported as "gainfully occupied." We have discovered that it is unconstitutional to prohibit child labor. Our commercial and industrial prosperity may be a thing to boast of, but are we quite sure that it is worth the price?

The Coal Strike Is Not Settled

"COAL Strike Settled on Pinchot Plan." This is the headline that appeared in one of New York's great dailies in announcing the agreement between the anthracite operators and miners to resume work on a basis the most important provision of which was an increase of 10 per cent in the wages of the workers. Most of the other newspapers of the country gave the news in a similar way.

Coal strike settled? We wonder. Not that we blame Governor Pinchot; he did the best that he could in the circumstances. In the face of oncoming winter and cessation of work in the mines, his job was to get production started again in the least possible time. It was not for him to suggest an adequate or ultimate solution but merely an opportunist scheme for providing the people with coal through the coming winter. He deserves their thanks for having done this, but it would have been better for them to go through a winter of shortage and suffering unless they envisage Governor Pinchot's "settlement" as merely a temporary respite and, thanking their stars for an extension of time, have the intelligence to demand—and the courage to apply—a plan sufficiently radical to end these recurring crises in an essential industry.

Fortunately there is some evidence of such an attitude. Although the news accounts in the daily press generally heralded the Pinchot agreement as a "settlement," editorial comment has shown a wholesome concern over the tiresome repetition of placating workers temporarily through a slight increase in wages—passed on to the consumer with interest —while leaving untouched the essential question of reorganizing the industry on a basis of efficiency and justice to all concerned. It is interesting also to see that the National Retail Coal Merchants' Association is protesting against the Pinchot agreement, especially the suggestion that the cost of the wage increase be absorbed chiefly by the retail dealers instead of shifted along to the consumer. What does this protest mean? The retailers know, of course, that there is and will be no legal way of compelling them to accept smaller profits. The consumer knows that the retailers have no philanthropic interest in protecting his pocketbook. Thus the answer seems to be that the retailers fear economic conditions that may make it difficult to pass on to the buying public an increased charge which Governor Pinchot estimates will average sixty cents a ton and others think will be nearer a dollar.

At least one possible economic obstacle in the way of higher retail prices for anthracite has had wide mention in the press within recent weeks. It is the substitution of bituminous coal, or possibly oil, by the present users of anthracite. Indeed there has been such widespread insistence that soft coal may be readily substituted for hard as to suggest a deliberate though carefully concealed propaganda in that direction. Even the United States Bureau of Mines has joined in the effort to make the public regard bituminous coal as a ready substitute for anthracite. Such a change would, of course, be easiest for the owners of big offices, hotels, and apartment houses in the large cities, promising a saving to them of thousands of dollars in fuel bills. No wonder they look upon it without dismay and that propaganda is adroitly spread before the public intended to reconcile it to the soft-coal nuisance and danger. Unfortunately for such propaganda soft coal is not a substitute for hard, and no outcome of the strike could be more unfortunate than a belief that recurrence of such trouble is not especially to be feared since emancipation from the use of anthracite would furnish a ready escape. There are at least two important reasons why this is not so.

In the first place, the supply of bituminous coal is no better assured than that of anthracite. Conditions in the soft-coal industry are as wasteful and unjust as in the production of anthracite. There is the same bitter struggle between the operators and the United Mine Workers; there have been repeated and similar interruptions of production and shortages in supply in recent years. The only difference is that it just happens that there is no general strike in the soft-coal fields this autumn.

More important even than this reason is the fact that from the standpoint of cleanliness, comfort, and health soft coal is no substitute for hard. One of the real forward steps in civilization taken in this country within recent years is the practical elimination of offensive smoke in some great cities through the use of anthracite. No doubt it is true that with proper apparatus and scientific firing semi-bituminous coal, or mixtures of hard and soft, can be used with no great production of fumes and soot; but it is far more certain that no such outcome could be expected in connection with a general abandonment of anthracite. The ability, or even the effort, to eliminate smoke would lag far behind the introduction of fuel notorious for its evils in that respect. This has been amply proved in New York City, for instance, where even a temporary relaxation of the anti-smoke regulations during last winter's anthracite shortage led to gross offenses in the use of soft coal which, although now illegal, are in fact continuing to some extent right up to the present time. It is notoriously easier to let down the bars than to put them up again.

No, the reorganization of the coal industry must be faced as a whole—both anthracite and bituminous. The present Coal Commission has made some interesting and possibly useful studies in regard to conditions, but little more than could be made—or have been—by newspapers, magazines, or economic organizations. What Congress and the public want is a plan—an adequate scheme for reducing waste, eliminating excessive profits, and introducing fair working conditions into an industry where tyranny, profiteering, and anarchy now prevail, with their inevitable danger and financial burden for the public.

One of the big questions to be considered in connection with the reorganization of the coal industry is the development of super-power systems—means, that is, whereby fuel can be converted into electricity at the mines and transmitted over great areas, thus saving, for certain purposes, transportation charges and the evils of conbustion in our cities.

The Nation has already made plain its belief that no scheme of reorganization is likely to be adequate which does not in some form embody nationalization of the mines, but we are not committed to any preconceived plan. We do insist that the country needs a coal commission which will give it not essays but definite and sufficient directions for getting out of the woods.

"Selling" Us Another War

By FREDERICK J. LIBBY

IT must have become apparent even to the most hasty reader of newspapers that there has been an extraordinary amount of material in the press during the past few months with regard to the Army and Navy. What are its sources? We have before us documents which tell the story better than any comment. First, for the sources of the official Army propaganda. A general order, issued over a year ago, reads as follows:

> The Secretary of War authorizes and desires public and private discussion on appropriate occasions by officers of the Army in support of the military policy of the United States as established by law and of the policies of the War Department in furtherance thereof designed to secure the national defense. . . .
> The national defense is the ultimate mission of the Army, and a proper presentation to the public of the necessities in this regard, since it is essential to the accomplishment of this mission, becomes naturally and logically one of the important duties of the officers of the Army.
> As the policies involved have been worked out with much care after a very full consideration of all the factors entering into the problem, it is desired, in order to avoid confusion, that they should be discussed from the standpoint of the War Department unless special authority for a different presentation is obtained from the Adjutant General of the Army.
> By order of the Secretary of War:
> JOHN J. PERSHING,
> General of the Armies, Chief of Staff
> General Orders No. 20, War Department, May 15, 1922

The announcement, printed in the Army and Navy Register, on September 2, 1922, of the fall convention of the Military Order of the World War, contained these words:

> . . . It will seek new methods by which to assist in securing adequate appropriations for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, National Guard, and Reserve Corps, so that the National Defense Act may not be openly, insidiously, or indirectly repealed by diminutive Americans who use the term "economy" as a smoke screen.

THE RESERVE OFFICERS ORGANIZE

At about the same time, at a convention held in Washington, D. C., and reported in the Army and Navy Journal, a Reserve Officers' Association was organized for the same purpose, and adopted resolutions from which the following passages are taken:

> . . . Be it resolved, that this convention of reserve officers of the United States express in public to the Congress of the United States, and likewise to the people of the United States, that the time has arrived when all citizens in public and private life must definitely stand by this act and insure its execution through proper appropriations, or be considered as one of those who do not stand for adequate national defense of the United States of America. . . .
> Be it further resolved, that this Association, through its national and local officers and through its individual members, constantly bring before Congress as a whole and individual Congressmen and the press of all parts of the United States that the necessity for adequate national defense does exist; that the Amended National Defense Act is democratic, is in accordance with the genius of the American people, is non-militaristic, is economical; that supporting it is a non-partisan action, and that the public man who fails to support it is failing in his duty as a citizen of the United States to provide the means necessary to insure the enforcement of the principles on which this government is founded and for which it stands in the eyes of the world.

Subsequent reports in the same journal chronicle the formation of local branches of this officers' association in New Jersey, Ohio, Michigan, and Kentucky. Presently the Military Training Camps Association turned its attention to recruiting, and on December 23, 1922, the Army and Navy Journal printed a letter signed by the Secretary of War commending this action:

> DEAR SIR:
> I am pleased to inform you that I accept in principle the patriotic offer of the Military Training Camps Association submitted to me by you on October 10, 1922, and I hereby extend to the Military Training Camps Association formal recognition as a cooperating agency in fostering the voluntary military training of citizens. . . .
> The Military Training Camps Association is further authorized to create a system of county and local chairmen—thus completing in detail a nation-wide organization for C. M. T. C. recruiting in the time of peace and for such wider function as might be requested by the War Department. . . .
> The corps area commander is further authorized, in his discretion, to furnish office space, clerical assistance, stationery, printing, and advertising matter to assist the Military Training Camps Association with their part of the work.

THE NATIONAL GUARD'S PUBLICITY

From a report on the National Guard submitted to the War Department by a General Staff officer after visiting various camps of instruction we take the following section as summarized in the Army and Navy Journal, January 6, 1923.

> . . . (b) To mold public opinion favorably toward the continued support of the Army of the United States, the great cry was a publicity bureau and "publicity," and more parades of organizations displaying their coats of arms, crests, insignia, and distinctive uniforms (for dress) with the meaning of same and the history of the organization played up in newspaper articles describing the parade or event; also, to periodically hold maneuvers or camps in accessible localities to which the general public can be invited.

The possible uses of the National Guard and the other military organizations of civilians are suggested in an editorial printed in the Army and Navy Journal on January 6, 1923:

> . . . The reorganization of the National Guard on a scale hitherto unknown, the organization of the cadre of reserve divisions, the revival of the Plattsburg idea and the placing of it upon a permanent and national basis, and the success of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps have created a force at present of nearly 400,000 civilians directly interested in the Army of the United States. When the families and others influenced by the views of these 400,000 are taken into consideration, it is easily seen that millions of American men and women, scattered throughout every portion of the United States, have an interest in adequate national defense.

THE NATURE OF THE PROPAGANDA

The results of this effort to organize support for military appropriations appear in the following examples drawn from different periods and a well-nigh limitless store.

Admiral Coontz and the Manufacturers

In recognition of the attitude of the National Association of Manufacturers in favoring a larger navy, Admiral R. E. Coontz, Chief of Naval Operations, yesterday entertained John E. Edgerton, president of the association, and the organization's directors at a luncheon on board the battleship Wyoming. In the evening, the second night of the association's convention in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Admiral Coontz addressed the 500 delegates, urging an adequate navy as a good business investment.

After saying that at the end of each war the American people had been inclined to "wreck" the Navy, the Admiral said: ". . . Our foreign policies are as strong as our fleet and no stronger."—New York World, May 10, 1922.

A "Military Committee" at Work

Western Society of Engineers
Monadnock Block
Chicago, Ill.

May 26, 1922

To all Members:

. . . Read this pamphlet carefully and, if you are between the ages of 17 and 27 years, ask yourself this question: "Can I personally partake of this training which is offered me . . .?"

Only by local support can these camps be made fully successful, and it is a duty of every citizen to lend his active aid by producing at least one eligible young man to attend this year's camp. It is felt that the society as a whole should actively support this patriotic movement. Let each of us produce at least one applicant of good physique and character.

An Appeal to National Fear

(Special to the New York Times)

Washington, July 14.—While the American Army, under instructions from Secretary Weeks, is holding itself in readiness for any call in connection with guarding nearly 254,000 miles of railway, the War Department is going ahead with the execution of plans for a reduction of the regular army to 125,000 men, as ordered by Congress. . . .

The War Department has less than 25,000 infantrymen in the United States with which to cope with any emergency. This fact is all the more significant because the brunt of any strike duty would fall mainly upon that branch of the service.

"The Credit of the Firm"

. . . We anticipate some trying days ahead of the firm. Various wild-cat schemes of socialism and bolshevism are seeking to encroach upon our territory and to impair the standing of our organization through the country. An effort is being made to disparage our output and deny our claims for further extension of credit by a much-advertised substitute called "disarmament," presented as a panacea for every national ailment from callouses to consumption. This is in the interest of firms who are rivals of ours across distant seas and especially in the Oriental trade.—General Harbord to the Reserve Officers' Convention.

Gum vs. Guns

A comprehensive and enlightening discussion of the peace activities of the Army was made in a speech delivered by Secretary of War Weeks before the Boston Chamber of Commerce at its annual dinner on November 14. . . . The Secretary brought out the rather startling fact that the nation spends more on chewing gum than it does on national defense.—Army and Navy Journal, November 18, 1922.

Dangerous Tendencies in Women's Clubs

Boston, December 14 (By Associated Press).—Addressing the Women's Republican Club of Massachusetts today, General John J. Pershing said that "dangerous elements are moving toward a revolution in America," both openly and secretly, and that because national problems have not been thoroughly discussed, "there have crept into so many women's clubs these undermining and disruptive tendencies toward radicalism of all sorts." Pacifism, "the disease which strikes but at constitutional government," he added, "was one of these tendencies."—Washington Post, December 15, 1922.

General Pershing Here and There

General John J. Pershing, U. S. A., made an address at Minneapolis, Minn., November 27, on the subject of national defense. He spoke on the relation of military training to preparation for citizenship and of military training in its relation to war.—Army and Navy Journal, December 2, 1922.

General John J. Pershing, U. S. A., who is making a brief tour under the auspices of the American Defense Society, made two forceful speeches this week, during which he made a strong plea for adequate military preparedness. His first speech was made at St. Louis, Mo., on December 4, at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon attended by business men and members of civic and women's organizations who demonstrated great enthusiasm for his views. His second speech was made at Chicago, December 6, at which place Brigadier General Charles G. Dawes also spoke.—Army and Navy Journal, December 9, 1922.

. . . The General's addresses have been followed with the greatest of interest throughout the service. He was apparently determined that his voice in behalf of reasonable national defense should reach every section of the country. The response which has come through the press is proof that he reached the entire American public with telling effect.—Army and Navy Journal, December 30, 1922.

General Ely Stimulates the Legion

Scouting the idea that there would be no more war, and declaring that in the future some of our Allies in the recent World War might be arrayed against us, Major General Hanson E. Ely, president of the National War College, strongly advocated strong defensive measures in an address at this morning's session of the convention of the Maryland Department of the American Legion. . . . General Ely said that the United States was the richest of all the nations of the world and implied that all other nations were ready to try for some of our wealth. The only preventive for this is adequate defense, the speaker implied. The taxes required to provide adequate national defense would be nothing to what we would have to pay in the event we were defeated in war, General Ely asserted. The World War, he said, created 2,500 millionaires. . . . He added that a pure undiluted doctrine of Americanism should be given students in schools and colleges, and stated that the Legion should seek the removal of persons with communistic ideas who are employed as teachers in various educational institutions in the country. General Ely freely expressed himself against radicalism and said a show of armed force is needed and that real measures should be taken to prevent the growth of the seeds of communism and radicalism. He urged the organization to exert efforts to prevent I. W. W. and communistic speeches, and followed this by stating that preventive measures are always best.—Frederick (Md.) News, August 24, 1923.

NAVY DAY A "SELLING CAMPAIGN"

Navy Day, last October, was described by the Washington Evening Star as "one of the biggest selling campaigns that has ever been attempted in the United States." It was generally proclaimed and celebrated, but Governor Baxter of Maine refused to give it his official indorsement; and instead issued a statement in which he said:

> . . . Many of the sponsors of Navy Day are inspired by patriotism, while a few others may be actuated by less worthy motives. What will the world think of the United States if, in the face of our binding promises, preparations for naval expansion are made? If every nation holds a Navy Day the great principles of the Disarmament Conference of 1921 will soon be forgotten. Nothing should be done to undermine the great achievements of that gathering. . . .
> I believe that a Navy Day at the present time is uncalled for and inadvisable. All good citizens are loyal to our Navy and it will never lack proper support, but the present is no time for naval expansion, and our country should and will live up to both the letter and the spirit of its Reduction of Armaments agreement. For these reasons I shall refrain from indorsing Navy Day.

The editor of the Boston Transcript vented his patriotic wrath on the Governor of Maine in these terms:

> . . . As for Governor Baxter, the noble traditions of the good old State of Maine and the splendid service of her sons with the Colors in the Great War are sufficient assurance to all who know the stuff of which the men and women of Maine are made that Mr. Baxter's sham and hypocrisy, his distortion of the truth, and the cunning with which he has employed his office to curry favor with the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments and to honey-fugle the small minority of pacifists in his own and nearby States will, in due time, receive the rebuke and the repudiation of the plain people whose service and sacrifice in peace and war have earned them the right to speak for the State of Maine. We have no doubt that this rebuke and this repudiation will soon be forthcoming from the Maine Department of the American Legion, and that it will be reinforced by the patriotic sentiment of the people of Maine without regard to race, religion, party, or walk in life. . . . Give the Legionnaires of Maine time to be heard from and the shame and disgrace of Governor Baxter's pusillanimous performance will prove to the country that, although he is for the moment the chief executive of Maine, he has abused that office to become the State's chief traducer. . . .

MISCELLANEOUS PROPAGANDA

We have not room in this article for the adequate discussion of magazine articles such as have appeared in Current History in the December and January numbers. Regarding one of these articles Congressman Anthony stated in the House of Representatives on January 16 that it misrepresented Congress as reducing the number of commissioned officers by 1,400 when the total reduction due to legislation was approximately 500 and said that the article "was written by an officer by the name of Myer [Mayer] who was one of those discharged under the provisions of the act of Congress."

Magazines containing articles issuing from the War Department have been sent to editors accompanied by personal letters. The National Republican in December carried a series of three articles by Secretary Weeks. The Nation's Business for January contained a very significant article on How Industry Is Being Trained for War by the same voluminous author. The War Department held a conference with educators on November 16-18 in the hope of "popularizing" universal military training under the terms of the National Defense Act of 1920. It was recommended that "regular press agents" be employed "for the purpose of keeping before the public the news items having to do with the amended National Defense Act and above all, any steps taken or contemplated which will attract the attention of the young men eligible for service under this Act." And in June, 1923, Secretary Weeks called a conference of ministers with the results described in the following account in the New York Times of June 9:

> The quickest way to invite war would be for America to pursue peace unarmed and undefended, according to pronouncements and findings today submitted to and approved by Secretary Weeks on behalf of the conference of religious and welfare workers called by the Secretary to consider the religious and moral training of soldiers. The findings were adopted unanimously. . . . "We deprecate any attempt made under the cloak of religion and in the name of false pacifism to deny the support of the churches to the well-being of our Army and Navy," one pronouncement said.

Two vastly important mediums of militarist propaganda are indicated in the following quotations from the Army and Navy Journal:

> . . . Another means of carrying the message of the day into the homes was the radio broadcasting station. Speakers of national reputation sent their eulogies of the Navy to the farmers of the great central section as well as to those along the coast more familiar with the subject, possibly. None of the Navy stations were used, the offer of the commercial radio organizations having been so generous as to meet the demand.
> The motion picture news weeklies did their share in making the Navy better known.

The articles on military matters which flood the press are the result of a well-organized and far-reaching military propaganda, for part of which we are paying out of our Federal budget. The War and Navy Departments have definitely adopted the policy of "educating" the nation, beginning with the children, to the carrying out in full of the National Defense Act of 1920. This act provides for the militarization of the entire resources of the nation. We are getting ready, not for peace, but for war.

Hungry Souls

By THOMAS MANN

A MOMENT came in which the sense of his superfluousness penetrated Detlev's very soul. He let the festive crowd carry him away as though by accident, and thus without farewell he drifted from those other two.

A human current carried him past the long wall of the gorgeous auditorium. He offered no resistance until he knew himself to be far from Lily and the little painter. Then he stood still near the stage, leaning against the gilded vaulting of a proscenium box between a bearded baroque caryatid and its female counterpart whose swelling bosom protruded into the hall. As best he could he assumed the attitude of a calm observer. Now and then he raised his opera-glasses to his eyes. But his wandering glance always avoided one spot in that radiant circle of vision.

The feast was at its height. At well-appointed tables in the boxes people were eating and drinking; against the balustrades stood men in black or gaily hued evening clothes, huge chrysanthemums in their buttonholes, and leaned down toward the powdered shoulders of women in fantastic garb. Chatting they watched the gay throng which here gathered into groups, flowed more evenly yonder, seemed at moments to whirl and dance and then disperse with a swift flash of color.

The orchestra fell silent. The couples stopped on the dance-floor and laughed as they looked at the stage whence came the groaning and blaring of a musical "stunt." Four or five persons, dressed in peasant costume, with clarinettes and nasal string-instruments were playing a parody of the Tristan score. For a moment Detlev closed his burning lids. Even through this voluntary distortion of the tones he heard their pain-touched yearning for union. And suddenly, almost throttling him, there arose in him again the woe of the eternal solitary who, in envy and love, has lost his heart to a bright and common child of the world. . . .

Lily . . . in his soul the name was all beseeching and tenderness. He could no longer keep his eyes from that one point. Yes, she was still there. She was still in the same spot where he had left her. Now and then when the crowd drifted apart he could see her whole figure. There she stood, leaning against the wall, her hands behind her, in her milk-white frock trimmed with silver. She held her head a little to one side and chatted with the little painter and looked straight into his eyes, looked archly into those eyes that were as blue, as frank, as untroubled as her own.

What were they talking about? What could they be talking about all this time? Ah, this talk that flowed so easily and freely from the inexhaustible sources of harmless spiritual triviality and happy ignorance and natural cheer. He could not learn the art of it, he who had been made somber and difficult by a life dedicated to vision and knowledge, crippled by insight and creative agony! He had gone. In an access of defiance, despair, and magnanimity he had stolen away and left those two children of the world alone together. He had left them—only to see, from afar, while this jealousy tore at his throat, the smile of relief that they exchanged instinctively at being freed of the burden of his presence. . . .

Why had he come? Why again tonight? What drove him to seek this torture—to mingle with the crowd of the simple of mind and heart which surged about him and excited him and yet in reality never accepted. How well he knew that desire to be accepted! Once in an hour of great clarity of vision he had written: "We lonely ones, dreamers detached and disinherited passing our days in an artificial and icy negation . . . we whose cold breath spreads about us an unconquerable estrangement the moment we show our visionary and desperate faces among the living . . . we, poor ghosts of the world, whom men meet with a shy respect and leave as soon as possible lest our hollow and disillusioning glance disturb their simple joys . . . we all nourish within us a surreptitious but consuming yearning after the unsophisticated, the simple, the alive, after a little friendship, devotion, familiarity, uncomplicated happiness. That life from which we are excluded, that life we want, is not a vision of wild and tragic splendor; it is not the rare that we rare spirits want; the normal, decent, amiable—that is the goal of our dreams. Just that—life in all its endearing banality. . . ."

He glanced at those two. . . . Good-natured laughter interrupted the playing of the clarinettes which were distorting that deep and sweet and somber melody into a piercingly sentimental tune. He looked upon those two. He said to himself: You are that warm, delightful, foolish life of man which is in eternal contradiction to the life of the mind, of the spirit. Don't think that I despise you. Take no heed of my defensive gesture of contempt. I and my kind, accursed with knowledge, unblessed and speechless, we stand far from you and in our eyes burns a greed and a yearning to be like you. Does our pride stir within us? We are lonely none the less. Do we say to ourselves that the works of the spirit and of the creative vision unite us in a higher love with men of all places, all times? But with whom? With what men? Ever and ever only with our brothers in suffering and yearning and poverty! Never with you, O blue-eyed ones who get along so well without the life of the mind!

And now they danced again. The performance on the stage had come to an end. The orchestra sang out resonantly. On the smooth floor the couples turned and swayed. And Lily was dancing with the little painter. How daintily her lovely head rose from the calix of her silvery collar! In a serene and elastic alternation of stride and turn they glided about within a narrow space; his face was close to hers; smiling, yielding themselves not unrestrainedly to the sweet triviality of the rhythm, they continued their chat.

Suddenly something akin to the movement of molding and fashioning hands stirred within Detlev. And yet you are mine, he reflected, and I include you. Do I not see through your simple souls and smile? Do I not mark and preserve with an ironic love every naive impulse of your very bodies? At the sight of your merely instinctive existence there arise in me the powers of the living word, of the ironic vision, and my heart throbs with the triumphant desire to recreate you and, by the light of my art, deliver your foolish happiness to the cognition and pity of mankind!

True. But all that had arisen in him with so much proud defiance collapsed again into the old weariness and yearning. Ah, to be, but for one night, like these—not artist but man. To escape for once that curse which is an unalterable commandment: Thou must not be but behold, not live but create, not love but know. To live and love and accept but once in a mood of humbleness and simple-heartedness!

He quivered; he turned away. It seemed to him that in all these comely, flushed faces there appeared, at any awareness of him, an expression of both curiosity and revulsion. The desire to escape his silent conflict, to seek darkness and stillness, became irresistible. Yes, he would go. He would go without farewell even as he had left Lily's side, and at home lay his fevered and unblessed head upon a cool pillow. He walked toward the door.

Would she observe his going? How well he knew this process—this silent, proud, despairing withdrawal from some hall, some garden, some spot where people were merry, with the unadmitted hope that he could give the bright being for whom he was longing one shadowed moment, one of reflection, compunction, pity. He stood still and looked in her direction. His soul was all entreaty. Should he not stay, persist, be with her even though from afar in the hope of some unforeseen miracle? In vain. There was no possibility of communication, understanding, hope. Go, he said to himself, go into the darkness, lean your head upon your hands and weep, if there are tears in your world of icy desolation. . . . He left the hall.

A burning pain pierced him and also a senseless, irrational expectancy. Surely she must have seen him and have understood; she must, must come and follow him and stop him, if only out of pity, and say: "Stay, be happy, I love you." And he walked very slowly although he knew with an overwhelming and ironic certainty that she would not come, his little, dancing, chattering Lily.

It was two o'clock in the morning. The corridors were desolate. Behind the long tables of the coat-rooms the attendants were half asleep. No one but himself thought of leaving. He wrapped himself in his opera-coat, took his hat and stick, and left the building.

In the square, in the whitish gleam of the wintery fog, the cabs stood in long rows. The cabmen stood about in groups stamping on the snow to keep warm. Detlev motioned to one of them, and while the man got ready to draw up he stood near the door of the brilliantly lit vestibule and let the sharp and tonic air play upon his hot temples.

The flat after-taste of the champagne made him want to smoke. Mechanically he took out a cigarette, struck a match and lit it. And in this moment, just as the little flame of the match died, something happened to him that he did not understand at once. It left him confused and horrified and weak. It was unforgettable, never to be gotten over. . . .

For as his eyes recovered from the glare of that tiny flame there arose out of the darkness a half-savage, hollow-cheeked, red-bearded countenance whose inflamed and dark-circled eyes stared into his with an expression of wild scorn and strange, famished curiosity. Two or three paces away from him stood the man with the pain-scarred face. His fists were clenched in his trousers' pockets, the collar of his ragged coat was turned up; he was leaning against one of the wrought-iron posts that flanked the entrance of the theater. His glance glided over Detlev—took in the costly coat, the opera-glasses, the evening shoes, then rose again with that expression of half-lecherous and greedy wonder. Once the man raised his head with a brief, contemptuous gesture. Then the cold shook his body; his emaciated cheeks seemed to show deeper hollows; with a quiver he closed his lids, and the corners of his mouth drooped in a blending of spitefulness and sheer misery.

Detlev stood quite still. He struggled after comprehension. Suddenly he saw as in objective vision the air of wealth and comfort and well-being with which he, a partaker of the feast within, had left the vestibule, nodded to the cabby, taken a cigarette from his silver case. Involuntarily he raised his hand as though to strike it against his forehead. He took one step toward that man, breathed deep as though to speak, to explain. . . . And then, instead, he stepped silently into the cab and almost forgot to give his address to the driver. For he was utterly desperate, utterly beside himself at the hopelessness of making this darkness clear. . . .

What huge and fatal error and misunderstanding there was here. This man, famished, disinherited, had regarded him with greed and bitterness, with that enforced contempt that is bred of envy and of yearning! He had, in a sense, made a display of himself—this hungry man. Had not his shivering, his spiteful and sorrowful grimace had their origin in the wish to give pause to one who was so boldly happy and at ease, to create in that other one shadowed moment, one of reflection, compunction, pity? Detlev wanted to cry out: "You err, my poor friend. You missed your effect. To me the image of your wretchedness was no terrifying monition from a strange and fearful world. It did not put me to shame. For we are brothers!

"Is the pain there, comrade, high in the breast? Does it sting and burn? How well I know it. And why did you emerge? Why, instead of remaining proudly defiant in your darkness, do you seek out the glowing windows behind which are the music and the laughter of life? Ah, do I not know the morbid urge that drives you on to nourish thus this wretchedness of yours which can be called love as easily as hatred?

"Nothing of all that is lamentable in you is alien to me. And yet you thought to put me to shame! What is this life of the intellect? A game of hatred. What is art? Creative yearning! The home of both of us is in the same land of the cheated, the hungry ones, the accusers and deniers. And common to us both are also the treacherous hours of self-contempt in which we lose ourselves in our humiliating love of life and of the happiness that is folly. But you did not recognize your fellow-outcast."

Error, error! But even while his great compassion filled him quite, there gleamed deep within him a prescience at once sorrowful and sweet. Did that man only err? Is there any end of erring? Is not all our earthly yearning error and confusion—not least of all his own which fixed its desire upon life that is simple and instinctive and dumb, unilluminated by mind and art, unredeemed by living speech? Ah, we are brothers, we creatures of the peaceless and suffering Will; only we do not recognize each other. We stand in need of a different love . . . a different love. . . .

And while he sat at home among his books and pictures, beneath the sightless eyes of marble busts, he was moved by the mild words once spoken: Little children, love one another. . . .

Honeymoon

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE new President is coming from Vermont. He arrives in the Union Station. It is night. The new President is tired. Naturally pale, he now looks pallid. He also looks meager. He also looks scared. The Union Station looks terribly big and high. The lights in the ceiling of the concourse look terribly remote and lofty. Through a great cavern of Olympian illumination the new President trips along like a little ambling automatic toy, with fixed face and fixed untelling eyes, to where he is greeted by Mr. Secretary Hughes, robust, magnificent, more Olympian than the station. . . . Some Assistant Secretaries of This Department and of That Department appear on the edges of the station and wonder if it was, or was not, their duty to have greeted the new President in the absence of their Chiefs. They wonder and depart, while the new President stands receiving the greetings of Mr. Secretary Hughes and of Postmaster General New, representing all of Washington and all of the Republic. He is welcomed by two men. There is one of them for the right side of him and one of them for the left side of him as they put him into a motor-car to be driven to a hotel. So a new American ruler enters his capital. . . . Statesmen from every province of the Republic begin to arrive in the Union Station. They proceed to the hotel in which the new President is quartered. They are admitted to his apartment. They emerge. "He sat silent and listened." "He chattered like a magpie." "He is for getting into Europe." "He is against getting into Europe." "The Republic is safe." "Calvin Coolidge will prevent the Republic from falling." "He is a strong man." "He is greatly admired by the people of my State." "Harding left a great many Democrats in office." "Coolidge is a good party man." "I can tell from his face that he is going to be strong." "The country will be driven with a firm rein." "He did not say where he was going to drive it but, my dear boy, he is a good driver and I am riding with him." "We congratulate the country that the Republican Party once more has given it a great man in the presidential chair." . . . A broad desk. The new President behind it. In front of it a throng of newspaper correspondents. On the table their written questions for the new President to answer. The new President looks up from the table and gazes at his questioners—and through them at the whole public—calmly, steadily, firmly. He is not scared. He is even amused. He smiles, with the corners of his lips pulled down quizzically, and he says in a drawl: "I see a great many of you here. I do not flatter myself. Presently, as I become an old story, there will be fewer of you." This sally charms his questioners. They like a realistic person. They hopefully await his answers to their questions as he lifts those questions, one by one, from the table. He begins answering. It is a test moment. The new President wins it. To each question he gives an answer prompt, precise, apt, curt. He attacks the point, he covers it, he quits, and takes up the next question and the next point. He finishes. The correspondents clap their hands. He receives their appreciation with a smile—a little wry shy smile. Perhaps he was never really scared. Perhaps he was only—all the while—then and now and always—shy, a bit, along the deceptive New England surface of him. A shy surface, a totally calm and confident interior: such is often the temper bred in the clearings of Vermont. . . . The correspondents hasten to tell their readers that a strong man is in the White House. . . . Gentlemen in club corners are glad to hear that there is a strong man in the White House. They remember having been told that Mr. Coolidge once ate some strikers in Boston. What is a strong man? It is a man who eats strikers. Gentlemen in club corners thereupon readily believe that the correspondents are right in saying that the new President is a strong man. Mr. Coolidge, they conclude, has not changed. The United Mine Workers will now learn what's what in this country. . . . The honeymoon shines down upon the White House and envelops it with a silver screen on which the new President is seen moving forward on a high horse with a sword extended before him and with the edge of the sword gleaming invincibly with moonshine. . . . The correspondents assemble again before him and ask him what he is planning to do about the United Mine Workers. He tells them. He is going to see to it—he has already seen to it—that if there is a strike in the anthracite region there shall be, and will be, a sufficient supply of substitute fuels to keep the country from freezing. He tells them this fact, and takes up the next question. . . . The correspondents appear before him again and await again the customary presidential sermon against strikers. They got it in writing from President Wilson. They got it by word of mouth from President Harding. Shall not the strikers be seen as menacing the nation? Shall not the Republic be seen as tottering? Shall not all good men be summoned to hold the strikers down and to hold the Republic up? Apparently not. The new President, in response to inquiries, says through a spokesman that if there is a strike in the anthracite region there shall be, and will be, a sufficient supply of substitute fuels to keep the country from freezing. . . . No presidential sermon ever did actually prevent miners from striking or ever did actually make miners go back to work. Nor did any injunction ever do it. This President fails to try to do what cannot be done. . . . Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania telephones to the White House and asks about trying to reconcile the miners and the operators. The new President, in response to this overture, asks Mr. Pinchot to come to Washington. Mr. Pinchot comes, he talks with the new President, and he goes back to Pennsylvania to try to be—on his own responsibility—a reconciler. . . . The honeymoon still hanging in the sky, the White House reporters report that Mr. Pinchot is "cooperating" with the strong man in the White House. . . . Mr. Pinchot raises the miner 10 per cent. . . . Gentlemen in club corners sit up. Wages higher under a strong man? Can it be? . . . The honeymoon dips toward earth and shows a presidential magic sword dulled by dark cold common sense. A President who, when it is impossible to eat strikers, does not pretend to be engaged in eating them? A President who does not thrill and fool the club-corners of the country by stamping his foot to intimidate the strikers without intimidating them? The honeymoon sinks behind a lounge. . . . The new President continues to say only what he can do. He evidences no leadership at all toward things he cannot do. The things he can do are few. The things he cannot do are many. It was so with former Presidents. With this President it is tacitly and presidentially admitted to be so. A cold dawn breaks.

When the Franc Joins the Mark

By CONSTANT SOUTHWORTH

The paper mark was worth 105,000,000 to the dollar on September 15. When the new gold currency becomes a reality it will not be worth anything.

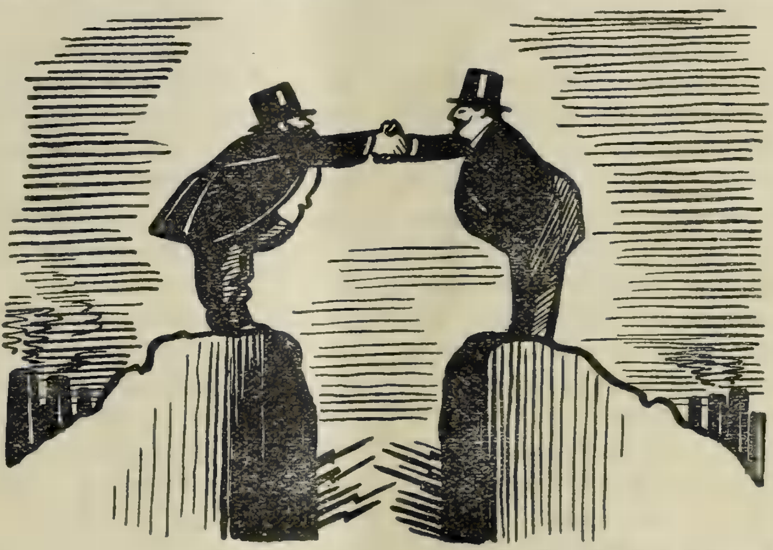
THE mark is lost. God save the franc!

The German mark keeps on its headlong journey downhill. Its collapse is the external manifestation of the economic and social collapse of one of the world's greatest nations. It betokens misery—physical and mental wretchedness—on a scale seen only at rare intervals in the world's history.

The French franc, on the other hand, has been comparatively stable for some months at slightly less than one-third of its nominal value. French industry seems prosperous. In May, for the first time in many years, exports exceeded imports. French government credit, though not as strong as it has sometimes been, is sound—French bonds rank well on the world's exchanges. France apparently is one of the oases in the European desert of economic desolation and prostration. Have not the French then good reason to congratulate themselves?



Drawing by Art Young

Hands Across the Ruhr

"Discussions between French and German industrialists continue."—Press Dispatch.

No, they have not. It is hard to see how the franc inside of four or five years, probably less, can help following the mark, and with it drawing France into a slough of despond similar to but not quite so deep as that in which Germany is now wallowing. Why?

The reason is that no nation which consistently fails by substantial margins to balance its budget can ultimately avoid increasing its circulation of paper currency—and when the printing presses have once got well going, there is no stopping them. France has made a good start toward a financial debacle. Since the beginning of the war her budgets have been in a sorry plight. With characteristic naivete, the French Government since the war has been setting aside a large proportion of its expenditures into a so-called "recoverable" budget of which not a sou is covered by tax receipts. It is covered by borrowings from the elastic savings of the French people. The idea, when this system was established, was that Germany would before long make reparation payments large enough to let the French Government pay off all the money it should borrow on "recoverable" account. Then everybody would be happy.

Unfortunately for the poor French rentier (holder of French government bonds), it has been demonstrated that Germany for some years, at any rate, cannot possibly muster the surplus of exports which alone would enable her to acquire the bills of exchange necessary for reparation payments. At the present time Germany cannot export enough to pay for sufficient food and raw materials to keep her economic machine from disintegrating. Moreover, France's venture in the Ruhr has shown that forcible attempts to collect from Germany only add to the French budget deficit. France may succeed in forcing Germany into the condition of a vassal state or in dividing her into a score of quarreling districts—that is, she may put Germany out of the economic race—but the process can only add to the difficulties of the French budget situation.

Due to the loans necessitated by the repeated budget deficits, the French public debt increased from 33.6 billion francs at the end of 1913 to the colossal sum of 280 billion francs at the end of 1922. The latter sum includes only the domestic debt and that portion of the foreign debt which was borrowed from private lenders abroad—in other words, that part of the French debt the paying of interest on which is of immediate concern to French government credit. The debt to foreign governments, amounting to approximately 100 billion francs at present exchange, upon which no interest or sinking-fund charges are being paid, may be ignored for our purposes here. The interest and other charges for 1922 on the 280 billions, according to the budget estimates, were 10.7 billions, while the total revenue except through borrowing for the same year was estimated at 23 billions. The debt service was thus practically half of the total real revenue. The most recent estimates for 1923, made in the course of the Senate debate on the budget bill, place the debt service at about 60 per cent of the revenue.

Unless a miracle happens to the French national psychology, the deficits will continue. France will continue to squander money on the Ruhr and similar projects. Her economists will continue to deplore wasteful public-works programs. She will make loans for military purposes to Eastern European countries. She will lavish money on armament to hold her place in the Near East and elsewhere on the earth—as well as above the earth, with her aircraft. The reconstruction work will undoubtedly be continued, for it is little more than half completed and its suspension would throw large numbers out of work.

On the side of receipts, France will talk bravely but do little about increasing revenue from taxation. The French legislature recently rejected a scheme to prevent wholesale evasion of the income tax. It also rejected the proposal of the Minister of Finance for a horizontal increase in tax rates. We shall hear, as we have heard recently, reports of great mathematical victories—large anticipated deficits valiantly wiped out by raising the estimates of revenue expected from various taxes and lowering the estimates of expenditures. And even if France should make a sincere attempt to reduce uneconomic expenditures and increase revenue from taxation, it would probably be impossible to prevent the growth of the public debt. The fixed payments which she has to meet, of which the debt service is the greatest, must surely swamp the ship of state unless there be a national consecration to debt reduction. Such a consecration would involve a degree of universally distributed discernment, devotion, and education beyond the bounds of achievement in the time available. In passing we may remark that France has not yet paid off any appreciable amount of the loans she contracted to meet the indemnity for the Franco-Prussian War of 1871.

The deficits must then continue and the debt must grow larger, and with it the interest on the debt. As stated above, the debt service is now about 60 per cent of real receipts. It will not be many years before the debt service approaches 100 per cent of real receipts, for borrowings of from 20 to 30 billions a year go on regularly. These recent borrowings are at higher rates than the old loans, a considerable portion of which (the old loans) is carried at rates varying from 3 to 5 per cent. Recent issues of treasury bills have cost the Government as high as 6½ and 7 per cent. This means that the debt service is increasing in greater proportion than the debt itself. The present 60 per cent ratio of debt service to revenue will assuredly mount.

As that ratio gets near 100 per cent, the Government will have to increase its paper money in circulation. One will see the government borrowings from the Bank of France steadily rising. The French Government will regularly discount its treasury bills with the Bank of France, receiving in return the latter's irredeemable notes, just as the German Government does with the Reichsbank. As the rates of interest on new borrowings rise, the old loans, bearing lower rates of interest, will go lower and lower in value. The franc, except during short periods when the Government artificially bolsters it, will go lower on the world's exchange markets. The French citizens, who hitherto seem to have had inexhaustible bond-absorption capacities, will lose the greatest faith of their lives—their confidence in their Government—for they will witness their life savings slipping. Even if they do not understand the meaning of falling French exchange, they will understand the meaning of prices rapidly rising, their own wages or profits rising much less rapidly, their government bonds (which have a remarkably wide distribution and are an important source of income in France) actually decreasing in value, and the interest on these bonds remaining the same in depreciated paper as it formerly was in higher-value currency.

The credit of the Government may deteriorate slowly, or again it may vanish overnight. Whichever course it follows, it will be interesting to see how the French people take their financial ruin. Germany has taken hers in the main calmly. The majority of her people have, so far at any rate, been willing to suffer silently. One important reason is that they realize that the foreign oppressor's heavy hand has had much to do with their country's plight and that their own Government is therefore only partially to blame. Another reason is, that of all peoples in the world they are the most disposed to submit to governmental authority. But it is different in France. The French Government's "alibi" of Germany's perverseness in not paying must some time lose its power of control. From childlike faith in his Government, the French rentier is likely to graduate to envenomed resentment. There will be no foreign oppressor for him to blame. The French Revolution recalls interesting possibilities for the Frenchman who does not like his Government. It will be just as well not to be around when the bottom goes out of French government credit—particularly for the Minister of Finance.

The franc then is going to follow the mark. And the main reason will be the overwhelming inclination of French statesmen to indulge in oratory and avoid facing economic facts. Less actual undernourishment among the French people will result than in Germany, due to a greater degree of agricultural self-sufficiency in France than in Germany. But as in Germany the whole industrial system and mechanism of commodity exchange will be turned inside out. The ultimate result, combined with continued chaos in Germany, may be the permanent partial deindustrializing of all Western Europe, including neutral countries and Great Britain. But we anticipate. First let us watch what happens in France when the franc goes under.

The Revolt in Spain*

By SAMUEL M. WAXMAN

ALTHOUGH the Spaniard as an individual is the most democratic of persons, the government of Spain is the most autocratic in Europe, if we are willing to except the temporary dictatorships in Russia and Italy. In twentieth-century Spain the King still rules by divine right, makes and unmakes ministries, appoints senators for life, hand-picks army officers and church dignitaries, and creates grandees who in medieval style are exempted from paying taxes. Buttressed by grandees, life senators, army officers, and high ecclesiastics, Alfonso is nevertheless a prisoner of the Spanish political system. Without their support he would lose his job and without his support they would lose their privileges. This close corporation controls the state and with its vast landed holdings wields a great economic power outside of the industrial cities. Like pre-war Russia, Spain has a comparatively small middle class. It is for the most part a pastoral and agricultural country, the larger part of the population consisting of peasants, sturdy, frugal, and unlettered. With a small group of intellectuals at their head, the constantly increasing bourgeoisie of the commercial and industrial cities is vociferously demanding a reform of the constitution of 1876 in political, military, religious, and economic affairs. It is the general belief outside Spain that Alfonso is a popular king. That is not true; he fears for his life like the former Czar of Russia, and rumors of his abdication are not unfounded. He realizes that his position is extremely insecure, but he is a good sport and will hold out to the bitter end. Since the World War, the rich in Spain have got richer, and the poor poorer, and the unpopularity of the

* This article, the result of recent first-hand observation in Spain, was written just before the announcement of the revolutionary uprising in Barcelona.

Moroccan War has brought the peasantry closer to the intellectuals and the labor organizations. A bloodless revolution such as is going on in England does not seem possible in Spain where popular education is practically unknown and where there is a very small prosperous middle class. The chasm between the classes is wide, and it looks as though it would be filled with blood before constitutional changes are made.

The thunderings of Spain's moral and intellectual leader, Miguel de Unamuno, philosopher, essayist, poet, and dramatist, must make the King and his entourage quake at times, but his only punishment has been demotion from rector to professor of Greek at the University of Salamanca. Unamuno's "Tragic Sense of Life," reviewed in The Nation of May 17, 1922, will explain to the American reader why the all-powerful church in Spain humiliated this latitudinarian Catholic. It was not his political utterances, but his religious heresies that got him into trouble. He browbeats the King under the very shadow of the royal palace and went so far recently as to walk into the lion's den. When rebuked by his followers for such subservience to royalty, he replied that he was not afraid to tell the King what he thought of him face to face. And so Unamuno fulminates from his ivory tower in lofty philosophical language, now and then stepping down to lecture platform and newspaper column. He is always vigorous and forceful, but never violent, and so reaches only the intellectuals. José Ortega y Gasset, also a professor, writes a work entitled "Invertebrate Spain," a most cruel and searching examination of conditions in his country, and the book is allowed to circulate freely. In general the American has the feeling that there is more freedom of speech in Spain than in the United States. Spain is at war and these leaders are obstructionists. But the Spanish Government has a way of permitting revolutionists to let off steam by talking and writing. Let the foreigner hazard the statement that Spain is surely ripe for a revolution with such incendiary material in the hands of the people, and the answer invariably is: "These are but 'words, words, words.' Spaniards are excellent rhetoricians, but what we need is action and for action we must have men of action." But just as the French Revolution and the Russian Revolution had their prophets, so men like the late Angel Ganivet, Unamuno, and Ortega y Gasset are the prophets of the Spanish Revolution, and the Moroccan War just as the World War in Russia may prove to be a two-edged sword. Spaniards are being taught action in Morocco.

Indirectly the teaching of the prophets reach the people of Spain, who read very little, through the newspapers and the Ateneo of Madrid which has begotten many smaller Ateneos throughout Spain. From the Ateneo of Madrid, at once a forum, an intellectual club, a library, and an extension university, has come almost every political, economic, and educational reform that Spain has had in the past hundred years. It is not so highbrow as it once was, and until very recently its president was the political liberal leader, Romanones, who resigned a few months ago because he refused to sanction a manifestation in the streets against the war policy of the Government. In spite of his opposition, the Ateneo led a peaceful manifestation of 100,000 people against the leniency of the Government toward incompetent and criminally neglectful army officers. This demonstration brought about a change of ministry.

Ever since the terrible disaster at Anual, Morocco, of July, 1921, when an entire army was cut to pieces, ten thousand men, including the commanding general, killed, and one thousand taken prisoner, the favorite game among Spanish politicians has been to "pass the buck." Day after day the newspapers reiterate the urgent necessity of placing the responsibility for this catastrophe, but each time that the investigators find out too much, the ministry either resigns or is forced to resign, and no scapegoat can be found who is willing to accept martyrdom for the sake of whitewashing the King and his group. If the King will appoint incompetents to high civil and military office then he must accept the consequences. Public opinion is at such fever heat today that the Government dare not fly in the face of it, and on several occasions the King has had to yield to it. The dissolution of the juntas, groups of army officers who had attempted to run the army from within, is a recent case in point. The King realizes that he is playing a dangerous game trying to please his entourage and placate the public at the same time. Thus far he has compromised by yielding a little to the one or to the other. The day is coming, however, when he must either abdicate or throw in his lot with the people. The second alternative is a difficult feat, as Louis XVI and Nicholas discovered.

Sporadically we see newspaper reports about Spanish military operations in Morocco which mean little or nothing to us. The Spanish papers headline the Moroccan war news which is so heavily censored that it takes several days for the truth to leak out. And so as soon as the public realizes one reverse another has taken place. Now and then there is a mutiny at a port of embarkation. The latest occurred only a few days ago at Malaga where a Basque contingent had to be marched aboard a transport under the guns of loyal troops. The anti-war feeling is spreading more and more every day, and the Government is making every effort to bring the war to a successful end before the patience of the people who are sending their sons to slaughter and paying burdensome taxes becomes exhausted, and before the loyal troops become disaffected and join the mutineers.

Outside military and government circles there is no enthusiasm for this war anywhere in Spain. What is it all about? Since the expulsion of the Moslems in 1492, Spain has held portions of North Africa, and in the coast cities from Tangier to Oran there are large groups of Spaniards. Since the beginnings of the Entente Cordiale between France and England through which France recognized England's sphere of influence in Egypt and England recognized France's claim to Morocco, Spain has demanded a share of the spoils. After several international conferences, Spain was allotted a small strip of the coast from Tangier to the Algerian frontier but exclusive of the city of Tangier itself, which was too strategic and rich a prize for powerful nations to bestow upon a weaker nation. Not being able to come to an agreement between themselves, France and England have compromised by making Tangier an international city, and by the Treaty of Versailles it temporarily shares the same fate as Danzig and Fiume. A Franco-Anglo-Spanish conference which is to decide its ultimate destiny has been promised for some time, but it has been postponed because of more pressing international difficulties. France, who occupies the greater part of Morocco and who has no Moroccan port on the Mediterranean, naturally covets it, and Spain claims it on the ground that it falls within the territory allotted to her. But England is not particularly anxious for either of them to possess the finest harbor of Morocco which even more than Gibraltar forms the gate to the Mediterranean. It looks now with the strained relations between France and England as if Tangier would either remain an international city or go to the weaker of the two contestants, Spain. A new complication has arisen. According to newspaper dispatches Italy has sent a warship to Tangier and proclaimed her candidacy for the possession of the ancient Pillar of Hercules.

After the Spanish American War the Spaniards heaved a sigh of relief. Their great empire in Europe, in America, and in the Philippines had dwindled down to a part of the Iberian peninsula, the Canary Islands, and a few possessions on the northern and western coasts of Africa. They set about to improve their economic situation at home which had been neglected through centuries of almost continuous European and colonial warfare. But since 1904 and especially since the World War, with the fate of Tangier hanging in the air, the Spanish Government has been trying unsuccessfully to pacify her strip of Morocco commonly known as the Rif. And so by the irony of fate Spain who escaped from the World War finds herself engaged once more in an unsuccessful colonial war, impelled by national pride and by the fact that a group of capitalists has large financial interests in the Rif. It can be easily understood why Spain was so little inclined to take sides with the Allies in the World War. It is more likely that had she gone into the war she would have thrown in her lot with Germany, for Spain as well as Germany felt that she had not been treated fairly in the partitioning of North Africa. Germany's offer of Gibraltar and Morocco was a tempting bait which might have precipitated her into the war or at least given her the opportunity to bargain for the freedom of Gibraltar and a larger share in Morocco had she been more powerful. As it was, her hands were tied. English and French capital have a strong hold in Spain. The mining regions in the north of Spain and the wealth of the city of Bilbao are largely in English hands, the fortress of Gibraltar would have been a great military asset, and Portugal was England's ally. Large railroad interests are in the hands of the English and the French, although considerable holdings have been transferred to Spanish capitalists since the war. The anti-French feeling in Spain is bitter. The memory of the Napoleonic invasion is still vivid, and the more recent exile of the religious congregations at the time of the separation of the church and state in France has still further alienated devout Catholics. But what rankles most of all is France's occupation of Morocco and England's past acquiescence in French policy.

In spite of the Agadir and Tangier incidents, which threatened to bring war in 1907 and 1912, little has been said about North Africa since the opening of the war. Since the Treaty of Versailles the status of Morocco has been regarded as a fait accompli. Yet the partitioning of North Africa was one of the chief causes of the war; had the French and English been more generous with Germany, the Great War might have been possibly avoided or at least postponed. But now the Hispano-Moroccan War and the struggle over Tangier have pushed North Africa once more to the front of the stage and it looks as though it were destined to stay there for some time to come.

It is only during the past hundred years that North Africa has been reannexed to Europe. While the Turk was busy holding his own in Southeastern Europe, France and England seized Egypt and Algeria. Later France added Tunis, and in attempting to annex Morocco against a hostile Germany added fuel to the flames of a European war. When Italy seized Tripoli in 1912 while Turkey was fighting the Balkan Wars, it seemed very evident that in return for the acquiescence of England and France, who controlled the Mediterranean, she would either remain neutral in the event of war between the Triple Alliance and the Entente or side with the Entente. As we have seen she did both, and now having recovered her lost provinces she is a serious rival to France in the struggle over the control of the Mediterranean. The fact that Tunis is largely populated by Italians and the constant friction between French and Italians do not augur future peace, especially under the present militarist dictatorship in Italy. Another glance at the map will show the proximity of Sicily to Tunis—which with the boot of Italy forms a lake within a lake bounded by Italy, France, and Spain on the north, and Tunis, Algeria, and Morocco to the south, with England intrenched at both ends, at Malta and at Gibraltar. The geographical conformation of this western Mediterranean lake explains the presence of Italy's warship at Tangier.

Everything in Europe points to a jockeying for position in the event of a future war. France, who is building up a tremendous empire in Northwestern and Central Africa, has already made her continental alliances, for it is only by force of arms that she can maintain her empire. England is mainly concerned with preventing her empire from disintegrating, and so has been willing to grant freedom to Egypt on paper while she maintains a large army there. All this may sound cynical to American ears which have been lulled by the phrases "war to end war" and "a war to make the world safe for democracy" and by the hopes and promises of the League of Nations, but at the present writing a league without the United States, Germany, and Russia is a sorry farce in a Europe filled with bitter rivalries and jealousies. Neither England nor France want war. With the possible exception of Tangier England does not want territory in North Africa, but neither does she want France to have more. Her attitude toward Italy is not clearly defined. Are they possibly coquetting with each other? North Africa is, then, a part of Europe. Algeria is no longer a colony, it is a province of France, it is divided into départements and sends its senators and deputies to Paris. Tangier has been long one of the most cosmopolitan cities in the world, and France's portion of Morocco has been almost completely "pacified" under the intelligent and wise rule of Maréchal Lyautey.

Spain on the contrary has been muddling along, losing the money and prestige she won through non-interference in the World War. Although she possesses a certain amount of up-to-date equipment, such as aeroplanes, tanks, and gas, the war in the Rif does not lend itself to the use of such modern paraphernalia. It is a guerrilla war fought in the mountains, and the enemies are nomadic and fanatic mountaineers who do not come out into the open. Rarely does the Spanish soldier see his enemy who fights with the fanatic, fatalistic fury of the Moslem. His duty is to kill as many enemies as possible. If he gets killed, it is Allah's will. Nor do the Spaniards use their superior war materials to greatest advantage. The Moroccan War requires skilled engineering, and unfortunately for Spain she has few trained engineers and lacks technical schools for the training of army officers. Then, too, Spanish Morocco is partly under civil and partly under military jurisdiction, and there is often friction and jealousy between the ministries of state and war. But worst of all the Spanish army is cursed with graft and favoritism in the appointment and promotion of officers. Temperamentally the Spaniard is an intense individualist; cooperation is foreign to his nature. He will not sell his soul to the modern Moloch efficiency. Furthermore he is fighting only half-heartedly for a cause to which he is either violently opposed or in which he has no interest. Thus from top to bottom the Spanish army lacks that rigid discipline which is so necessary to the successful military machine of today.

But the greatest difficulty that Spain has to contend with is the fact that it is a land divided against itself. Since the Spanish American War regionalism and separatism have threatened several times to plunge Spain into civil war. Geographically the Iberian peninsula is a unit, but Portugal, strongly dominated by British influence, and Gibraltar, are constant reminders of Spain's past inability to unify the peninsula. But while Portugal and Gibraltar are primarily sentimental problems, Catalonia and Viscaya are burning actualities. The Catalans and the Basques, the richest industrial and commercial peoples of Spain, speak non-Castilian languages. They are more energetic than the agricultural and pastoral peoples of central and southern Spain, and have recently joined hands in the economic war with the central government. The Basques are a hardy mountain race which was never subjugated by the Mohammedans, and although they speak a language totally different from the Romance Castilian, they have thrown in their lot for centuries with central Spain. Their present difficulties are economic rather than political and are centered in the industrial population of Bilbao and in the adjacent mining regions. The Catalans have not only economic but also political grievances against the central government. Their language is more closely related to Provençal than to Castilian and morally they resemble the French rather than the Spanish. They are very proud of their literature and culture, and especially since the war, with its talk about the rights of small peoples to choose their own form of government, they have been very turbulent. Barcelona, the second largest city of the Mediterranean, the "New York of Spain," is a hotbed of discontent, and is frequently under martial law. Economic questions have become so inextricably woven with political issues that it is very hard to separate them, but the great struggle seems to be between the ruling privileged class of wealthy landholders centered about the King and the working classes of the cities and intellectuals. It looks now as though Catalonia must go through the same bloody experience as Ireland before a compromise can be reached. Feeling is running higher than ever before because of the Moroccan War to which Catalonia is even more violently opposed than the other provinces because of its interference with commercial prosperity. Extremists have gone so far as to petition the League of Nations for complete autonomy. Thus far the Catalans have found support only among the Basques, but a feeling of unrest is spreading to other urban centers which have large industrial populations.

The Spanish Government has failed to bring the war in Morocco to a successful conclusion. All thinking Spaniards who may possibly disagree on every other issue are determined to place the responsibility for failure where it belongs, and since the King has been either unwilling or unable to punish the guilty and incompetent, they are making every effort to take the responsibility of ruling Spain out of his hands and place it in their own. The King and his entourage are determined not to lose any of their medieval privileges; they are determined to save their faces in European politics by winning the war in Morocco; they are determined to hold out to the bitter end and—as was the case with Russia—the end will be bitter.

Mussolini Starts a War

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Milan, September 2

CENTRAL Milan is ablaze with excitement. The news has reached the city of the murder of the Italian mission in Epirus in the performance of its duty in establishing the border of Albania. Gray-green uniforms fill the great arcade near the cathedral. There is the rumble of a thousand men talking at once. A detachment of tired boys passes on the street, grotesque in misfitting uniforms and bulging knapsacks, their feet clattering heavily on the stones.

Gentlemen with spats and curled mustaches sip coffee at cafe tables under the sky and curse Greece. A middle-aged soldier goes by holding a little girl very tightly in his arms. The bored look has gone from the faces of the young officers. The street women come closer to the cafe tables.

The Fascisti get to work. Tablets commemorating Greek heroes in Genoa are torn down and Italian ones substituted. The commander of a Greek ship in Naples is ordered to run up the Italian flag. The chorus for war is almost unanimous. A commission merchant of chocolate products tells me gleefully that business will increase during war. Of the newspapers, only Avanti tries to analyze the situation honestly and even Avanti does not speak in ringing tones. The Italian Socialists have no love for the Greek Government and they have vivid recollections of recent Fascist raids. Giustizia, organ of the right-wing Socialists, dodges the issue and uses its front page for a long discussion of the inheritance tax on the day when other papers are supporting the Government's war measures.

The situation provides an excellent stage setting for Mussolini. Fighting is the safest thing for the immediate future of Fascism because Fascism lives by fighting. Things have been getting dull at home. The black shirts are losing some of their first glamor. In fact these shirts are beginning to look uncommonly like workmen's shirts. War! A happy thought, worthy of Seward. Anybody can run a government during a war. Mussolini of the iron jaw and sick eyes, leader of Italy in a war for justice! No longer merely a Fascist interloper but an international leader with the pose of Napoleon and the morality of Zane Grey. Ecco! A note to Greece that would draw wrath from China.

The note is one of the most atrocious in modern diplomatic history, demanding that Greece not only apologize but complete an investigation within five days, pay 50 million lire indemnity, and practically admit responsibility for the crime. Greece answers with ample regrets, offers to pay homage to the Italian flag, and to pay an indemnity to the families of the victims. Mussolini pretends that the answer is a rejection of the Italian note and orders the Italian military forces to occupy the island of Corfu, an important island off the coast of Greece.

In all the press there is scarcely a voice to ask: "Was the Greek Government really responsible? Was the murder committed by private brigands without the connivance of the Government?" The Corriere della Sera of Milan says that the assassination was committed by men who "seem to have been garbed in the style and color of Greek soldiers." But this paper which has the reputation of being one of the most scrupulous in Italy offers no proof.

The technique of getting mad is still the same as it was before the World War. Not a single point in the process has been changed. First comes the "international crime" in which some citizen is killed by individuals in a foreign country. Then comes the report of the incident in the press, always with headlines and always with extreme bias. If the offending nation is weak, the offended government issues an ultimatum. It is pompous and irritating, overshooting the mark. The opposition government is insulted. Its national honor is at stake. It rejects the ultimatum conditionally with explanations. The press of both countries declares its solidarity with the governments in this national crisis. The offended government declares war not so much because its citizens were killed but because it cannot extricate itself from the tangle of its own diplomacy.

It is easy to blame the governments without blaming the people. In this case the Italian people want war. The street cars are full of people who are talking about "bombardare la Grecia." Militancy has been ground into them by their nationalist education. Compulsory military service for all young men keeps thousands of impatient youngsters ready for the bloodiest emergency that the diplomacy of old men can create.

In occupying Corfu Mussolini made his great mistake. The capture of Corfu is a threat to the control of the Balkans by England and France because Corfu is the Gibraltar of the Adriatic. In the long run he cannot hold it without the consent of England and France and neither England nor France is anxious to give Italy control of the Adriatic. Mussolini is in a dilemma: He cannot afford to oppose England and France and he cannot withdraw ingloriously from Corfu without a great loss of prestige in Italy.

Greece is too weak to win a war or to stop a war. If the war is stopped, it will be because of the power of foreign capital speaking through the English and French governments. That power is especially important for the Fascisti because they have in mind an elaborate program of denationalization. They propose to sell the railroads and telephones, and perhaps the parcel post to private capitalists. Where is the money to come from for the purchase of these public utilities? It must come largely from abroad. So Mussolini is likely to listen to the voice of foreign capital.

Italy shows no respect for the League of Nations as such but only for the economic and military power of the English and French governments. La Sera of Milan remarks: "Italy will go to the court of the League of Nations and to the Council of Ambassadors when France goes there with the question of the Ruhr, and England with her mandates." Et tu, Italia! If Italy cannot be persuaded or compelled to use the machinery of the League of Nations, that outcast institution will have no place to lay its head.

In the Driftway

SIR BASIL ZAHAROFF is a great man. The Drifter never takes sides in any political discussion, so that he does not base his opinion of Sir Basil on the fact that he has just given the Greeks two and a half million dollars to placate the latest Tyrant of Europe. No, it is not Sir Basil's generosity that makes him great; it is his restraint. Sir Basil, so the Drifter reads, is writing his memoirs. Every word is written by his own hand and each year of his life is treated in a separate volume (Sir Basil was born in 1850). If any reader feels that restraint so far is lacking, let him only read further: Sir Basil has made a will, and in his will he provides that his memoirs be destroyed after his death.

* * * * *

TO state the case plainly, the Drifter has never heard the like of that. Accurate statistics are lacking, but he is nevertheless sure that eleven out of every fourteen persons are writing their memoirs; of the eleven, six are doing it with their own hands. And accurate statistics are not lacking to show that not one of these persons will decree that his memoirs be destroyed either before or after death. Sir Basil, therefore, stands alone upon the peak of this extraordinary eminence. It is doubtless only the Drifter's perversity that makes him yearn more than he ever yearned for anything to read Sir Basil's memoirs; and that makes him resolve never to read any memoirs to which their author does not will destruction.

* * * * *

IT may be that Sir Basil has set a dangerous literary precedent. If the reading public should follow the Drifter's example, authors already harassed will be on the horns of a painful dilemma: either preserve your book and let it remain unread, or destroy your book and rouse the interests of the reading public too late. We shall then have a condition similar to that during the reign of the First Emperor of China. That worthy, sincerely believing himself to be the greatest man who had ever lived, believed also that his reign should mirror his greatness. It was plain, he reasoned, that nothing finished before he came to the throne could equal what came after. Accordingly he ordered that all books be destroyed; literature, he felt, should begin with himself. The result was that for years afterward the favorite sport of an unknown author was to bring forth a book of his own composition, declaring it to be one of the lost books before the First Emperor. The Drifter is pleased to offer this suggestion to persons who shall go on living and writing after books begin to be destroyed in order to be read.

* * * * *

IT may be, however, that the best way to reduce the production of literature is to destroy the typewriter. On all sides this infernal machine is being congratulated on its fiftieth birthday. But besides being the cause of the decline of chirography, the typewriter has made the lives of authors and typesetters so easy that almost anyone can write a book and have it read at least once. The Drifter is willing to begin the holocaust by taking an ax to his own machine, and he guarantees that the result will be fewer Driftways.

The Homely Truth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When will The Nation take time off from abusing the fire that won't burn the stick that won't beat the dog that won't, etc., to turn its batteries on the pig that won't go over the stile? Which of the nations is demanding the original pound of flesh? The United States is demanding return of money lent to its Allies; the Allies are demanding money from their debtors. Is France more or less justified in exacting reparation for devastation wrought on her soil in violation of recognized laws of warfare than we in demanding return of money lent to our Allies and largely spent in our own country for munitions to fight battles in which we were vitally interested?

Are we prepared to make financial sacrifice to restore peace to the world? If we are, let us go to Europe and propose limitation of armaments and military expenditures. Let us attach to our proposals the offer to consider the whole question of reparations and war debts as one, which it really is, and let us be prepared, as the wealthiest nation, to make the largest sacrifice.

If we are not prepared to do these things, we have but one part to play—hold our tongue.

Are the Russians Cruel?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Gorki's stinging indictment of Russian cruelty in your issue of September 5 says and implies a number of horrid things apt to mislead the uninformed reader. The first sweeping implication is that Russians in general and peasants in particular are, essentially and racially, downright fiends with a thirst for revolting forms of cruelty and torture. At best, they are insensible brutes to whom bloodshed is mere sport and human life is dirt cheap. This fling means to hit all Russians irrespective of time, historical change, political class convulsions, education, and environment. The rural clodhopper, the factory worker, Whites and Reds alike, gloat over the sight of diabolical and ingenious devices for, and ways of, inflicting torture and crushing out human life, for all of them "are Russians."

Both my own experience in and out of Russia and the universal dictum do not bear out this contention. In my continuous and vital contacts, during the five years of the social convulsion in Russia, with the boys of the Soviet army units and the Russian Reds in general, I have not known of a single case where Russian Communists or mere 100 per cent peasants were guilty of any act of cruelty remotely suggesting anything implied in the above contention. During the fiercest days of the Red terror, under the Cheka, counter-revolutionists, foreign spies, brigands, gang leaders, and food profiteers were stood against a wall and shot down, but no preliminary torture of any kind was either practiced or allowed. The riff-raff of Denikin's and Wrangel's hordes, drawn from the very dregs of the Kuban and the Don, committed atrocities that age one with horror as they aged me, but neither these nor the Kishinev hordes are in the least typical of the Russian peasant. The White Guard officers did what a frenzied mob of the nobility or master class of any race will do when hurled at break-neck speed into the social pit by their former slaves.

The Siberian peasant who thought killing his Bashkir neighbor was a trifle compared with stealing his cow was of the hardened stock of the Siberian frontiersman very remotely suggesting the typical Russian. Besides, had Gorki taken the trouble to know him and his rough life and to realize what a cow meant to him the verdict would have been far less severe.

Are all Nordic Americans, Italians, and Magyars, racially and essentially and eternally, fiends of cruelty because of the atrocities committed by hooded klan mobs, prison wardens, phosphate-mine bosses who force their victims to rot away piecemeal in the pits, Colorado bull-pen thugs of yore, or by Mussolini's black-shirted brutes and Horthy's organized cutthroats?

"Bah"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation, the weekly Nation, the good Nation, the sensible Nation, the literary Nation was a weekly weekly, a good weekly, a sensible weekly, a literary weekly. Then came Sandburg, Carl Sandburg, Sandburg the writer, Sandburg the writer of dippy stories; and he wrote a story for the weekly Nation, the good Nation, the sensible Nation, the literary Nation. He called it The Two Sweetheart Dippies. How They Sat in the Moonlight on a Lumberyard Fence and Heard about the Sooners and the Boomers. "Thumbs down!" say the non-dippy readers, the sensible readers. "Bah, away with dippy fiction; away with Sooner and Boomer fiction; away with pig-pig-pig fiction, Bah!" (Bah speaks more than it means whenever it is spoken.)

So soon the Editors, not wishing to be called goofs, or snoofs, grave robbers, pickpockets, porch climbers, pie thieves, pie-faced mutts, bums, big bums, bigger bums, biggest bums, big greasy bums, dummies, rummies, or mummies, decided not to print any more dippy stories. For the thousands of good readers had made war on Sandburg, on Carl Sandburg, on Carl Sandburg the writer, on Carl Sandburg the writer of dippy fiction, of pig-pig-pig fiction, of black- and brown-striped fiction.

Thus The Nation became again the good Nation, the sensible Nation, the literary Nation.

"Bah," they said.

(Bah speaks more than it means whenever it is spoken—or written.)

Books for San Quentin

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The generous responses of Nation readers to earlier appeals, together with the present situation at San Quentin, are my excuse for one more brief communication. With about seventy I.W.W. now serving time at San Quentin and many more soon to be added, the demand for good reading and some variety is one which friends of constitutional liberty still outside will not be slow to answer.

By a rule of the prison neither periodicals nor books can be sent prisoners direct except by publishers. But, by the kindness of the warden, Mr. Johnston, other books can be sent to me and will then reach the men inside. Having been a regular visitor at the prison for three years, I suppose the warden has some confidence in my judgment, and has allowed me to loan many books from my own library to our comrades inside.

A desire was expressed today for Wells's "The Outline of History" and for "Ancient Society." If by any chance the historical books written by Prof. Carleton Hayes of Columbia University—one a two-volume history of Europe since 1815, another his history of the Great War—could be sent, these additions to the stock of available books would be wonderfully stimulating and educative. I will gladly act as a medium in this matter and answer all inquiries sent me.

A Parfit Gentil Knight

Industrial Democracy. By Glenn E. Plumb and William G. Roylance. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

THE late Glenn E. Plumb will forever remain an outstanding figure in the knight errantry of American industrialism. This big corporation lawyer and public-utility manager who forsook all in order to follow after that industrial democracy in which he so eagerly believed, and who out of his own experience and thought evolved a plan of economic control so remarkably similar to that simultaneously developed by the guildsmen in England—this man was of the type to make one glad to avow "I am an American." His untimely death is a loss not alone to the labor and liberal forces of the United States, but to that world-wide fellowship of choice spirits, whatever their political or economic beliefs, who possess a profound faith in the fundamental soundness of democracy as the true basis of social organization, and in the capacity of intelligent thinking, directed by honest good-will, to solve the economic problems of democratic society without recourse to violent revolution or destructive force. Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

And now we have Glenn Plumb's industrial last will and testament. It is not a book for the technical economist and political scientist, who will doubtless find in its large generalizations much to despise, and in its detailed statement of fact and argument many a salient open to gleeful attack. To the conventional profit-grabbing financier (not to the thoughtful business man) and to the pestiferous and rapidly multiplying young breed of "business" economists it will be matter for misunderstanding and merriment. In these days of disillusionment and distrust of all "solutions" it may even be doubted whether the common people will hear the prophet gladly. Yet to all who knew the man, the work will remain a source of inspiration and renewed faith. Witness the simple statement, signed by the presidents of fifteen powerful labor organizations, which immediately follows the dedication "To all who toil": "We can render no more valid service to our times than by the widest diffusion of these truths in which we believe."

Reduced to its simplest terms the book is an argument for the application of the principles of the Plumb Plan in modified form to all industries, as a means of realizing industrial democracy, substituting the service for the profits motive, meeting the condition of world bankruptcy "due to the accumulation of profits and the consequent impairment of the world's buying power," and thus pointing the way "by which a stricken and distracted world may emerge from the economic, political, social, and moral chaos into which the collapse of autocracy has plunged it." Mr. Plumb divides all industries into four groups: national public utilities; state and municipal public utilities; other industries based on grants or involving natural or economic monopoly; and all other industries. The first group will be owned by the Federal government; the second by the State or the municipality; the third by those who "invest" either their labor or their money; and the fourth according to the varying preference of those who are engaged in the various industries.

All industries in the first two groups will be leased to corporations without capital stock or bonds. Rates will be fixed by public agencies, and wages by boards of directors representing equally the public, management, and labor. If costs are reduced below rates, half the surplus will go as a dividend to management and labor, half to public surplus, to be used for extensions and betterments. When the surplus exceeds a fixed percentage rates will be automatically reduced, and wages and salaries (as distinct from dividends on wages and salaries) increased, thus keeping up the perpetual pursuit of increased efficiency, lower rates, and higher pay. A similar scheme will be applied to industries in the two private groups, but they will be privately financed, the investor of money or property getting capital stock bearing a limited, preferred, cumulative rate of dividend, almost exactly like preferred stock at present. But—and here is the specially interesting point—the "investor" of labor will get labor stock, carrying no claim on the property of the corporation, non-transferable, and valid only during employment. It will carry voting power, however, on the basis of a dollar's wages equaling a dollar's dividends. After payment of wages, salaries, and other costs, preferred dividends on stocks will be paid. Any excess earnings will be surplus, to be divided into corporate surplus and public surplus. The former may be used as determined by the stockholders, both capital and labor, any distribution being in proportion to stock of both kinds, of course. Public surplus will be expended to improve plant or to retire capital. Provision is made for the reduction of price if surplus proves excessive. By the application of such a plan, Mr. Plumb hoped to transfer the control of industry to those directly interested in it, whether as workers or as active investors of capital, to transfer the emphasis from profits to service, to remove from industry the growing burden of capitalized profits, to get rid of bankers' control, and to secure constantly rising efficiency and falling prices.

This is not the place for a criticism of the plan or of the scheme for its detailed application to railroads, coal mining, and agriculture contained in the book. It cannot be said that Mr. Plumb ever successfully solved the problem of wage-fixing which is central to the success of his plan, though he did offer useful suggestions. Other difficulties are surmounted by an act of faith, and plenty of fault may be found with some of the detailed financial calculations. But when all deductions have been made, we have here the work of one of those robust Americans who have dared believe, and have realized the need of adding to faith earnest thinking. Glenn Plumb's life and work will offer suggestions to the growing number of those who honestly and earnestly seek for methods of getting forward out of our present perplexities.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

The Economic Order

Incentives in the New Industrial Order. By J. A. Hobson. Thomas Seltzer. $1.75.

Economic Motives. By Zenas Clark Dickinson. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

THE existing economic order is natural and right, because it rests upon human nature, and human nature cannot be changed. This is the underlying assumption of most defenders of things as they are. In a more elaborate form it is implicit in the theories of the classical economists. All of them were amateur psychologists; all of them accounted for economic institutions by tracing the actions of men back to certain "motives." Among later followers of these pioneers their psychological analysis dropped out of sight or was taken for granted, but for many years conventional economics developed on this primitive basis of psychological assumptions.

Since then psychology has traveled a long road, or rather, many roads. As it approaches the stature of an exact science based on experimental data, generality after generality is exploded, and few certainties remain. One certainty is, however, that although the guesses of the early economists were suggestive, they were far indeed from a precise statement of psychological "laws" on which a dependable economic science might be built.

Mr. J. A. Hobson, in his little book on incentives in the new industrial order, attacks the popular assumption on a less fundamental ground. He does not argue that human nature is a different article from that described to us by the classical economists, but he does contend that the present industrial order is not the one which they accounted for. Whether human nature changes or not, human institutions do change. Free competition has disappeared in many basic industries and cannot be restored; in these industries economic self-interest cannot be depended upon to further the general good. Public control is necessary.

From this starting-point Mr. Hobson's inquiry is directed to the question of how the ordinarily assumed motives will work under the new order. The inquiry answers the usual objections made to public ownership or control. Will sufficient new capital be forthcoming? Will inventors, technicians, and managers be well enough rewarded to call forth their best ability? Will there be effective discipline and productivity of labor? Will enterprise be killed by bureaucratic red tape? Will the consumer be protected? Mr. Hobson believes that the elimination of the wastes of private industry will produce larger savings in the aggregate than are piled up at present—in part by the elimination of industrial depressions. He cites the familiar example of large war production with a diminished labor supply to prove the point. He contends that the highest ability is even now called forth as much by public recognition and a desire to serve as by financial rewards. Labor, he thinks, is badly disciplined and rebellious now, and will react much better to an atmosphere of mutual advantage than to the present atmosphere of compulsion and fear. Since he favors the nationalization only of those enterprises which are already controlled in large units, he does not look for an extension of the dead hand of bureaucracy, but advocates the counteracting effect of democratic control. For the protection of the consumer he looks chiefly to special representatives of consumers in governing boards, as well as to the cooperative movement.

It is a valuable little study which will set the general reader thinking, though it does not visualize the fundamental issues arising from recent developments of psychology.

Mr. Dickinson's book on economic motives is a more carefully documented piece of work, which adopts the opposite attack on the subject. It does not seriously discuss the changes which have taken place in economic institutions, or attempt to contemplate any new order, but merely reexamines traditional economic theory in the light of modern psychology.

The book is painstaking—so much so that in some respects it is more the usual doctor's thesis than a real orientation of the subject. It is not necessary to begin with Aristotle or to devote nearly half the book to an analysis of the psychology of the classicists. When the author finally arrives at the modern schools of psychology, he presents a summary which will add much to the knowledge of most readers. Because psychology itself has so few definite results to offer, however, and opinions differ so widely in the regions where guessing is still possible, he is forced to make his own evaluations, which may or may not be accepted. Certain large conclusions do appear to be warranted. "Human nature" is capable of a good deal of variability. Innate instincts are comparatively few in number, and may be led into innumerable paths through association, convention, or other psychological mechanisms. Theories accounting for economic phenomena on the basis of such vague "motives" as self-interest or pain-and-pleasure are mirages floating unsubstantially in hot air. Human behavior seems to be capable of almost illimitable alteration through education. There are doubtless natural limits of some sort to the attainment of strange ideals, but, as Mr. Dickinson says, "it is practically impossible at present to say what they are."

Mr. Dickinson's economic conclusions, however, are not startling. When he begins to discuss the applications of modern psychology to economic theory, he appears to forget the broader implications of his psychological investigation. It is doubtless true that education is a slow and uncertain instrument, that it can do little with adults, and that this fact accounts largely for the disappointed hopes in such a drastic experiment as that of the Russian Communists. But that does not do away with the series of obvious changes which have already taken place in capitalist institutions such as are noted by Mr. Hobson, or with the certainty of future economic development. Not until a body of economic fact has been built up by the same careful scientific study of quantitative data which the modern psychologists have applied to their material, can a really fruitful juncture be made between the two sciences.

Mystical Criticism

Hieroglyphics. By Arthur Machen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

IT is, perhaps, to be expected that Mr. Arthur Machen, having determined to arrive at some standard of judgment whereby literature, "fine literature," "literature with a capital L," might be distinguished from "mere literature," has succeeded in giving us nothing but an apology for his own books. Indeed, it would be strange if such were not the case considering Mr. Machen's emotional bias against any form of rationalism.

"I suppose there are only two parties in the world: the Rationalists and the Mystics, and one's vote goes with one's party," Mr. Machen tells us in the last chapter of his book, having tried to convince us, in the previous five chapters, that he was arguing by a Coleridgean "cyclical mode of discoursing" in an attempt to arrive at deducible truths. He admits that he belongs with the mystics. Like most of the tribe he has a faculty for so mystifying the commonplace that it takes on the semblance of wisdom.

Like a good mystic Mr. Machen starts out with a premise which he defines in terms of itself and then proceeds to justify it on the basis of certain examples which he selects to prove it. The acid test of literature in the highest sense is "ecstasy." And ecstasy is "rapture, beauty, adoration, wonder, awe, mystery, sense of the unknown, desire for the unknown." Ecstasy is, in brief, that quality of literature which makes it "fine literature" you know not why. A rather shaky foundation on which to build a critique.

Nevertheless, it affords the critic a magic wand of dogmatism which he has merely to wave to separate the sheep from the goats at first reading. Take, for instance, "Pickwick Papers" and "Vanity Fair." The first titillates Mr. Machen to a sense of ecstasy; the second does not. Ergo, to the junk heap with Thackeray along with "poor, draggle-tailed George Eliot" and unspeakable Gustave Flaubert, while Dickens is raised among the lower order of saints.

Moreover, there is no need to make such a fuss about the desire of the unknown in the Odyssey, which raises it, in the critic's estimation, to incredibly lofty heights. There is really nothing so mysterious about it. Given the early Greeks, a people dwelling by the vast and inexplicable sea, and given the ocean that reaches none knows where, teeming with all sorts of unknown possibilities, the adventures of Ulysses follow with all the logical certainty of Euclidean geometry.

To say, also, that writers like Rabelais wrote of giants to achieve the heroic and to avoid the commonplace stature of mankind and so differ noticeably from modern authors who take ordinary men and women and treat their symptoms realistically, is not sufficient. Rabelais exaggerated, probably, not because he wished for the unknown, the unheard-of, but because, by the simple process of applying a magnifying lens, a greater clarity could be achieved. In the same way contemporary authors writing of the diseased, the abnormal, are able to achieve a greater clarity of insight into human nature. Mr. Machen would have us believe that literature brings us closest to the heart of life when it removes us as far away from it as possible.

Artifice, he maintains, has nothing to do with art and the less we have of it the better. Now it is impossible to conceive of the spirit except in terms of the body. He is compelled, therefore, to concede begrudgingly that artifice is of some utility. Indeed, it is conceivable that artifice is the whole of art and that, as Miss Dorothy Richardson pointed out some time ago, genius is the usual thing, talent the rarity. For Mr. Machen to say that the lyric is the purest example of art hardly contaminated with artifice is to give himself away completely. For the lyric is the clearest example of the perfection of artifice to such a degree that the most intangible subtleties may be expressed thereby. If art approaches its maximum intensity through a minimum of artifice, the finest book in the world would be a book with nothing in it.

But of course Mr. Machen doesn't mean that. After all, he is a mystic and we are criticizing him from the camp of the rationalists. "Art is by its very definition quite without the jurisdiction of the schools and the realm of the reasoning process, since art is a miracle, superior to the laws." When a critic believes that, criticism of him is futile.

Desolate Something

Desolate Splendour. By Michael Sadleir. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

SOME day a novel will be written about an elegant roué who is not reformed by and does not marry his young and beautiful ward. In spite of all the intrigues and devious villainies of Mr. Sadleir's novel, it was the novelist's own struggles with his temptation that kept at least one reader's devoted interest. Those who would like to know whether Mr. Sadleir respects his roué's finer nature and lets him go sinful to his grave will have to read the novel themselves. Suffice it to say that Mr. Sadleir calls his reprobate "the Man of Pleasure," and paints him in much more agreeable colors than his brother the Puritan. Moreover there is a charming and virtually pure young man who is all ready for the heroine to marry and live happily with ever after. There are several sinister schemers. One of the worst is an invalided earl; he is a quite dreadful person. The exact depth of his infamy is left undetermined but you suspect the worst when you find out that he paints his face. It is, altogether, a leisurely, entertaining romance, with moments of breathless suspense. The hateful people get theirs and the nice people get theirs, and it is a lot of fun pussyfooting after the author with the bag of awards on his back.

JOHN W. CRAWFORD

Syllogism and Fallacy

A First Book in Logic. By Henry Bradford Smith. Harper and Brothers. $2.

THIS conservative introduction to the study of the business of reasoning casts no new light upon this branch of philosophy. The apparent purpose of the book is classroom work rather than general reading; but it lacks especial adaptability to either. It is informative to encounter again the mnemonic Latin jingle containing the valid moods of the Aristotelian syllogism, whose unaccountable omission from many studies and reference works upon the subject is the less excusable, when it is remembered that they refer constantly to the Barbara mood, the Bokardo mood, the Festino mood, and the rest of them, with no clue to their exact significance. The few examples toward the end of this book of some of the famous fallacies and dilemmas of logical history lend a touch of vividness to the siccific theme. Logic, it has been said, is the child of a good heart and a clear head. Both here should have yielded a volume less formula-ridden, and more imbued with vitality. Keyser has said that mathematics is identical with logic; but the breathing body of his text is in surprising contrast to this finely preserved mummy of thought. The plan of the work left no room for even a brief outline of the golden history of the subject, of the resounding names from the beginning who have shed luster on themselves and the topic by their penetrating critiques.

When we come to the treatment of the moderns, the handling is even more cursory. An answer is attempted to be made to a few of the objections of Bertrand Russell, Peano, Schroder, and others. But the author is apparently not in sympathy with these iconoclasts, and the most he will grant to Symbolic Logic is a modification or broadening of several of the classical propositional functions, which is by no means a complete answer to the spirit of the criticisms. A logic, for instance, which fails to take into account, even in an appendix, non-Euclidean problems and transfinite numeration cannot be regarded as complete. The logic of the future will be broader in its scope, more imbued with a conception of the modern intellectual audacities concerning the fundamental materials of thinking, less abstract and abstruse in its development. A course faithfully following this book will hardly win an undergraduate ballot as the most popular course; and while that is not everything, it is something to make the broadening of the frontiers of knowledge and the mechanics of knowledge both satisfying and beckoning.

Interpretation of Racial Differences

A Study of American Intelligence. By Carl C. Brigham. Princeton University Press. $3.50.

THE present conflict of divergent racial stocks has brought us a recrudescence of the race theories of Gobineau and H. S. Chamberlain. The more or less accidental success of Grant's "The Passing of the Great Race" is equaled by the spread of the propaganda of Stoddard, Gould, and Barr. So long as such books remain in the limbo of the accurate and the scientific, thinking persons pay little attention to them. When a work appears, however, which has considerable scientific validity, as has the present one, but in which the conclusions seem twisted to fit preconceptions and to give strength to racial prejudices, it is time to take account of the trend of academic writing bearing on such an important and vital topic as racial mixture.

Professor Brigham, taking the data from the psychological examination of our army in 1917-18, has shown the decided superiority of draftees born in Northern as compared to Southern Europe. While there are several criticisms to be offered to the use of the statistical method alone in the treatment of racial differences, the writer's principal error lies in attempting to universalize his results to make them support an outworn thesis of the racial superiority of the Nordic stock. The work of Retzius and others has shown us the fallacy of the "Nordic race" theory. Further, the facts of overlapping in practically all racial traits as explained by Boas should prove sufficient correction of the assumptions of the present volume. In addition the tremendous force of the theory of cultural determinism, supported as it is with great evidence, ought to make us cautious in alleging marked intellectual differences in racial, to say nothing of sub-racial, stocks.

There are no doubt some racial differences as there are certainly large individual differences within races, but to argue for the inferiority of the Latin and Alpine stocks in contrast to the Germanic on the basis of the evidence Professor Brigham sets forth is to give aid and comfort to obscurantism rather than to foster true scientific analysis. Many sociologists and psychologists believe, on fairly good grounds, that intelligence-differences do exist between the recent immigration from Southern Europe and that of older standing from Northern Europe. On the other hand, very few assume that these differences denote universal differences between Northern and Southern populations as a whole, nor do a great many believe the same to be unaffected by environmental changes.

This discussion of the problem of "American Intelligence" would be stronger had the writer omitted his interpretative chapters borrowed from the Gobinists and confined himself to the purely statistical method with which he began his analysis.

KIMBALL YOUNG

Books in Brief

The Day's Journey. By W. B. Maxwell. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

Mr. Maxwell presents to his followers one of the most interesting novels of the year. It is the story of a life-long friendship of two men of our own generation, a friendship which is tested by temperament, by unhappy marriages, and by war, which manifests itself in quarrels and separations, in moments of stress, and in the dull routine of daily interests. There is simple beauty in the author's prose and genuine art in the portraiture of his heroes.

Grey Towers. Anonymous. Covici-McGee Company. $2.

While it is pretty generally agreed that there is something wrong with the average American university, it remained for an anonymous antagonist to realize the fictional values in the prevailing iniquities. A novel which gives off creative heat over the injustices that lurk in thesis grading is a unique product, at any rate. Naturally, more serious transgressions are not wanting, and quite a sizable problem is worked up out of campus materials, possibly with the intent to separate the sheepskins from the goats.

Raw Material. By Dorothy Canfield. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Miss Canfield announced her intention in this collection of sketches to keep her feet religiously on the "strait neutral path of sacred Objectivity," but oddly enough, her best moments are those in which she has wandered from that resolve. Those sketches which conform most faithfully to the pattern of raw material—in the novelist's sense—are inclined to become little different from competent journalism; they are seldom provocative in the way that the author manifestly wished them to be—"pegs on which to hang the meditations of many different moods." Miss Canfield holds that character delineation which is without the mark of literary tools upon its surface is a more desirable product than that which has been cunningly polished by the devices of the novelist. It would be easy to refute this thesis without going outside her own book.

Heart's Blood. By Ethel M. Kelley. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

The Cape Cod of Joseph C. Lincoln, with its fluent old men and its too abundant cheerfulness, is emphatically absent from Miss Kelley's novel. If one desires an antidote for salty quaintness in fiction, this is it. The heart of a starved old maid, who is awkwardly but passionately in love with her cousin's husband, is exposed with almost clinical thoroughness, in a narrative devoid of humor. The one character in the book who has lived long enough to acquire a philosophy is called upon to act as tragic chorus; the rest are puppets of misplaced or unrewarded love. The novel's thesis seems to be: "How do you know what life is like? How do any of us know till we find out?"—and the solution: "There is no help for what there is no help for." A needless amount of futility can be crowded into such texts as these, and it appears that the novelist has strained a little beyond the borders of true character in order to be inevitable.

Gleams

SLOWLY and with something like reluctance the theater of the early season drags itself toward a point where contact with the human intelligence is conceivable. One need no longer alternate wholly between impulses of flight and cold disgust. Curiosity begins. One doesn't mind going to see what is happening. There is a perhaps.

Mr. Bores Thomashefsky, long famous on the East Side, has rented the Nora Bayes Theater and gives Broadway its first Yiddish playhouse. His first production, "The Three Little Business Men," is a complete mistake in judgment and a complete failure. It is Broadway hackwork at its rawest and ugliest; it is far too much Broadway trade-goods to make any impression on Broadway. Had the Moscow Players played "The Three Little Business Men" their stay would have been brief. What audience did Mr. Thomashefsky hope for? The ignorant, Jew or Gentile, go to vaudeville, burlesque, melodrama. The cultured up-town Jew will not abandon the productions of Hopkins or the Guild to see bad plays in a language he usually no longer understands. The Ghetto intellectual is even more fastidious than he. The cultured and liberal Gentile will, as the Moscow Players proved, go to see great plays greatly acted even in a hopelessly alien tongue. There is no reason why he should trouble himself about this silly and meretricious comedy. It is a pity that so wretched a choice was made. The acting of Mr. Thomashefsky and Mr. Rudolph Schildkraut was superb. It has a spontaneity, a solidity, a finish which the wanderer on Broadway is always yearning for and commonly in vain. Mr. Ludwig Satz is said to have an enviable reputation on the Jewish stage. But since Mr. Thomashefsky and Mr. Schildkraut played in a mood of almost austere realism and Mr. Satz gave a performance of pure burlesque in quality and technique I was too shocked by the discrepancy to relish his undoubted merit.

The pleasant Mr. Edward Childs Carpenter gives us his annual pleasant little play. This time it is called "Connie Goes Home" (Forty-ninth Street Theater). It is quite negligible as drama. But it is an uncommonly suitable play for the jeune fille. Perhaps there is no longer a jeune fille; perhaps sixteen is always flapper now. But if Louisa Alcott is still read, as I believe she is, there should be a large and justly delighted audience for the story of "Connie Goes Home" and for the most engaging performance of Miss Sylvia Field in the title role.

This brings me very naturally to the puppets. They are from the Teatro dei Piccoli in Rome and disport themselves at the Frolic, the third New York playhouse to be built on top of another one. The puppets are quite the most ingenious ever seen here. They are little marvels in agility and grace. The Pierrots are haunting, the Negro acrobat is astonishing, the prima donna is funny in an eerie way, and both Puss and the Ogre in César Cui's little opera "Puss in Boots" are all that they should be. But this too is a show for children. The adult imagination is pleased and astonished for a little while. Then it is jaded. It cannot play at the beautiful game of make-believe to quite this extent. To the child the puppets are neither puppets nor people. They are like Puss and the Ogre in Perrault's tale—creatures about whose nature you don't reflect. You simply accept them. But to grown-ups the puppets, alas, are puppets. You can't help seeing the wires. And when you have said: How ingenious, how delightful! you are quite ready to go.

You are also ready to go in the middle of the second act of what should have been the first important production of an important play this season. Mr. St. John Ervine is a tragic dramatist. He should stick to his last. "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary" (Belasco Theater) reminds one inevitably of the scriptural crackling of thorns under a pot. And the thorns were picked by Oscar Wilde and the pot put on by Bernard Shaw. Mr. Ervine is painfully and elaborately and icily witty. After every Wildish line you can almost hear him: "Thank heaven! Another one. How many more will make a brilliant comedy?" The fable is foolish. It will not bear even indicating. Mrs. Fiske, determined at last to be understood, plays with her accustomed speed, edge, hard vivacity; she plays the same perverse and topsy-turvy lady whom, under varying names, she has played for some years. There never was any such lady. If there were she could not, of course, be better played than Mrs. Fiske plays her. To me that reflection is cold comfort. So here an eminent dramatist, an eminent actress, an eminent director have cooperated on something obviously trifling and shoddy. Why?

The New Dictator of Hungary

By EMIL LENGYEL

HUNGARY never had more right to being called the "reactionary storm-center of Europe" than since the ascension to unofficial power of Captain Julius Gömbös, leader of the right wing of the so-called "Christian-National Party" in the Hungarian Parliament. Captain Gömbös is the "strong man" of Hungary, a kind of Hungarian Mussolini, in whom many see the future military dictator of the land of the Magyars. It was Captain Gömbös who, dissatisfied with what he termed the "drifting of the government of Count Bethlen toward liberalism," organized the various Hungarian terroristic societies into a loosely connected association of the "defenders of the race." With their cooperation he quite recently initiated a reign of terror all over Hungary which, while directed chiefly against those whom he calls the "destructive elements," aims at the same time at the overturn of the present Hungarian Government and the establishment of a super-reactionary regime.

The strike of the railway men and locomotive engineers which was called in the first days of August was intended to be the prelude to a vigorous reign of terror of the Gömbös party. Characteristically, the strike was forced upon the unions by the extreme reactionaries with the threat that if they did not comply with the order of the "dictator" they would be treated as traitors of their country. Although the strike was unsuccessful and had to be called off thirty-six hours after it had started, the partisans of Gömbös did not let themselves be discouraged and continued to prepare for the time when a coup d'état, timed more judiciously, would sweep them into power. They documented their ambition in a spectacular way during the recent electioneering campaign in Cegléd, a large city of the Hungarian Puszta.

In Cegléd a new member of Parliament was to be elected. The Government made it a point of honor to carry away the victory and mobilized a considerable part of the financial and moral resources of the government party in support of its candidate. All their efforts were of no avail against the terroristic methods of Gömbös, who had his own candidate in the field. His men prevented two members of the Cabinet from speaking to the voters. They intimidated the inhabitants of the city to such an extent that when election day came only those appeared at the polling booths who voted for the candidate of Gömbös. As a result, the government candidate was defeated and one of Gömbös's lieutenants sent into the Budapest Commons.

One of the manifestations of the campaign of terror which is being carried on by the partisans of Gömbös is the suspension of liberal papers. The courts, which are to a considerable extent under the influence of the super-reactionary party, send newspapermen to jail by the score simply for having incurred the displeasure of the dictator. This servile submission of some members of the Hungarian bench was made clear in the Hungarian Parliament itself by Rezsö Rupert, one of the leaders of the liberal opposition. Mr. Rupert drew attention to the dangerous situation arising from the fact that judges are allowed to join terroristic political organizations such as that of the "Awakening Hungarians," main supporter of the reign of terror of Captain Gömbös. He said that several presidents of county courts had addressed inquiries to the competent authorities asking whether judges might be members of the organization of the "Awakening Hungarians" and that replies had been received stating that "inasmuch as this organization is not conducted along political lines" judges might become members. "The consequence of this decision is obvious," continued Mr. Rupert. "While criminals with political affiliations on the right side of the house are let off with a nominal punishment, editors of liberal papers are sentenced to years in jail for attacking the almighty 'Awakening Hungarians.' "

The aggressive attitude of members of the Gömbös faction sitting in the town council of Budapest assumed such proportions as to compel the aldermen of the opposition to quit their places in a body. The clash was precipitated by a debate about the compilation of the electoral lists from which—so the opposition asserted—the names of thousands of democrats and liberals were left out, because, as the official annotation on the lists termed it, "their birth could not be proved with the necessary documents."

The Hungarian Government which, on the one hand, sees its existence menaced by the aggression of the Gömbös group but, on the other hand, does not feel strong enough to struggle for political supremacy, makes strenuous efforts to bring them back to the fold by forcing upon Parliament the most reactionary measures. The most important of them, which, if passed, would crush the last remnants of constitutional liberty in Hungary, has been introduced in the House by Mr. Emil Nagy, Minister of Interior. A semi-official communique contained in the Budapest paper Nemzeti Ujság sums up the chief features of the bill:

> Any person convicted of a political offense may be sentenced to the suspension of his political rights. Such persons are to be excluded from the political club or party of which they are members and their application for admission into another political party is to be rejected. They are forbidden to take part in political meetings. Their connection with newspapers as editor, publisher, or reporter is to be dissolved. It is in the discretion of the court to prohibit a person found guilty of a political offense from carrying on his present occupation or profession.
> Disobedience toward the authorities charged with maintaining order in a meeting is punishable with from two to five years in jail.
> Any person preventing the resumption or continuation of work with a view to causing or prolonging a strike or employing force against any of the parties in the controversy is subject to imprisonment for a maximum term of six months. This also applies to any person found guilty of instigating a strike.
> Members of Parliament are liable to criminal prosecution for statements made in the plenum of the House or in any of the committees thereof if such statements are covered by the definition of the Penal Code of "slander" or "calumny." Permission to institute criminal action against a member of Parliament for any of the offenses specified is given by the House upon the recommendation of its committee charged to investigate cases of exemption from parliamentary immunity. The member thus extradited is to be tried before a special tribunal composed of the justices of the Royal Hungarian Curia.
> The manufacture, sale, or possession of explosive materials or weapons is a criminal act punishable with imprisonment for life.
> Persons whose political activities may prove a menace to the security of Hungary or may lead to internal disorder are to be placed under the supervision of the state police department. Such persons have to report at the local police station at intervals specified by the court. They cannot leave the locality in which their residence is situated unless they obtain the permission of the Minister of Interior to do so.

Hungarian liberal papers, in their comments upon the bill, point out that it would put the Government in a position to silence all members of Parliament, newspapers, or newspapermen whose political opinion was at variance with that held by the party in power. The threatened drastic punishment for the manufacture, sale, or possession of explosive materials or weapons is almost unanimously considered by the papers of the opposition as being intended for the consumption of public opinion abroad by proving that the Hungarian Government goes to the limit in uprooting the causes of anarchy. In the meantime, however, Gömbös and his "defenders of the race" keep Hungary in constant excitement with a long chain of outrages against "members of the other race" by whom they mean: liberals, Socialists, Jews, foreigners, and even the conservative-minded bourgeoisie if they do not approve of the terroristic methods of the dictator.

France and the Rhineland

THE following article signed by Franz Dahlem of Berlin, appears in the English edition of the International Press Correspondence for August 23:

The Great War was fought for the conquest of new fields for exploitation and new markets, for the purpose of defeating competitors and imposing favorable economic treaties. The Central Powers lost the war. It is not they who are now exploiting—as they intended it should be—the natural resources and man-power of a Rhineland-Westphalia and Lorraine-Belgium that lie beneath their sway. The matter is entirely reversed. The Entente was victorious. And it is now reaping the harvest of its success. . . .

It is only a waste of time to imitate the bourgeoisie in weighing the question as to whether the French are actuated more by political than by economic motives in making the attempt to separate the most valuable and flourishing part of Germany from the body of the state. When the Comité des Forges lays its hand on Rhineland-Westphalia, it is only natural that this conquest should be politically secured; that the French Government should intervene and the army advance—for that is why they are there.

Here it is merely intended to show, with the aid of some data and statements made by the leading men of France, the general line being taken by French Rhineland policy; we shall not here enter into the question as to how far the influence of Anglo-French antagonism has modified this line, or is further likely to modify it.

At the end of the year 1916 the French ministry set itself the following war aim in the West:

"France claims Alsace-Lorraine with the frontiers of 1792, the Saar district, and also demands the formation of an independent German state on the left bank of the Rhine, as a buffer state between France and Prussia."

On February 14, 1917, the following agreement was reached between the government of Czarist Russia and the Poincaré Government, in return for the cession of Constantinople to Russia:

"1. Alsace-Lorraine is to be restored to France.

"2. The frontiers are to be extended to at least the limits of the former dukedom of Lorraine (thus approximately to the line Trier-Kaiserslautern.—Ed.), are to be drawn in accordance with the judgment of the French Government, as required by strategic necessities, and are to include the whole iron area and the whole Saar district as French territory.

"3. The remaining districts lying on the left bank of the Rhine, outside of the French districts, are to be converted into an independent and neutral state, and are to be occupied by French troops until the enemy states have completely fulfilled all the conditions and pledges contained in the peace treaty."

These arrangements were upset by revolutionary Russia.

General Foch, the commander-in-chief of the Allied troops, held tenaciously to the above agreement at the conferences which preceded the conclusion of the Versailles peace treaty. It suffices to cite the following from his memoranda of November 17, 1918, and January 10, 1919, at the peace conferences:

"Compared with the 64 to 75 millions of Germans living in Germany on the other side of the Rhine and in the surrounding states, the numbers of the population on the left bank of the Rhine are only as follows: Belgium 7,800,000, Luxemburg 260,000, Alsace-Lorraine 1,900,000, France 39,600,000, a total of 49,560,000. If we add to these 5,400,000 on the left bank of the Rhine, we obtain a total of 54,960,000.

". . . As this total by no means reaches the number of the German masses, it follows that there can be no neutral states on the left bank of the Rhine. The population on this bank must be in a position to take up arms against the German danger when this arises. Neutrality is a chimera, even from the standpoint of defense, for it must be an armed neutrality, and must be combined with the action of the neighboring powers. . . .

"This state organization must lead to the adoption of an anti-German attitude on the part of this population, a political attitude which can become military at a given moment. Thus the men capable of bearing arms must be organized, in times of peace, in numbers proportional to those of the population, as troops adapted to fight against Germany in case of war. . . .

"Besides this military necessity, such an arrangement must be accompanied by the following measures: (1) Germany must be absolutely prohibited from any military access to, or any political propaganda in, the country left of the Rhine; this country may even be protected by means of a neutral zone on the right bank. (2) The military occupation of the left bank of the Rhine is to be secured by the forces of the allies. (3) The left bank of the Rhine is to have its necessary markets secured by participation in a joint customs' regime with the other western states."

At the peace conference the standpoint of Clemenceau-Tardieu with regard to the western frontiers of Germany was, in view of the Anglo-American opposition, finally formulated as follows:

"1. In the general interest of peace, and in order to secure the execution of the fundamental clauses of the League of Nations, the western frontier of Germany is drawn on the Rhine. In consequence of this Germany renounces all sovereignty over, and all customs' connection with, the territory of the former Empire lying on the left bank of the Rhine. . . .

"3. The territories on the left bank of the Rhine (with the exception of Alsace-Lorraine) are to be constituted as one or more independent states, under the protection of the League of Nations."

After first rejecting the separation of the Rhineland from Germany, both Wilson and Lloyd George gave way. On April 20, 1919, the latter declared to Clemenceau that he was in agreement with an occupation for a period of fifteen years, and that this occupation, should Germany not meet her obligations, could be prolonged, or renewed after evacuation.

The decisive French ministerial council, which accepted the peace treaty in the form handed to Count Brockdorff-Rantzau on May 7, was held on April 25, 1919. In this decisive session, the Prime Minister, Clemenceau, addressed the following remarks to the President, Poincaré:

"M. President, you are much younger than I. In fifteen years

I shall be here no longer; in fifteen years Germany will not have fulfilled all the clauses of the agreement; and in fifteen years, should you do me the honor to visit my grave, I am fully convinced that what you will have to tell me will be: 'We are on the Rhine, and intend to remain there.'"

Poincaré, as Premier, is continuing this policy with obstinate tenacity. The Ruhr action proves that imperialist France is now determined to present accomplished facts to the world. At the Versailles peace conference France's annexation policy was supported by the alleged necessity of securing France from fresh attacks on the part of Germany, but since then the Comité des Forges, the French military authorities, and the French statesmen, have been using much plainer language. It suffices to give two examples of this.

A draft drawn up in 1919 by the former commander-in-chief of the Rhine army, General Mangin, on the occupation of Düsseldorf and Duisburg, concludes as follows:

"It is possible to disorganize the steel industry, dyes (by-products), and agriculture (manures). There can be no question of killing industry and agriculture. The working population demands nothing more than to work for us, provided that it can get something to eat and is paid (!). Destruction of industry—social danger—risings—without profit to France. Article 270. Only the convention of Rhenish notabilities (co-operative and economic) could state what services German industry can perform for France in the occupied territory. These delegations will become the germ of the special representation of the special interests of the country. . . ."

M. Adrien Dariac, the chairman of the French finance commission, spoke even more clearly in his secret report to Poincaré on May 28, 1922:

"Could France not consider the exchange of German coke suitable for smelting, and French ore, for the purpose of joint exploitation, upon a basis on which real industrial cooperation would be possible? We cannot demand of Germany that she pay immense sums for thirty-five years, if, on the other hand, we are afraid to see her industries develop in a manner enabling her to pay her debts.

"But as soon as we have gained a footing on the right bank of the Rhine, and have forty-five million tons of ore at our disposal annually, we shall be in a position to play a decisive role in the German iron industry, for we can demand control of its production as an equivalent.

"The first act of our autonomy policy is the financial organization of the Rhineland: the drawing of our customs boundaries—closed to the east against Germany, open to the west to France in order to avoid the danger of economic strangulation arising from a double state wall and its attendant limitation of exchange of goods; further, a budget separate from that of the republic, and the substitution of the unhealthy mark by sound currency.

"The second act is the substitution of the Prussian officials by Rhenish ones.

"The third act is the expansion of the authoritative powers of the High Commission and the convention of an elected corporation.

"These are doubtless far-reaching plans, but plans which would be fully justified if carried out judiciously and with a capacity for differentiation, and in proportion to the extent to which Germany avoids fulfilling her obligations. A far-sighted policy could accomplish by means of skilful diplomacy—adding one link after another to its chain of actions—the gradual separation of a free Rhineland from Germany, under the military protection of France and Belgium."

This is the policy of imperialist France, and its accomplishment is being tenaciously striven for. No bourgeois government in Germany can put a stop to this work of destruction. It is only the proletariat, only the proletarian revolution, which can liberate the powers, and create for Soviet Germany the allies that can save the Rhineland and the entire country from colonial slavery. . . .

The Bulgarian Communists

THE attitude of the Bulgarian Communist Party to the recent revolution in Bulgaria is expressed in the following declaration addressed by the central committee of the party To the Workers and Peasants of Bulgaria:

On this night the government of the Peasant Party was overthrown by a military coup d'etat. A new government, headed by Professor Al. Zankoff, was created. . . . The new government is a government of a great coalition of all bourgeois parties, from the People's Party and the followers of Radoslavov to the Social Democrats. Only the Peasant Union, just overthrown, is excluded from this coalition.

The Stambuliisky government, which maintained its power over the masses of peasants and workers by terror and violence, is overthrown. It was the government of the peasant-bourgeoisie which, by its demagogy, succeeded in bringing within its fold considerable masses of the peasants, but which had used its power not to protect the interests and liberty of these masses but to uphold its own class and clique interests. It was a government which had not fulfilled its promises to the small landholders and farm laborers and which had sought to maintain its power not by the confidence of the toiling masses of the city and country but by the class dictatorship of the peasant bourgeoisie.

The government of the Peasant Party, which had suppressed the rights of the working population and pursued a bitter campaign of persecution against the sole defender of this population, the Communist Party—this government was itself to blame that it had lost the support of the workers and poor peasants in its fight against the bourgeois parties. Therefore the workers should not support this government today.

But the new government . . . is instituting, in the place of the overthrown military and police dictatorship of the peasant bourgeoisie, a new dictatorship of the city bourgeoisie. . . . A regime which begins its career with a military rebellion and military dictatorship offers no guaranties for the safety of the rights and liberties of the people. Therefore the workers and toiling peasants should not and will not give their support to the new government.

The parties of the city and peasant bourgeoisie which constantly talk of liberty and lawfulness are in reality treading under foot every right and liberty of the people. In their clique-fight for power they are making use of the government machinery and the armed forces of the country, and are ready to let loose a civil war in the country. The masque of bourgeois legality is torn, and the only party representing in fact the rights and liberties guaranteed by the constitution is now the Communist Party.

The toiling masses of the city and country will not take part in the struggle between the city and country bourgeoisie. Such participation would only mean for the toiling people to draw the chestnuts from the fire for their exploiters and oppressors.

While the working class and the toiling peasants abstain from giving their support either to the old or the new government, they must unite and fight independently for the protection of their class interests and for their political liberties.

We are not yet acquainted with the program of the new government. But for the past four decades we are acquainted with the acts of the parties constituting the new government. The laboring masses have no confidence in these parties. They must unite under the banner of the Communist Party and loudly and plainly express their willingness to fight for the realization of their demands.

In the name of the toiling people we demand that political liberties be respected and extended. We demand the full freedom of speech and press, of assemblage and coalition. We demand that measures be adopted against profiteering and raising of prices. We demand the lifting of the pressure of taxes burdening the working masses. We demand guaranties for the peace of the Bulgarian people. We call upon the working people of the city and country to unite and fight for the realization of these immediate demands and for all slogans of the Communist Party.

A partial fulfilment of these demands can be accomplished only under the constant and growing pressure of the struggle of the working population. Completely they can be achieved only when a new power shall be instituted—the government of the workers and peasants. Only a workers' and peasants' government which would originate not within the parties of the city and peasant bourgeoisie but in the ranks of the workers and toiling peasants, and which would be supported by the organizations and armed forces of the workers and peasants, will guarantee the freedom and peace of the country and defend the interests of the working population. . . .

The new government has so far not raised its hand against the Communist Party. But the recently instituted regime of military dictatorship is directed against the rights and liberties of the working people, and so also against the Communist Party. While we demand that these rights and liberties be reestablished, that the state of siege be lifted, we call upon you to gather under the banner of the Communist Party and to be prepared to resume the struggle as soon as the government raises its fist against the only party representing the interests of the workers.

THERE is something ingratiating in the organization of a group of Coolidge-for-President clubs in New York City by an auctioneer! Is it based on the assumption that our highest public office is now an article of merchandise which may properly be put up for sale to the highest bidder? Or is it a feeling that the Coolidge candidacy needs to be assisted by some unusually brass-lunged boosting in order to offset the proverbial silence of the occupant of the White House? Mr. Coolidge himself seems to be doing his part in various discreet and practical ways. He has extended the olive branch to the Republican insurgents by a dinner invitation to Senator Borah and a decision that Federal patronage in Wisconsin, hitherto reserved for the tractable Mr. Lenroot, shall hereafter be allotted to the La Follette forces. Speaking before the convention of the Red Cross, Mr. Coolidge advocated a deep faith in spiritual things, tempered by a hard common sense adapted to the needs of the world. Quite so. Until after the Republican national convention next summer, at least, we expect Mr. Coolidge will lean even more toward the temper of hard common sense than toward deep faith in spiritual things.

WHEN a British commercial mission headed by a cousin of the Prime Minister returns from Soviet Russia talking of the "success which the Russian Government has achieved in stabilizing her currency on a gold basis" and announcing that two-thirds of the currency in circulation is in gold notes, it is high time for the outside world to sit up and take notice. John Maynard Keynes predicted, in the Genoa Conference days, that Russia would be the first of the East European nations to get back to metal currency, but he was laughed at as a visionary. Lack of recognition seems to have troubled Russia very little. The American Scandinavian Review reports that despite the break in relations between the Russian and Swedish governments, business is steadily expanding; the Baldwin mission admits that it expects to conclude important contracts at once; a French mission reports astonishment at the commercial activity of American firms in Moscow. Mr. Hughes may prate on as long as Mr. Coolidge lets him, but the solid fact remains that Russia has achieved the seemingly impossible task of establishing a favorable trade balance—her exports now exceed her imports. It would be amusing if Russia were to progress so steadily, and the politicians to remain so blind, that she would float loans abroad before the governments had decided that she was sufficiently respectful of private property to be recognized!

THE London Daily Herald is coming to be in Lenin's class as a nine-lived cat. This Labor daily seems, if not to thrive on, at least to survive repeated disaster. Reports of its imminent death have been frequent; the latest circumstantial report, reaching this country at about the same time that the New York Call was being transferred to trade-union hands, provided a welcome text to the editors of some New York newspapers who thereby proved to their own satisfaction the impossibility of a great labor daily. The British Trade Union Congress, however, decided otherwise. By a vote of 3,000,000 to 800,000 it undertook, temporarily at least, financial responsibility for the continuance of the paper. This was a wise decision. Great newspapers are costly enterprises; many of the most famous metropolitan newspapers are conducted at a loss to please their millionaire owners. Labor papers have particular difficulty in making ends meet because of the hostility of advertisers. But labor cannot afford to leave the collection and distribution of news, the very basis of modern democracy, to its economic opponents, and British labor in particular, which has become His Majesty's Opposition, would be mad if, on the eve of political success, it should sacrifice its chief instrument of popular education.

CIVIL rights have so long been abrogated in Spain, cabinets have so frequently changed, sectionalism has flourished and been suppressed for so many years, syndicalist uprisings have so often been quelled and radical leaders forced to fly, that the current news from that country is hardly interesting. The present military government is acting like all recent previous governments, only a little more so. Persons circulating false rumors will be executed within twenty-four hours. The jury system is abolished. No flag but the Spanish flag may be displayed and no language other than Spanish used in public documents. Meanwhile the possible opponents of the new regime are lying low—the Socialists and Communists and syndicalists, the Catalonian and Basque separatists, the liberal republicans. Are they biding their time, as their leaders claim? Or is opposition weak, divided, uncertain in its aims? We suspect that the latter is true; the only hope for counter-revolution lies in the determination of the new Government to prosecute with even more vigor—and thus doubtless with even greater losses—the disastrous war in Morocco.

IN Bulgaria counter-revolution has hit a livelier pace. As we go to press 100,000 armed peasants are on the march to Sofia. They are said to be supported by the Communists, and Moscow, as usual, is credited with having a hand in the affair. Dissatisfaction with the Zankoff Government, which by a military coup supplanted the Government of Stambuliisky and killed the Premier himself, has been growing with every week of its existence. Like the Spanish Government, it is supported by army officers. It is, without doubt, hated by almost everyone else, especially by the peasants. Its treatment of Communists and peasant leaders has solidified an opposition that stands a fairly good chance of toppling it out of office though the rebels may have to wade through their own blood to do it. If they succeed, the world may have another soviet state.

WE are glad to present elsewhere in this issue a friendly picture of Governor Walton by one of his political helpers. The portrait tallies closely with that drawn in the mind's eye from a reading of the newspaper dispatches: a big-hearted, rough-and-ready, unschooled and undisciplined man, who embodies in a large measure both the good and bad of the American frontier tradition. Leaving out of count the charges of broken pledges and turncoat politics made against the Governor by Oklahoma radicals, and taking him at his best as presented by his friends, he is obviously a type which can both accomplish much good and create an awful mess in public affairs. The frontier tradition was all right—for the frontier. But Oklahoma, emerging from a Territory into a State, has been trying to grow away from the frontier toward civilization through law. The Ku Klux Klan has been a peculiarly insidious revival of frontier ethics, but Governor Walton, setting up what in Europe would be called a military dictatorship, is meeting it with methods unpleasantly like its own. Newspaper censorship and machine-guns ready in the streets seldom work as intended. We do not deny the right to apply martial law in certain circumstances any more than we do the right of revolution in others. But we doubt if recent events in Oklahoma justify either one or the other. Unless Oklahoma wants to go back to the frontier and stay there, sooner or later it will have to return to civil government and try to solve its difficulties that way. The road to democracy through law is a tedious and tortuous one, but so far as we can see it is the only way.

IN its final report on the anthracite industry—bituminous coal remains to be considered—the United States Coal Commission recommends the creation of a special division of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the supervision of coal. This is neither an original nor a profound constructive suggestion with which to cap the reams of factual material that the commission has made public. Yet it would be unfortunate to regard it with indifference. This suggestion, if put into effect by Congress, would at least insure a permanent authority with power to collect facts, prescribe reports, and establish uniform practices and methods of accounting. This, indeed, is the first step which District No. 2 of the United Mine Workers of America, with its progressive program for nationalization, has been advocating. Meanwhile the public is becoming accustomed to government control of fuel through another series of incidents. If various States can, as they have been doing, undertake the purchase and sale of gasoline, why is public control of coal such an alarming prospect?

> If you are protecting the gamblers and bootleggers, so much the worse for you and your administration. If you are in favor of having them put out of business, come clean and do it. . . . But whether you are in favor of protecting or outlawing those leeches on society, they are going out of business until this strike is called off. You have the chance to put them out of business if you will. But they are going out of business, whether you will or not.

THIS to the mayor of Seattle by certain citizens interested in law and order. Nor are these citizens dealing in words alone. They have a committee called the Dehorn Committee ("dehorn," we are told, is Far West for bootleg liquor) which goes about from gambling joint to blind pig and asks the proprietor to close up. The proprietor closes up. It is to his interest to do so. These citizens put power behind their requests and they are listened to. The mayor listens to them, too, but rather unwillingly. It is hard to forbid people to enforce the laws or to stop violations of them. And while the police of Seattle and the other constituted enforcers of the Eighteenth Amendment have had their own little arrangements with its violators, and doubtless hated to be disturbed, they could do little about it. The virtuous citizens won, and not only continued to enforce the law but even enforced a little cooperation upon the city authorities. And these citizens? you ask. Rotarians? Civic-betterment leaguers? Well, no. They belong to that other body of uplift workers—the I.W.W. There is a strike on in the lumber camps of Washington—a strike to obtain the freedom of all political prisoners—and the I.W.W. is going to see that decency prevails while the strike lasts.

THE great trolley-car strike which for nearly two months completely stopped service on lines affecting nearly 150 towns in northern New Jersey has ended with an undisputed victory for the men and a three-year agreement under which they have gone back to work with better hours and a 20 per cent increase in wages. The capitulation of the company came finally in the face of judicial proceedings which sought either to compel the railway to resume service or to place it in the hands of receivers. The company is petitioning the Public Utilities Commission of the State for permission to raise fares from eight to ten cents, but it is doubtful if the increase will be granted. Perhaps never before has a great transportation system abandoned so quickly and completely all effort to run its cars in the face of labor difficulty, and more than anything else, this callous disregard of public welfare aligned sentiment almost solidly against it. Menaced on the one hand with jitney competition and on the other with a receivership, surrender to its employees seemed to be the only course open to the company. But the adjustment of labor difficulties has not settled the vital economic problems raised by the motor bus and the privately used car.

SOMETIMES voters in this country have a quiet and unexpected way of disposing of demagogic politicians when one is afraid that the latter's spectacular activities may have quite captivated the multitude. Something of this sort has happened in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, where Mayor Joseph Cauffiel has been decisively beaten in the primary election, running fourth in a list of seven. The mayor's recent announcement that every Negro in the city of less than seven year's residence would have to get out, coupled with his earlier absurdities in regard to the sale of beer, convinced many persons outside of Johnstown that Mr. Cauffiel would be a good person to retire to private life. It is satisfying to note that the voters of Johnstown, unimpressed with the mayor's efforts at self-advertising, have come to the same conclusion.

RESIGNATIONS from the faculty of Amherst College, in consequence of the forced withdrawal of Dr. Meiklejohn as president, so disorganized teaching schedules that the opening of classes had to be postponed several days. At Clark University the arbitrary policies of the president, Wallace W. Atwood, have so affected the ranks of those about to enter college that the freshman class enrolling this year is hardly half the usual size. Both these happenings are sad yet encouraging facts in our scholastic life. One hates to see signs of disintegration in two respected institutions, but still more it is gratifying to observe that autocracy and illiberalism are resented both by the teaching forces and the upgrowing student body in this country. Signs of intellectual independence among teachers and students are of immensely more consequence than occasional backward steps by trustees who would bring into education the atmosphere of their counting houses.

WHEN the steamship President Adams of the United States Lines sailed out of New York harbor for Europe the other day it had a new kind of quartermaster on the bridge—nicknamed among sailors "Metal Mike." This Robot sailor, or sailor Robot, is a creation of the inventor of the gyroscope compass, and in connection with that instrument is designed to control automatically a ship's rudder so that a vessel can be steered on a given course without human assistance. If this "Metal Mike" proves it can do a quartermaster's work—and it is said to have had successful use already—it means, in steamships at least, the disappearance of that figure symbolic in the public mind of the whole art of seafaring: the man at the wheel! To be able "to hand, reef, and steer" has from time almost immemorial been the measure of an able-bodied seaman. Aside from the housemaid's round of polishing brass, scrubbing decks, and "soogey-moogeying" dirty paint-work what is there left now for a poor sailorman to do? Well, there is still the lookout. Unless—unless Mr. Sperry presently invents automatic eyes to pierce the darkness ahead and thus remove the shadowy figure that now stands in the crow's-nest or paces the forecastle head calling back lustily to the bridge as he strikes the bell: "Lights are burning bright, sir, and al-l-l's we-ell."

Neither Peace Nor Victory

CHANCELLOR STRESEMANN, after consultation with representatives of all German parties, has determined upon complete and unconditional surrender to the French demand for abandonment of passive resistance in the Ruhr. He did not obtain any of the preliminary conditions for which he asked. There is no assurance that the French will amnesty the thousands of Germans whom they have imprisoned, or permit the hundreds of thousands whom they have deported to return to their homes. Nor is there any guaranty against further French invasion of Germany or against consolidation of French rule in the Rhineland and the Ruhr. Force, brute force, the sheer power of the French army, has triumphed.

Yet force has won such triumphs before, and learned too late that they were vain and empty. The Germans paid dear for their triumph over the Bolsheviks at Brest-Litovsk. That overwhelming victory did more to injure their moral position in the world than anything which had happened since the invasion of Belgium. The promised economic advantages faded; the people of the new territory put under German aegis sullenly yielded but never really submitted—and in the Rhineland and the Ruhr the French face a people with an even deeper sense of national loyalty.

What have the French won? Eight and a half months ago Poincaré sent his "corps of engineers, guarded by a few soldiers" into the Ruhr, expecting that they would take over its industries and start a steady flow of reparations and supplies to France. The corps has grown into a costly army of a hundred thousand men; months of strikes and stoppages have followed, cutting off the two million tons of coal which the Germans had each month shipped to France; French blast furnaces have been forced to shut down for lack of coke; the value of German paper currency has been wiped out; the franc has lost a quarter of its value; and the war-welded friendship between England and France has been wrenched into almost open hostility. After all this comes the German surrender. Thrice before the Germans, protesting inability to keep their word, have been forced to sign on the dotted line—once at Versailles in 1919, once at Spa in 1920, and once at London in 1921. Each time the experiment has proved disastrous. Now Stresemann signs another blank check, and once more it will turn out that the money is not in the bank. Was it worth so much fighting to make a German Prime Minister again agree to overdraw his country's economic account?

For Poincaré as a French politician it is doubtless a great victory. His position in Parliament and the position of his political associates in the 1924 elections is enormously strengthened. For the French steel magnates, whose lawyer Poincaré was before he assumed his present office, it may also be a victory. Behind the scenes they have doubtless made terms with Hugo Stinnes and the German industrialists, to the mutual profit of both parties. But the task of reconstruction has not been facilitated; the problem of balancing the French budget and saving the French franc has not been solved. France stands more alone than ever, hated on every side, on her eastern frontier a still great people resentfully dreaming of ultimate revenge—and France should know what dreams of revenge may be. For the French people, as for all Europe, the German surrender can mean neither peace nor real victory, but only more chaos and more misery.

The Newspapers

NEW YORK without its customary newspapers was a curious sight to those accustomed to the solid rows of papers that usually hide men's faces in the subways and on the elevated. People who habitually sink their minds in the trivialities of the daily newspaper the moment they forsake their office cares and associates were chagrined to find themselves face to face with their own petty selves, forced through the weary ride homeward to stare at the advertisements as their only escape from a too familiar ego. It was a revelation of the function of the modern daily newspaper, which is not so much to give an account of the world we live in as to provide a means of escape from that world—to supply unreal entertainment as a relief from real monotony.

Philadelphia papers, Yonkers papers, the Bronx Home News could not meet the need. The labor Call, the Commercial, and the Wall Street Journal could not satisfy the strap-hanger. They were strange, and he wanted familiarity—the pioneer tradition of America finds no expression in the newspaper reader. They were serious, and he wanted levity. Without Mutt and Jeff, without Abie the Agent and the Hallroom Boys, the average New Yorker felt uneasy and lost. He did not know what to think about without the newspapers to instruct him.

The various editions of the Combined New York Newspapers printed in insufficient numbers on few pages were a fascinating study in editorial judgment. Despite the common heading, the contents differed. Under the same title one discovered the familiar type of the Herald, the News, the Journal, the Mail, or the Evening Post. Most of the papers, forced to choose, omitted their editorial pages. Not one neglected sports. Political cartoons were dropped, but the omnipresent "strips" and "comics" appeared in all their sorry glory. The World found room for F.P.A. and Heywood Broun, but not for the page that Frank Cobb makes famous. Recognition of the decline of the editorial function of the newspaper was all but complete. The Ward murder trial crowded more enduring news to a minimum. Many a reader must suddenly have realized that despite the delay in receiving it, he could more easily learn what was going on in the world from a weekly like The Nation than from the elaborate, overgrown columns of the daily papers. It was a positive relief to find only eight pages of newspaper type to wade through instead of the customary thirty-two.

It was difficult to penetrate to the causes of the sudden deprivation of newspapers. The issue was confused by the double character of the dispute. The pressmen struck against the newspaper publishers, but the most violent conflict was between the New York workers and the national officers of their union. Mr. Berry, president of the International Printing Pressmen's Union of North America, acted almost as agent for the publishers and is today serving as a sort of strike-breaking detective agency recruiting men to smash the New York strike. Naturally the men are bitterer against him than against the publishers. But the curious fact is that in principle they were right in their dispute with the publishers, wrong in that with Mr. Berry.

The men violated no contract to which the publishers were a party. Their contract with the publishers had expired on September 1, and the publishers—confident, perhaps, in the tacit support of Mr. Berry—were refusing to modify the indefensible Manton award under which the men had, grumblingly, been working. On the other hand, they were members of an international union whose constitution required the assent of the national officers before a strike should be declared. This assent the men were unable to obtain. They knew they could never obtain it; their dispute with Mr. Berry was of long standing; they believed Berry to have tricked them before and to be ready to trick them again. So they deliberately violated their union constitution, and struck. It was a dangerous defiance of union discipline for two reasons—first, because without discipline and solidarity the union movement is meaningless, and second, because by running the risk of outlawry they jeopardized their own immediate success. There come times, however, when civil disobedience, in the union as in the state, is the only safeguard of liberty; and Berry's dictatorship in his union, maintained by a sort of rotten-borough system of representation, had, in the minds of the New York pressmen, amply justified their action. They went out to the last man, and at this writing they are still unanimously on strike although the publishers have since offered them most of the conditions for which they struck if only they will abandon their local leaders and enrol in a new local under the hegemony of Major Berry.

More fundamental is the dispute with the publishers which was the direct cause of the strike. On February 21, 1922, Judge Martin T. Manton of the United States Court of Appeals, acting as arbitrator between the New York newspaper publishers and pressmen, handed down a decision which has since kept the pressrooms in constant turmoil. He swept away the old working rules and established new ones against which the men protested and have ever since been protesting. Some of them were so stupid that by precise adherence to them the men have sabotaged whole newspaper editions. Judge Manton based his revision, as the New York Call points out in an able editorial, on the antiquated legal conception of "master and servant." The employee, he said, "labors for the pleasure or interest of another." He "represents his [the employer's] will, not merely in the ultimate result of the work, but in the details." Many of the old rules were bad rules, but they had grown up as part of the industry and represented a treasured and dignified conception of the worker's right to share in determining the conditions under which he works. A revision should have been the product of cooperative deliberation, not a dictatorial mandate, and the revolt of the New York pressmen is a significant expression of the failure of dictatorship. The issue at root is the old issue of democracy.

New York, reading unaccustomed or consolidated newspapers, probably reflected little on these larger issues. Very few who went without their usual paper meditated upon the issues of cooperation among the varied workers and interests which together make the daily newspapers. But probably a good many half-consciously reflected the comment of the Volkszeitung which, like most of the foreign-language papers (which sell a million copies daily in New York City), settled with its pressmen and appeared as usual: "The capitalist press of New York City was never so upright and truthful as today when it says to the public: 'We are all one and the same, however various the names we bear.' "

John Morley

THE writers and statesmen of the last generation are passing. And each time that another lays down the burdens of earth, the journalists tell us that the last of the Victorians is gone. In their sense it is not true. Of the sentimental idyllic Victorianism, of the period of the unlit lamp and the ungirt loin of the mind, hosts of survivors are in our midst. It is not so with that other group and strain and tradition which, contrary to the popular notion, rendered the reign of Victoria illustrious in the annals of England and the world. Of that group John Morley was indeed the last survivor. One thinks of him truly as ultimus Romanorum. From a world torn asunder by wild doctrinaires and hysterical visionaries there is gone the last of those intellects whose sovereign lucidity, noble poise, ultimate tolerance, were as a beacon and light and guide from the publication of the early works of John Stuart Mill until today.

Morley was the son of a Lancashire surgeon. He was lawyer, journalist, philosopher, statesman. Immediately on leaving Oxford he commenced writing for the Saturday Review; later he was associated with the editorship of the Pall Mall Gazette and for fifteen years he edited the Fortnightly Review. He entered Parliament in 1883 as an advanced Gladstonian Liberal; he became, in time, Chief Secretary for Ireland; upon his retirement from politics in 1914 he was President of the Council and Secretary of State for India. Among his services as a statesman must be accounted his plans for constitutional reforms in India which, had they been carried out in time, would have saved both Britain and India long years of enmity and conflict, his early advocacy of a liberal policy toward Ireland, his resignation from the ministry upon the British declaration of war in 1914. Upon the causes of this resignation—Trevelyan and John Burns, it will be remembered, went with him—Morley was silent. He was in his seventy-sixth year. He had never been a friend of futile tumult and petty passions. But the explanation which will some day be given to the world in the third volume, yet unpublished, of his memoirs, cannot be obscure, at least in its main outlines, to any attentive reader of the essay on The Expansion of England in the third volume of his "Miscellanies." He knew that the "imperialist or bombastic school" was a school of traders and money-changers, that the imperialist wars of the industrialist age were traders' and money-changers' wars. He remarked with quiet irony then that "war is often entered upon even in our own virtuous days without preliminary consent from Parliament," and placed on the same basis of imperialist advantage and moral claptrap the paying of money "for a war, say, for the defense of Afghanistan against Russia, or for the defense of Belgian neutrality."

These things, these actions that loom so gigantically in the eyes of the world, are quickly dwarfed and soon recede. John Morley will be remembered by his books, the "Voltaire," the "Rousseau," the "Life of Gladstone," the treatise "On Compromise," above all, the "Critical Miscellanies." Today these sober volumes are not, we fear, very widely read. There is no vain striving and crying in them; there are no plumes or banners. People read Chesterton and Kipling, and drive their chariots ever more madly into the barbarous realms of religious and patriotic myth. It was from precisely that sort of picturesque but deadly barbarism that the Utilitarians, the Mills, father and son, Matthew Arnold and Leslie Stephen, Huxley and Morley were anxious to save both their countrymen and mankind. Morley said of John Stuart Mill that "with his reputation will stand or fall the intellectual repute of a whole generation of his countrymen." A later generation's intellectual repute has already fallen with its neglect of John Morley. It made him a peer of the realm of England; of his spirit and of the spirit of his thought and counsels it neither knew anything nor wanted to know anything. His later years were spent in a world full of fire-eating myth-mongers and absolutists and empty opportunists. The voice of reason was silenced; the voice of Lloyd George prevailed.

The Mills, father and son, Arnold and Stephen, Huxley and Morley—these men all had what Morley so happily called the "sensibility of the intellect." They wanted honor among minds. They held self-deception and its consequent muddling to be somewhat less than human. They wanted not blindly to do what is commonly called "good" and is often both cruel and stupid; they wanted, in Morley's words, "to find out what the good is—which is harder." They were all very fond of the eighteenth century and very positivistic in temper, and fought shy of metaphysics. Yet they were far more philosophic than the metaphysicians who are so often poets gone wrong and build up huge systems to ground and buttress the idealistic assumptions that give them a pleasant feeling. Arnold was, of course, a great poet and so both richer and more variable of nature than the others. But he, with Mill and Morley, wanted "reason and the will of God to prevail," and it is significant that Morley, like Arnold, was a great Wordsworthian on Wordsworth's realistic and genuine and non-theological side.

Of that whole school and tradition the works of Morley are the last and not the least enduring monument. His prose was like his temper and his doctrine—weighty, serene, and unadorned. Its sobriety was natural and yet perhaps it was heightened by his fear of exaggeration and excess. Often a faint glow warms it, when he thinks of Wordsworth or Goethe, or speaks of his master, John Stuart Mill, or discourses on that tolerance, on that noble reasonableness which alone, according to him, and to his teachers and friends, can mitigate the troubles of mankind. His pages are always grave and wise and liberal.

Liberal! The word threatens to fall into disrepute. But that is due to a misconception. The great philosophic British liberals, Mill and Morley, never turned their backs upon the path on which their thinking led them. They were quite ready to face radical change in both the moral and the social life of mankind. Their liberalism was a matter of temper. They wanted change to come through reason and such action as grows out of the exercise of the reason. They were averse from red flags as well as from others. They expected salvation from no kind of violence, no ungoverned passion, no panacea or myth, old or new. It is perfectly permissible and easy to argue that, amid the hot and desperate needs of the world, their word is not the last. It remains true that their word is a word never to be forgotten, never to be unheeded except at our extreme peril. And the last great speaker of that word of truth and reason was John Morley.

Forward, March!

A SIGNIFICANT armistice in the fifty-three-year fight between the contractors for convict labor and inefficient State governments on the one hand and the employers of free labor supported by prison-reform agencies on the other was concluded on September 15. On that date the Reliance Manufacturing Company made an agreement with the International Association of Garment Manufacturers not to make further contracts with State governments for the manufacture of convict-made textiles for sale on the open market, and to cooperate where such contracts now exist in changing the character of prison industries as fast as may be in line with the "States' use system" urged in The Nation for July 11, 1923. The withdrawal of this largest single employer of convict labor, a company which has been using 3,136 convicts in ten different States, will reduce the amount of prison-made goods thrown on the open market to undersell free-labor products by one-half and will mean the gradual elimination of the most extensive prison industry now exploiting State governments and their prisoners. Contracts for the manufacture of hosiery, chairs, shoes, brooms and brushes, harness, lumber, and the mining of coal (in Alabama) remain—all at little or no profit to the States and without wages for the convicts.

The Reliance Manufacturing Company has proved concretely that prison labor is profitable. The forward-looking penologist insists that work for the prisoner is essential for his well-being and ultimate "cure." It remains for the States to accept these facts. The National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor has worked out a system, and the Associates for Government Service, a non-profit corporation, is rapidly putting it into operation, calling for prison industries operated by the States themselves, with no intermediate contractor to absorb the profits. The products will be used in the State, county, and city departments, and the surplus will be sold to other States, counties, and cities not in a position advantageous for the manufacture of the particular commodity. The plan embraces a careful allocating of the prison industries with regard to the supply of raw materials and the absorption of released convicts into the free industry in that locality. It proceeds on the standardization of specifications for all commodities, a practical measure both from the production and the purchasing standpoints. It provides for an adequate wage to the convict worker, from which one part shall be deducted by the State for his keep, and another part for the support of his dependents, thus relieving innocent families of the stigma of charity and law-abiding citizens of the burden of unnecessary taxes.

This system is sane and sound from every standpoint. Already New York State is making for its own use school desks, shoes, clothing, cotton cloth, and tinware, and doing printing for its prison department. Ohio has similar prison industries and in addition is making brick for her State roads. Massachusetts is manufacturing aluminum ware for Mississippi. New Jersey is selling shoes to Alabama and several other States, and is making automobile tags for Virginia, while Virginia is manufacturing desks for New Jersey. The plan provides for zone conferences to be held as the States call for them and it is to be hoped that soon the United States may be known for the justice and excellence of its prison industries system.

Where Canada Leads

SIR ADAM BECK, director of the most extensive hydro-electrical power development in the world, was distinctly pleased. Mayor Maguire of Toronto was pleased. The citizens of the Province of Ontario were pleased. For year after year delegation after delegation of American business men, holding conventions in Toronto, had politely given the Canadians to understand that as far as "pep," business enterprise, and practical common sense were concerned the Canadians were a bad second. At the Public Ownership Conference, held in Toronto in September, 1923, the atmosphere was distinctly different. Men and women had traveled from California and Oregon and Florida to learn from Canada how to conduct public enterprises.

The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario started in 1910 to distribute power—1,000 horse-power all told—to a few Ontario municipalities. Today it furnishes 600,000 horse-power at cost to 369 Canadian towns and cities, and supplies some 60,000 horse-power to Rochester, Syracuse, and Oswego. The cooperating Ontario municipalities now own a plant worth $250,000,000. The price of electricity since the establishment of the commission has been cut in halves and thirds, saving to the people of the province in their light and heat bills, it is estimated, $100,000,000. The average charge to residences in the province is from two to three cents per kilowatt hour. The commission is now building on the Canadian side of the Niagara River the largest single hydro-electric development in the world—the Queenston-Chippewa station.

Naturally a convention staring such facts in the face recommended for the United States a Federal Super-Power Commission, to coordinate all agencies, Federal, State, and local, in the development of publicly owned and operated super-power plants. Naturally it came to believe that the public ownership and operation of super-power was possible on the other side of the border. What it learned of the unscrupulous tactics employed in the United States by opponents of public ownership tended in the same direction. Rudolph Spreckels told how the Greater California League, which defeated the public water-power amendment last year, "never," according to the testimony of its own president, Mr. Cullinan, "had a meeting. . . . I [Cullinan] appointed myself as president. I was employed by the power companies, through Mr. John S. Drum . . . and met, with myself, after the employment, and organized the Greater California League." Over $1,000,000 was spent. No account was kept of expenditures—but the State amendment was defeated.

The delegates listened to statements of progress morning, afternoon, and night. From Emil Davies and Charles Edward Russell, fresh from Europe, they heard that there was in Great Britain and the Continent even now a steady progress toward, not away from, municipal and national ownership—Julius H. Barnes notwithstanding. Amos Pinchot sounded a strong call for railway nationalization, and proved from the lips of the American railway presidents that war control had been a success, not a failure.

Naturally, Sir Adam Beck and the mayor of Toronto were pleased. They had done the things the men from across the border wanted to do. They had advanced from theory to proof. Canada was showing the United States the way.

Missing Most of Europe

By HARBOR ALLEN

Munich, September 1

YESTERDAY, as I trudged home to my little student room in Munich, it suddenly came over me that I had been in Europe half a year and yet had missed most of it. I had just bought the European edition of "The World's Greatest Newspaper," written in a charmingly wretched English with genuine American headlines. It still lies on the table beside me; across the top: "Deauville Winds Up Big Week by Gambling Flurry." I glance down the column: "Wagers at 20,000 francs a coup . . . 50,000 on the baccarat table . . . a syndicate of ten million francs . . . gorgeous set of diamonds . . . a peacock fan. . . . Maurice, the dancer . . . the English rubber magnate . . . Mr. Preston Gibson . . . Miss Fanny Ward. . . ." They are fat-sounding names that follow, complacent and prosperous.

Yes, obviously, I am missing most of Europe. The more I look at that paper the more I am convinced of it. But on the other side of my table lies the letter I received last night from Franz, who scribbled his notes beside me at the university all of last spring. Franz writes that he is working seventeen hours a day, double shift, in a mine somewhere in Upper Bavaria, trying to scrape together enough money to continue his studies this winter. He is worried. Books, he has heard, now cost a million times the pre-war price. (They have gone up since.) He doesn't want to be left high and dry as he was last year. Last year Franz dug coal all summer in the Ruhr, two eight-hour shifts a day; but in the fall, when the mark suddenly dropped, his money lasted just one month. Might he dare to ask that I help him? Could he impose upon me so much as to beg that I change into dollars the inclosed five million marks at the current rate and keep them for him? It took him three weeks to save up those five million marks, and already they are worth in buying power one-fifth of what they were when he got them. Food is appallingly high, even in the mining camp. He is sleeping in a barrack. He hasn't seen a book for weeks, and he is aching to read—anything good. It hurts to be a Bettelstudent, but if only I could help him even so little he would always be my grateful Franz.

When this article was written 5 million marks were worth 50 cents; when this article is printed 5 million marks are worth 2½ cents.

The German mark is now worth less than the Soviet ruble. Germany's paper-money circulation jumped in one week in mid-September from 600 trillion to more than a quadrillion marks.

A Berlin newspaper which cost 2,500 marks on July 28 cost 500,000 on September 9.

The German Government spent 247,970,000 marks between August 10 and August 20, and its total income for the same period amounted to only 4,340,000 marks. The Government has stopped issuing postage stamps and is simply stamping the words "Tax Paid" on mail matter presented at the post office.

Five million marks—50 cents—for three weeks. And across the table my eye catches—"at 20,000 francs a coup." But then I suppose Fritz, Fred, and Hans are missing most of Europe, too. I wonder where they are now? They promised to write, but the new postage rates, eighty times those of two weeks ago, are probably too much for them. When I came to know Fritz, Fred, and Hans I couldn't believe what I had heard about them when I first came to Munich. "Come along," I was told, "and see for yourself." I found Fritz, Fred, and Hans living in one attic room. Furniture consisted of one rickety table and two chairs. There was no bed. A single candle, sparingly used, served as light for study and heat for thawing out numbed fingers.

Each of the three had one shirt which he wore only on Sunday. One cannot live like a gentleman, they explained, when a fair-sized laundry bill runs up into the millions of marks. For food they had an ingenious arrangement: by pooling the earnings of their spare hours they found they could afford one full meal each day. Consequently, every third day each of the three dined like a king in a dirty, cheap little restaurant; and then returned to his room to munch on dry bread for the next two days while his companions took their turns.

Then there was Rudi. Rudi comes from a good family. All last year he worked through the night in a locomotive factory and studied during the day. In the spring he was discharged from the factory; he was too weak to work. Rudi, it seems, had contracted tuberculosis. It is spreading like pest in Munich, and easy enough for a half-starved man to get. But Rudi wasn't going to give up; he applied to the Studentenhilfe or Students' Relief for a fighting chance. What they told him Rudi took calmly enough. They said that to help him would consume enough of their funds to provide for four healthy students; and that in time of universal distress they had to provide first of all for the fit. Rudi, in other words, was too big a risk. He would have to shift for himself. So Rudi bade us a rather carefree farewell, refused to accept a penny, and disappeared. Nobody seemed to care. When a ship is sinking every man looks out for himself, and there isn't much sentiment wasted on the fellow who can't. Besides—Rudi is only one of many.

Missing most of Europe—no doubt. But there are some things which the English rubber magnate, and Miss Fanny Ward, and Mr. Preston Gibson are missing, too; things which I wish they could see as I have seen. I wish they could see the glittering, half-starved animal eyes in the emaciated boyish faces up here on Ludwigstrasse. I wish they could see the crude food served in the mensa academica which, even at reduced prices and still more reduced portions, costs thousands and thousands of marks. I wish they could see the threadbare clothes, and the tiny, dingy rooms devoid of even a flicker of heat in the winter. I wish they could spend half a morning in the little green office of the Ausländische Studentenhilfe für die Münchner Hochschulen, a small group of foreign students organized in the hope of pouring here and there a drop of water on a hot stone. "We shall have to select more carefully when the university opens in November," they could read on a placard over the door, "for now we can help only the best and the neediest. It will take $3 a month to support a student this winter. Last winter we did it on $2." And the dollar bills, apparently, are coming in slowly. Most foreign tourists who pass through Munich are too busy reading the continental edition of "The World's Greatest Newspaper"—and seeing most of Europe. Fully one-third of the 15,000 students at the University of Munich, despite every effort to help themselves, despite the sacrifices of graduates and friends of the institution, are utterly unable to keep above water. A good percentage of that third are actually facing slow starvation or the inevitable diseases that accompany undernourishment. And all this was so a month or two ago, when students could still get a plate of macaroni, a few potatoes, and a chunk of sour black bread for 10,000 marks. What are students going to do this winter?

Many of them, obviously, will not be able to return. To the European youth, giving up his studies is not simply a matter of surrendering so many football games each year, a junior prom, and a frat pin. It means that he is once for all shut out from the profession for which he has been preparing half of his life; that he must probably become, at least in the immediate future, a common laborer; that he must definitely surrender the social and intellectual life which is the prerogative of the cultured German.

And the others—many of whom will be unable to find permanent work—will come back. They will have to endure again the torturing humiliation of begging and bickering their way. Those who graduate have little hope of finding a position or of being able to apply their learning. To buy a single scientific textbook will cost them a whole month of the pay they drew digging with pick and shovel in the mud of the Isar canal, or cutting peat under a glowing sun in the Bavarian highlands—that is, provided the money doesn't depreciate to one-tenth its value, while books increase tenfold, both of which are more likely than not. Think of it! A month's pay for a single commonplace book such as 50,000 half-interested American students will be buying now for a $5 bill without even a second thought.

There they lie beside me: the letter on one side, the newspaper on the other. "If only I can help him a little. . . ." And then my eye skips down the smug columns of print: " . . . eight hundred were served at the gala dinner last night in the Restaurant des Ambassadeurs. . . . Mme. Sapene, with the most elaborate collection of jewels seen here this year . . . two ropes of pearls, earrings with four huge stones each, six wide diamond bracelets. . . ."

Somehow, I'm rather glad I am missing most of Europe.

The German Samson

By AGATHA MARSHALL BULLITT

Berlin, August 20

IN some old fantastic lampoon—was it by Goethe or Voltaire?—I remember the dire dilemma a state fell into, because its paper-note printers laid down their work and went off on a holiday. What sounded like a grotesque satire, an impossible situation amid impossible surroundings, has become literally and acutely a fact in Germany today. The dollar skyrocketed up to one, two, three, four, five millions of marks in less than as many days, the prices ran a race with the dollar, foodstuffs pretty nearly vanished, people became panicky, the Reichsbank printers struck. Berlin waked up one morning to find herself without even worthless paper marks enough to keep the pot boiling for the day. The banks closed. What was the use in keeping them open when there was no money in them? Trillionaires found themselves with scarcely the wherewithal for a meal, at least as far as German currency was concerned. Those who had Devisen thrust their hands down into their treasure and brought forth two, three, four dollars, whatever was necessary to supply their needs for the day. But see! though the dollar was officially standing at four to five millions, these Croesuses discovered they could only realize a million, or perchance half a million, on their dollar. The German waiters, shopkeepers, and porters abruptly turned the tables on those who had been demanding cartloads of hard-earned German paper for one small American greenback; the owner of foreign Devisen could take what was offered him by the happy possessors of million mark bills, or he could go hungry.

A strange sight, a city like Berlin, without money! Huge factories not able to pay employees, offering coupons that could be redeemed at the banks when the money mills again began to work; employees refusing to take these coupons, for it would mean hours of weary waiting in front of the teller's window; the factories trying to appease them by payment in Naturalien, in margarine, rice, noodles.

The shops, most of them, closed their doors, or kept open for only a few hours a day. There was little in them, and that little they wanted to hold back till they could see what was what. The housewives lined up by the hundred, with camp stools and knitting, vaguely hoping by a many hours' vigil to obtain a quarter of a pound of something to stave off hunger from the family. In some places riots took place and numbers were killed. I have not myself chanced to run across serious disorder, but intense excitement prevails. And why not?

Wages and salaries ranging from six to fifteen millions a week, with butter (when you can get it!) costing a million and a half a pound, meat two millions, a loaf of bread two hundred thousand, an egg sixty thousand, a pair of shoes thirty millions, a suit of clothes fifty millions! Who can pay such prices? None but the foreign capitalist or the native profiteer. Down with both! What's the use in working if you can't make enough to live on? And as for saving, none but a maniac would think of laying up for tomorrow. What buys a good drunk tonight may not pay carfare in the morning.

That's the worst of the whole miserable business—you never know one minute where you stand the next. If you could only say: So much for rent, so much for food, so much for clothing, and make so and so much. But no; you have not the slightest idea what your expenses will be from day to day, or from hour to hour. While having your lunch at a restaurant, the waiter comes and changes the prices on the menu; you probably have to pay double what you expected when you gave your order. You only know one thing: you cannot possibly meet expenses with what you are making, and you see no possibility of making more.

So much for those who are lucky enough to be employed. But what about the many who have no such luck—those who have desperately looked for work and can find none? There are but three alternatives. They are literally driven to dishonesty, to begging, or to despair and death. Of those by circumstances driven to a dishonest livelihood I shall not speak. Their sins be on the heads of those who robbed Germany of the means to look after her own. The beggars fare comparatively well; there is still a crust of bread for them here, a plate of warm soup there. But those who cannot beg and cannot steal! Among them are to be found Germany's best. They are going completely under—are almost gone—yet so quietly, so decently, that the outside world hears no moan. They brush their threadbare clothes and take a walk when night comes on that none they know may see their plight. Or they tramp the streets by day, looking always, always. . . . Is there work nowhere for willing men and women?

The workmen have their unions. To a certain extent they are looked after when unemployed. But the brain workers? Nobody can pay for brain work in Germany today. They are verily starving. The aged and the ailing are starving too. Words fail to describe their anguish—the slow wasting away.

Is it a wonder that the German people are nervous, overwrought, incapable of sustained clear thinking? The wonder is they are as calm as they are. But can this calm last? Hunger stalking a land makes it ripe for change. The Communists are holding meetings which are hugely crowded. And a new note is being struck at these meetings—the national note. In the old days German Communists, in their efforts to be truly international, succeeded often in being only anti-national. It is different now. Their appeal is to the German people as a whole: to the intellectual as well as the manual worker; to the small shopkeeper and to the official; to all who are suffering under the intolerable strain of the time; to the great middle class that has become more proletarian than the hardest day laborer. To these the Communists appeal, urging them to join in the effort to free the fatherland from foreign imperialism, foreign capitalism; to make Germany a place for the German people to live and be happy in. It is said that this new appeal is but a maneuver—that the German Communists have seen they cannot win over the masses without appealing to love of home and fatherland; that Radek has given the word, and they are following his lead. This may be, but the drive is a powerful one, and anti-Communists, the world over, if they wish to hold their own against the despairing German masses, would better have a care!

Germany is ill fitted just now for experiments. Undernourished for years, she is physically and mentally anemic. Though strong and hardy by nature, the superhuman strain that she has been under has sapped her vitals. The strain must be lifted if she is to live, not a new strain put upon her. To attempt to introduce Communism at this time would be death to Germany, I am convinced. Her enemies may be glad to hear this. But she will not go down alone; her death will spell the death of those who have brought her to this pass.

There was a strong man once shorn of his strength by the enemy's cunning. They put out his eyes, bound him with fetters, and made him grind in the prison house. Then they brought him out one night and bade him make sport for them at their banquet. And he, sitting between the pillars of the banqueting hall, remembered his lost strength and his lost sight. And he prayed to God that his strength might be given back to him just once to be avenged of the enemy. "Let me die with the Philistines," Samson cried out in his anguish, and his wish was granted him. "He took hold of the middle pillars upon which the house stood, . . . and he bowed himself with all his might, and the house fell upon the lords and all the people that were therein. So the dead that he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life."

Pebbles in the Farmer's Boot

By H. G. ANDREWS

WHILE the farmer is totaling his losses, a portion of the public is tabulating his gains. The farmer, consulting his bank balance, contrives desperate means of relief for a desperate financial situation. Statisticians, consulting government reports, present surprising proof that agriculture is on Easy Street.

The foot that wears the boot is the one that has the decisive sense of pain. If the foot hurts, bootmakers may present figures showing the foot gear is large enough, but those figures will not prove whether there are pebbles in the boot. The farmer is walking lame. He insists he is lame. The boots he wears seem to be large enough. In such a situation the obvious thing to do is to look for the pebbles.

Agriculture has always had its recurring periods of travail. Like other big industries uneconomically organized, it is prince or pauper. Which means that agriculture suffers from an inferiority complex in one generation and from delusions of grandeur in another. Just now the delusions of grandeur, born of war-time prices and conditions, seem faded into the post-war inferiority complex due to changing conditions which in their essence are related to some process of deflation. Agriculture, through its spokesmen, would say that there is now no need for deflating the farmer, since he is flatter than flat right now. Facts are more personal than figures. Nevertheless, let's have a look at the figures.

If the decade from 1910 to 1920 is made the basis of inquiry, it appears that the American farmer was making money all of the time. He apparently closed every year with a nice, fat paper profit. Moreover, the farmer was one of the fortunate industrialists for whom profits ran that were in no wise dependent upon labor performed. Farm investments have appreciated very materially. Any business concern that doubles its investment in ten years—makes 100 per cent by the unearned increment route—is doing very well. The American agriculturist did that. According to the census figure, the 1910 farm-land value was, in round figures, $28,000,000,000. By 1920 that investment had increased to approximately $55,000,000,000. Those figures cover both improved and unimproved farm land. It does not do at all, however, to say that the increase came about by reason of improvements. For the unimproved land increased as rapidly as the improved land. Indeed, in many instances it increased faster.

This is what we are up against on the face of things. Spokesmen for the agriculturist say that farming is a business and that judged by business standards it has been consistently a losing venture. Truly, then, we have a most remarkable situation—something strange in the annals of finance. We have a business that has been losing money but which has been increasing in value at the rate of 9 per cent a year. We have an industrial plant that does not pay its way but which is marked up in price all of the time. The rise of the American agriculturist, as told in the Federal census figures, is an inspiring one. Here are a few of the facts as far as the period between 1910 and 1920 was concerned:

The value of farm land increased $26,354,000,000.

The value of all farm property increased $36,933,000,000.

The value of farm improvements increased $7,490,000,000.

The value of implements and machinery increased $2,329,000,000.

As against all of these increases, the mortgage debt increased only $2,277,000,000, reaching a total of approximately $4,000,000,000.

But let us pause to listen to an objector. The four billion dollar mortgage figure, says he, is not large enough. Correct. It does not include mortgages on farms tilled by tenants. Such mortgages are perhaps an evidence of agricultural well-being. A farm that can support a tenant, an owner, and a mortgage at one and the same time is by no means a bankrupt concern. It is, in fact, going rather strong. But suppose farm mortgages totaled $8,000,000,000, the highest figure mentioned in this connection. What is an eight billion dollar mortgage as against a seventy-seven billion dollar property? Any other industry in the country except agriculture so fortunately situated would consider itself on Easy Street. The truth is that no matter how farm figures are handled, the farmer apparently turns up as a miracle worker in the financial world.

There we have the one phase of the situation. What is the other? Senator Capper in a recent statement says that 600,000 people will leave the farm during the present year. The Senator intimates that the low price of wheat is driving people away from the farm. That is the position farm bloc leaders generally take. There is a stock reply to the wheat argument which runs about as follows:

The wheat crop comprises in value about one-sixth of the annual total production. The per capita consumption of wheat in the United States is about 600,000,000 bushels, of which the 50,000,000 people on the farms consume one-half. In addition, the farmer feeds a lot of wheat to his stock and needs 100,000,000 bushels for seed. All of that leaves the exportable surplus of wheat somewhere around 200,000,000 bushels. Suppose wheat is low, say the people who talk back at the farmer, corn brings a good price. Surely the farmer can stand it to lose $100,000,000 or even $200,000,000 on his wheat if he gains approximately $700,000,000 on his corn crop.

The figures for comparative wheat and corn prices are right enough. They are facts. The answer to that is another fact. Senator Capper is quite correct when he says that in all probability 600,000 people will leave the farms during the year 1923. That is only part of the story. The facts are that more than 1,500,000 people have left the farm since 1920. It is only necessary to circulate around among the people who leave the farm for the towns and cities to find that all of them are not leaving because they want to. A great many of them leave because they have to.

It takes a lot of money to live in town, city folks say. That is right; but it takes a lot of money to live in the country. It takes so much money that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the landless man to obtain a home that he can call his own. Any farmer worth his salt works for the time when he will have a farm that belongs to him.

In 1880 there were approximately 4,000,000 farms being tilled in the United States. Seventy-five per cent of them were occupied by their owners; 25 per cent were occupied by tenants. In 1910 there were approximately 6,300,000 farms in the United States. Owners operated 63 per cent of them; tenants operated 37 per cent. It is important to understand not only the extent of tenancy but also at what rate it is increasing or decreasing. On the basis of the number of farms involved tenancy increased 44.5 per cent in the United States between 1880 and 1910. At the rate of increase in tenancy that has been prevalent since 1910, approximately 55 per cent of all the farms in the country will be under tenant operation by 1940.

The rungs of the ladder upon which the landless man climbs to farm ownership are, roughly, home labor, hired labor, tenancy, and ownership with or without mortgage. The rapid increase in land values during the last thirty years, and particularly during the last eight years, has made it increasingly difficult for the landless man to acquire a home. This is shown by the fact that statistics compiled in three typical Mid Western States reveal that those who attained their farms thirty or forty years ago spent an average of 5.2 years as hired hands and 4.9 years as tenants. Three decades later the hired-hand stage occupied 7.9 years and the renter's stage 11.1 years. That is, nineteen years of labor, nineteen years of unceasing toil before the average landless man can secure a farm—blanketed by a mortgage.

Farming is popularly regarded as a stabilized industry as far as ownership and management are concerned. The contrary is true. The annual turnover in agriculture, ownership, and management, being the factors considered, is so great that no other industry could experience it and survive. Twenty per cent of all of the farms in the United States had different occupants—owners or tenants—in December, 1922, than they had the year before. During the year 1922 approximately 25 per cent of the farms occupied by tenants changed hands. During that year at least 10 per cent of the farms changed owners.

The never-ending travels of the tenant farmer, the yearly search for something better, is not evidence of rural prosperity. The tenant moves for a variety of reasons, the principal one being that he has to. Perhaps the landlord raises the rent. Or the tenant finds he cannot pay the rent contracted for. The tenant is perhaps sold out for debt. Or he believes that in some other county or some other State he will have a better chance in his fight to achieve economic independence.

Here we have the crux of the agricultural problem. Production is increasing per man employed upon the farms. Price levels as a whole have tended to increase. Farm lands in many districts have within the last twenty years jumped from $75 an acre to $475. Many farms have changed hands at even higher prices. Agriculture has all of the external statistical evidences of a highly prosperous, thoroughly stabilized and standardized industry. And yet agriculture walks with a limp. There are pebbles in the farmer's boot.

A farmer writing in the San Francisco Chronicle makes a general explanation of the condition in which he finds himself, saying:

There is no doubt that multitudes of the small farmers of whom I am fairly typical, and who are making the outcry, are in real trouble if they have bought farms at inflated values, expecting to pay out by the sale of products at inflated prices. A good many such will go broke; so will some tenants who have agreed to pay rentals which cannot be got from the lands. It is unfortunate. In many cases it is pitiful. It cannot be helped. They did not know that extreme inflation must inevitably be followed by a corresponding depression. The pendulum must swing. Incidentally—I wish I knew when—it will begin to swing back toward prosperity

But comments of this kind get us nowhere. They are explanations that minister to confusion. The Iowa farmer who recently wrote a letter to the New York World hits the mark. He bought his land for $65 an acre. It is worth $425 now. This farmer says that if he figures on the basis of his actual investment he is doing all right, but that if he figures on present or recent sales value, he is losing money. Even as crop prices range now he "could get along." But God help the man who buys the place at the $425 figure!

When a farmer says that his land is worth $425 an acre, what does he mean? What are the factors that have contributed to that value? Just what has been capitalized? If the farmer would begin answering those questions honestly and intelligently, he would perhaps be less inclined to "cuss" the money powers. For the farmer has helped make the agricultural rope that is slowly strangling him. Here are some of the factors the farmer has capitalized:

The railroad. Land prices went up as soon as a branch-line or a main-line railroad was within hauling distance of the farm.

The country school—the entire rural-school system. Land went up because "we have fine schools in this county."

Hard roads. Land always goes up wherever "there is an improved highway to market."

Modern invention—binders, tractors, threshing machines, all modern farm equipment. The farmer believes that the money interests capitalized the twine-binder and the tractor. They did. But where they capitalized for thousands the farmer capitalized for millions.

Freight rates. As freight rates have declined, as markets have become more and more accessible, land prices have increased.

Growing urban population. That's right. The farmer has capitalized the city. In 1890 64 per cent of the population lived in the country. In 1920 49 per cent lived in the country. The more people there are in the cities, the more people there are to feed. The greater the demand for farm products, the higher the prices of land. The growth of the cities has ministered to farm prosperity, and everything that ministers to farm prosperity the farmer capitalizes.

The landowner does not overlook any bets. New York, for example, is now a congested port. It is one of the most expensive ports in the world. If New York spends half a billion dollars on its port, decreasing the charges in and out, the farmer will capitalize the decrease.

At the present time the agricultural bloc is demanding lower freight rates. If freight rates are reduced, the reduction will be immediately capitalized. The farmer does just what the railroad does, which capitalizes all of the prosperity that comes its way.

The wheat growers, who are now making loud outcry, have been insisting that the canalization of the St. Lawrence would increase the price of wheat ten cents a bushel by reducing freight charges to Liverpool. Suppose freight rates to Liverpool on wheat were reduced, would the American farmer capitalize the reduction? He certainly would.

High prices for farm products are, of course, another factor that is promptly capitalized in terms of land value.

What does all this mean to the tenant, who comprises about 40 per cent of the agricultural population? It means that the way currents are now setting the more prosperous agriculture becomes the harder it will be for him to obtain a farm home of his own. The man who owns land exacts from the tenant payment for all the benefits our present order confers upon agriculture. The landowner even capitalizes the advent of the automobile. Hard roads and Ford cars have made farm isolation a thing of the past. The tenant pays for the fact he is not isolated. He pays in terms of ten years of his life. Whereas a decade ago he could become a home-owner in ten years, it now takes him twenty—on the average. The tenant pays in the form of rent for all agricultural benefits and the purchaser of farm land pays. The man who buys 160 acres of land in Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, at the present time, pays for more than land. He pays for the railroads, the schoolhouses, the hard roads, for modern invention, and for the fact that cities like Chicago and New York have become places of comparatively easy access. Moreover, the purchaser of farm lands at prevailing prices, owing to the fact land values have not as yet been very materially deflated, would pay a good round sum for the high prices for farm produce that prevailed during the war period.

The American farmer is one of the most sadly overcapitalized business men in the world. As a result, he is racked by business depression and is wrecked by business prosperity. The farmer, like landholders everywhere, appropriates to himself all of the values that result from our present complex economic and social life. These values are appropriated legally enough. Moreover, it is counted good business to capitalize agricultural benefits. But there must be a limit somewhere. There is a zenith for everything. Land prices cannot continue forever to mount. Overcapitalization in the end defeats itself. The burden becomes so heavy the public cannot bear it. And then individuals lose their stake.

Economic problems have a way of solving themselves if let alone. But the undirected solution is not always a pleasing one. The rural land problem is working itself toward a solution. The answer is—the tenant. When land prices are inordinately high, land passes from weak hands to the hands of the strong. It passes by the mortgage route and by the investment route; but it passes. Owners shift but the tenant remains the permanent factor.

Agriculture is prosperous. It is so prosperous that many farms for many years have maintained an owner, a tenant, and a mortgage. But prosperity built upon overcapitalization is deceptive. It can disappear in a night and with it the savings of millions of industrious workers.

Agriculture is prosperous. Agriculture is lame.

Speculation in land, the inflation that follows dealings in "paper profits," overcapitalization of both the earned and unearned increments, the attempt to perpetuate transient crop and price conditions in the form of permanent capitalization, the land-tenure system that makes possible the appropriation by the individual of values that properly belong to the community, tenancy, and inflation—these are the pebbles in the farmer's boot.

INDIANA: Her Soil and Light

By THEODORE DREISER

THERE is about it a charm which I shall not be able to express, I know, but which is of its soil and sky and water—those bucolic streams and lakes which so charm those who see them. And where else will one find such beech and sugar groves, so stately and still and serene—the seeming abodes of spirits and elves that are both friendly and content? Rains come infrequently and then only in deluging showers. Corn and wheat and hay and melons flourish throughout the State. Spring comes early. Autumn lingers pleasingly into November. The winters are not, in the main, severe. Yet deep, delicious snows fall. And a dry cold in the northern portion makes sleighing and skating a delight. The many lakes and streams afford ample opportunity for house-boats, lakeside cottages, and bungalows as well as canoeing and fishing and idling and dreaming. In the beech and sugar groves are many turtle doves. The bluejay and the scarlet tanager flash and cry. Hawks and buzzards and even eagles, betimes, soar high in the air. Under the eaves of your cottage are sure to be wrens and bluebirds. Your chimneys are certain to shelter a covey of martins. And to your porches will cling the trumpet vine, purple clematis, and wistaria. From the orchard and woodlot of your farm will sound the rusty squeak of the guinea hen and the more pleasing cry of the peacock, "calling for rain."

One should not conclude from this, of course, that the State is without manufacture, or that, size for size, its cities and towns are not as interesting as those of other States. To me they are more so. There is something in the very air that sustains them that is of the substance of charm. What it is I cannot say. You will find it suggested in the poems of Riley and the stories of Tarkington, a kind of wistfulness that is the natural accompaniment of the dreams of unsophistication. To be sure the State is lacking in urban centers of great size which somehow, regardless of character, manage to focus the interest of the outside world. Apart from Indianapolis, a city of three hundred thousand, there is no other of even a third of its size within its borders. Evansville, on the Ohio, and at the extreme southwest corner of the State, has possibly eighty thousand. Ft. Wayne, in the northern portion of the State, the same. Terre Haute, the most forthright of its several manufacturing centers, had, until recently at least, a population of seventy thousand. And because of the character of its manufactories which relate to steel and coal it is looked upon by many who are not a part of it as grimy. Its smaller cities such as Gary, Hammond, South Bend, Kokomo, Richmond, Muncie, and several others literally resound with manufacture, being centers for steel, packing, automobiles, engineering supplies, farm machinery, and so forth. Yet contrasted with the neighboring States of Ohio, Michigan, and Illinois—in particular the latter's northern portion—it pales as a center of manufacture. Ohio can boast quite ten centers to its one. In passing from any of these States into Indiana one is reminded of the difference between Holland and Germany or France, the one with its canals, its windmills, and level fields, dotted with simple homes, the other with its plethora of cities and factories and, in the old days, its ever-present army. The one is idyllic, the other almost disturbingly real and irritatingly energetic.

Yet to my way of thinking the State is to be congratulated rather than not upon this limited commercial equipment. Not all of our national domain need to be commercial, I trust, however much we may wish it. A few such pastoral areas might prove an advantage. Besides, as I have indicated, there is running through the mood of the State something which those who are most intimate with it are pleased to denominate "homey" or "folksy"—a general geniality and sociability. And with this I agree. The automobile and the phonograph, plus the dancing which the latter inspires, have added so much to the color of the small town and the farm in these days. Or, if it be the lone cottage, far from any town, with neither automobile nor phonograph, then the harmonica and the accordeon are found to be in service. And one may sing and dance to those. It is the light, or the soil, or what?

In this connection the church life of Indiana, as well as its moral taboos, have always interested me. Morality one might well assume by now, as well as all important social regulations, are best and most understandingly based upon and regulated by the Golden Rule. Beyond that, among the intelligent, restrictions and compulsions are few. Neither theory nor dogma nor ritual nor custom nor creed are disturbingly binding. Yet in my native State, and despite the steady growth in scientific knowledge, devotion to denominational liturgy and dogma appears to be unmodified. Go where you will, into any city or town you choose, and there will be not one but four or five or six or more churches of the ultra sectarian type and each with a lusty and convinced following. Nowhere, considering the sizes of the various cities and towns and hamlets, will you see larger or more attractive edifices of this character. And not infrequently the Bible school attachments or additions are almost as impressive as the church themselves. In short, sectarian religion appears to flourish mightily. It is the most vigorous and binding of all local social activities. The affairs of the church are not only spiritually but socially of the utmost importance. Nearly everyone belongs to one or another of the various denominations and the rivalry between the several sects is not infrequently keen, especially in the smaller places. And in the main, and despite all science, they are still imperialistic in their claim to revelation and devotion. Religious innovations are taboo. Even modern liberalizing theologic tendencies, though sanctioned by a stray soul here and there, are not in the main either understood or approved of. To this day in many orthodox quarters the youths of the hour are still discouraged from attending the State or any other university on the ground that they are "hotbeds of infidelity and irreligion." And the local press, running true to form, as it does everywhere, editorially sustains this contention.

And yet, as the world knows, Indiana has its "genius belt" geographically deliminated even, as "south of a line running east and west through Crawfordsville." And, locally at least, and until recently there was no hesitation in stamping the decidedly successful literary and art products of the State as the effusions of genius. Well, there's neither good nor ill but thinking makes it so. Certainly the State may well be proud of George Ade and Booth Tarkington and William M. Chase, the artist, to say nothing of those distinguished elders James Whitcomb Riley and General Lew Wallace, the author of "Ben Hur." Whether as much may be said for some others still remains to be seen. Certainly from the point of view of current popularity they have nothing to complain of. And as for posterity, well, posterity pays no grocer's bills. There are many aspiring writers who would gladly change place with George Barr McCutcheon or Charles Major, who wrote "When Knighthood Was in Flower."

Yet apart from these the State is not without a few personalities whose names will awaken responsive and other than literary thought beyond its borders—William Henry Harrison, the "Indian fighter" and quondam President, for instance, and Thomas B. Hendricks, once a Vice-President. Also Oliver P. Morton, an efficient early Governor; John Hay, diplomat, author, and cabinet officer of his day; and John Clark Ridpath, the historian. As a true and loyal Hoosier I suppose I should add that James B. Eads, the distinguished engineer, once lived in Brookville, Indiana, that Robert Owen founded his human brotherhood experiment at New Harmony, in Posey County, that Henry Ward Beecher was once pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, and that Abraham Lincoln is supposed to have studied those few books and caught that elusive something that later gave character and beauty to his utterances somewhere in a log cabin in Spencer County.

But beyond these, what? Well, beyond an agreeable and respectable and kindly social world in which to be and pass one's brief and changeful days, what more is needed? Trusts? There are several in active operation, ye tin-plate and ye steel trust, for instance; the former organized at Kokomo, Indiana, the latter in full and dictatorial swing at Gary and Hammond, where only so recently as July, 1919, a number of very respectable employees on strike were promptly and in true liberty fashion shot to death upon the streets of Hammond, their crime being, apparently, opposition to insufficient wages and certain (as they seem to have assumed) unsatisfactory piece-work conditions. The moral entanglements resulting from this method of adjusting labor difficulties are before the courts of Indiana at this very time. Large industries? Indianapolis, Kokomo, and South Bend are assumed to be automobile manufacturing centers of the greatest import, nationally and internationally speaking. The steel interests of Gary, Hammond, and Terre Haute are assumed, not only locally but nationally, to be second to none in America. Indianapolis has not one but several enormous packing plants. The underlying coal-beds of southwestern Indiana—especially about Terre Haute—are listed as among the important resources of the Central West. The melon- and fruit-bearing powers of the climate and soil of that same area have brought about not only specialization and intensive cultivation but a trade-mark which is of the greatest value. In addition the State has scenic wonders such as the caves about Wyandotte and such natural scenery and curative springs as have given rise to French Lick, West Baden, Mud Lavia, The Glades, and all the delightful lake life that characterizes its northern half.

But perhaps, after all, this is not the type of thing that should be registered of Indiana. Despite a long and happy intimacy with it, it is entirely possible that I have not even suggested or have entirely missed its truer spiritual significance as we are wont to say of so much that is but deeply human. Going south through Indiana once with a friend and fellow Hoosier, we two fell into a solemn and almost esoteric, I might say, discussion of the State and its significance, intellectually, emotionally, and otherwise. Previous to what I am about to set down I had been pointing out a number of things—not only those that have always appealed to me, the poetic and folksy charm of the State and its inhabitants—but also a number of other things that rather irritated me, its social devotion to dogmatic religion, for one thing, its rather pharisaical restfulness in its assumed enlightenment and knowledge of what is true and important to the world at large, its political somnolence as suggested by its profound and unchanging devotion to the two ancient and utterly platitudinous parties. With all of this he most solemnly agreed. Then, having done so, entered not so much upon a defense as an interpretation of the State which I will here set down as best I can.

"You should go sometime to an automobile speed contest such as is held annually at the Speedway at Indianapolis, as I have often, year after year; in fact, since it was first built. There, just when the first real summer days begin to take on that wonderful light that characterizes them out here—a kind of luminous silence that suggests growing corn and ripening wheat and quails whistling in the meadows over by the woods, you will find assembled thousands from this and other countries, with their cars and at times their foreign tongues, individuals interested in speed or fame or the development of the automobile. And this might cause you to feel, as it has me, that as rural as it all is, at times Indiana is quite as much of a center and more so even, than places which, by reason of larger populations, set themselves up as such. As I say, I have been there often, and getting a bit tired of watching the cars have gone over into the woods inside the course and lain down on the grass on my back.

"There, about me, would be the same familiar things I have always known and loved since I was a boy here, but that getting out into the world for a time had made me think that I had forgotten, though I hadn't—the sugar and hickory and beech trees, the little cool breezes that come up in the middle of the day and cool the face and hands for a moment, and rustle the leaves—the same fine blue sky that I used to look up into when a boy. But circling around me continuously, just the same, to the south and the north and the east and the west, where were the banks of the track beyond the woods, were these scores of cars from all parts of the world, with their thunder and dust, the thunder and dust of an international conflict. Then I would get up and look to the south along the immense grandstand that was there and would see, flying in this Indiana sunlight, the flags of all the great nations, Italy and England, France and Belgium, Holland and Germany, Austria and Spain. And it came to me then that the spirit that had been instrumental for some reason in distinguishing this particular State from its sister States, as it unquestionably has been distinguished, was and still is, I think, effective. It has won for Indiana a freedom from isolation and mere locality which is world-wide. It has accomplished here, on this quiet Hoosier soil, a very vital contact with universal thought."

"Universal thought is a pretty large thing to connect up with, F——," I contended genially. "And this is all very flattering to dear old Indiana, but do you really believe yourself? It seems to me that, if anything, the State is a little bit sluggish, intellectually and otherwise. Or, if it isn't that, exactly, then certainly there is an element of self-complacency that permits the largest percentage of its population to rest content in the most retarding forms of political, religious, and social fol de rol. They are all, or nearly all, out here, good and unregenerate Democrats or Republicans, as they have been for, lo! these seventy years, now—come next Wednesday. Nearly all belong to one or another of the twenty-seven sure-cure sects of Protestantism. And they are nearly all most heartily responsive to any -ism which is advertised to solve all the troubles of the world, including those of our own dear nation. I call your attention to the history of the Millerites of southeast Indiana, with their certain date for the ending of the world and their serious and complete preparation for the same; the Spiritualists and free lovers who fixed themselves in northwestern Indiana, about Valparaiso, if I am not mistaken, and Mormon fashion ruled all others out; the something of soil magnetism which drew Robert Owen from Scotland to New Harmony and there produced that other attempt at solving all the ills to which the flesh is heir. Don't forget that the Dunkards—that curious variation of Mennonism—took root out here and flourished mightily for years, and exists to this day, as you know. Also the reformed Quakers. And now I hear that Christian Science and a Christianized form of Spiritualism are almost topmost in the matter of growth and the enthusiasm of their followers. I have no quarrel with any faith as a means to private mental blessedness. But you were speaking of universal and creative thought. Just how do you explain this?"

"Well, I can and I can't," was his rather enigmatic reply. "This is a most peculiar State. It may not be so dynamic nor yet so creative, sociologically, as it is fecund of things which relate to the spirit—or perhaps I had better say to poetry and the interpretative arts. How else do you explain William M. Chase, born here in Brookville, I believe, General Lew Wallace, James Whitcomb Riley, Edward Eggleston and his "Hoosier Schoolmaster," Booth Tarkington, George Ade, John Clark Ridpath, Roswell Smith, who founded the Century Magazine, and then Lincoln studying and dreaming down in Spencer County? All accidents? I wonder. In fact I am inclined to think that there is much more to soil and light in so far as temperament and genius are concerned than we have any idea of as yet. There may be, and personally I am inclined to think there is, a magnetic and also generative something appertaining to soil and light which is not unrelated to the electro-magnetic field of science in which so much takes place. I look upon them as potent and psycho-genetic even, capable of producing and actually productive of new and strange and valuable things in the way of human temperament. Take little Holland, for instance, and its amazing school of great painters. And Greece, with its unrivaled burst of genius. Or Italy, with its understanding of the arts. Or, England, with its genius for governing. There is something about the soil and light of certain regions that makes not only for individuality in the land but in the people of the land."

"For instance," he continued, "I insist that the Hoosier is different mentally and spiritually to the average American. He is softer, less sophisticated, more poetic and romantic. He dreams a lot. He likes to play in simple ways. He is not as grasping as some other Americans and some other nationalities. That may be due to the fact that he is not as practical, being as poetic and good natured as he is. If he be poor and uneducated he likes to fish and play an accordeon or sing. If he is better schooled he likes to read, write verse, maybe, or books, and dream. In a crude way, perhaps, he has the temperament of the artist, and so I still look to Indiana, or its children, at least, to do great things, artistically. And all this I lay to the soil and light. Why? I don't know. I just guess that they have something to do with it.

"Nothing else explains to me Edward Eggleston and his turning to letters at that early time and in the region from which he hailed—the extreme southeastern part of Indiana. Or General Lew Wallace writing "Ben Hur" there in Crawfordsville, under a beech tree. Neither will anything else explain to me why the first automobile this side of France was built right here at Kokomo, and almost at the same time that the first one was perfected in France. Nor why the first automobile course, after Brooklands, England, was built here at Indianapolis—not near New York or Chicago, as one might have expected, perhaps. Or why an adventurer like La Salle should come canoeing up the Maumee and the St. Joseph into this particular region. The French, who first had this territory, chose to fortify at Terre Haute and Vincennes. Why? They might just as well have fortified at other points beyond the present State borders.

"What I am trying to get at is this: Via such a soil and such light as is here cooperating you have a temperament more sensitive to the resource above mentioned. In the case of those who wandered in here, like La Salle and Lincoln, you have sensitives affected by the conditions here. Their dreams or aspirations were here strengthened. This is a region not unlike those which produce gold or fleet horses or oranges or adventurers. There are such regions. They are different. And I look upon Indiana as one such."

"Bravo!" I applauded. "Very flattering to dear old Indiana, to say the least, and as an honest native, and moved by self-interest, I hereby subscribe. But—" And then I went back to the churches, the hard-headed conventionalities, the fact that the "inventor" of the first automobile here was accused of robbing the French of their patents, that Robert Owen was a canny Scot who saw to it that he never lost a dollar in his idealistic enterprise but held the whole town of New Harmony and all that thereunto appertained in fee simple, so that when the idea proved groundless he was able to shoo all his assembled theorists off the place and sell it for what it would bring. But my friend was not in the least abashed. He reproached me with being incurably materialistic and clung to his soil and light theory, which, I may as well admit, appeals to me very much. His final rebuke to materialism was that human nature in toto is nothing but a manifestation of forces which unavoidably assume opposite phases, which same we label good or evil, but which really are found to be supplementing each other in any manifestation which can be labeled life. So you may see how far Indiana, with its temperament carried us.

But admiring and even revering the State as my native heath I am perfectly willing to admit all of his claims and even more of such as may be in its favor.

Good Old Squirrel Cage

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE squirrel cage of national presidential political issues is turning at Washington with just about all of the good old standard stock squirrels in it and with many—if not most—of the recently intruded newcomers getting tired and dropping out or running slowly.

The proletarian revolution, which in 1917 and 1918 and 1919 seemed likely to become an extremely healthy and rapid squirrel by this time, is looking very thin and scrawny to the political eye and is running with a limp in every leg. Injections of propagandist arsenic and alarm by the American Defense Society and the United Mine Workers seem to do it little good. Labor as labor is occupying but a small place in the thoughts and plans of the gentlemen who are arranging the strategy of the campaign of 1924.

A minor exception to this rule is found at the spot where the new-fangled labor squirrel is seen treading on the toes of the good old-fashioned railroad-question squirrel which is running with all the energy and all the speed natural to an issue animated now by some fifty years of political experience in captivity. The labor problem in general has almost fallen out of the cage where the major parties chase their issues and their issues chase them. Railroad labor, however, through its adventitious association with the issue which most enrages the leaders of the "farm bloc" and of the "progressive group" is able to maintain a place among the minor worries of the political regulars and among the major hopes of the political guerrillas.

Railroad labor is relied upon to be the "town and tank-town" wing of agrarian radicalism in its fight upon the Esch-Cummins Transportation Law. In this alliance the farm is distinctly the senior partner and the locomotive the junior partner. Our pro-labor senators are virtually all of them from agrarian States. Railroad labor finds political cooperation with the Farmers' Union in Iowa easier than a political cooperation with the Plumbers' Union in Connecticut. The cornfields of Iowa give us that wooer of labor, Brookhart; and the machine shops of Connecticut give us that ignorer of labor, McLean.

In such circumstances the politicians are not much daunted by the specter of the solidarity of labor. They regard it as only a phantom squirrel. They are disturbed really only by Warren S. Stone and his colleagues among the leaders of labor on the railroads; and they are disturbed by them only as long as the farmers of certain Western States remain dissatisfied with farm-product prices and farm-product railroad rates.

Whenever farmers are angry, railroads are banged. That is the observation of the politicians. They will do little for labor as labor because labor as labor does politically little for itself. They put additional bridles on the railroads—or stick them full of additional pins—in precise proportion as the temper of the farmers seems to require it. The one ultimate large permanent dominant squirrel in American politics is the farmer, the Western farmer, when lean and hungry and accordingly in running trim.

The Democrats are hoping that in 1924 he will run in their livery. They intend to entice him most particularly by teaching their good old tariff squirrel to keep pace with his discontent. They have not forgotten that in 1892, upon the heels of the passage of the McKinley tariff law, Mr. Grover Cleveland of New York, on his way to the White House, acquired the electoral votes of Illinois and of Wisconsin and five of the electoral votes of Michigan. They are expending immense toil and trouble on the task of trying to make the Fordney-McCumber tariff law as unpopular among the farmers now as the McKinley law was then.

They are encouraged in this task by noting that Robert Marion La Follette voted against the Fordney-McCumber tariff law and was subsequently reelected to the Senate from Wisconsin by a majority of unprecedented size. They are further encouraged in it by noting that in Minnesota in the struggle against Mr. Magnus Johnson it was not thought wise by Governor Preus to give the Fordney-McCumber law any warm embraces in public.

In 1892 a third-party candidate—James B. Weaver of Iowa—running under the description "Populist"—got more than a million votes and carried four States. In 1924 the Populist Party of Weaver is succeeded by the Farmer-Labor Party of Henrik Shipstead and Magnus Johnson with the same mixed offerings of agrarian reformation, political progressivism, and labor sympathy. It is not doubted that certain of these offerings will translate themselves in certain ways into institutions to be established and venerated in the future. Such has been the fate of many of the offerings of the Populists. For immediate politics, however, the prospect of a Farmer-Labor third-party presidential candidacy in 1924 is regarded as an element in the fighting chances of the two old parties against each other rather than as an element gifted with any power to transform their policies.

The Republicans will defensively and soothingly praise Harding and Coolidge, just as in 1892 they defensively and soothingly praised Harrison. The Democrats, as their one important concession to novelty, will equip their tariff squirrel with a League of Nations tail.

Their advocacy of the League of Nations is subsiding to an advocacy of a vague participation in European affairs for the one specific visible and voluble great purpose of enlarging the market for farm products in Europe and of thus enlarging the prosperity of farmers in America. Peace as a motive is getting superseded by grain. A mandate to govern Armenia is getting displaced by a mandate to carry Minnesota.

The Republicans accordingly, just as aforetime, will attack the Democrats as economic internationalists and will praise themselves as economic patriots. Incidentally the Republicans will again undertake a special defense of centralized authority, as in the matter of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead law, while the Democrats, under pressure from such leaders as Al Smith of New York, will tend more distinctively toward a Jeffersonian defense of local self-government and of personal liberty.

Revolutionary economic ideas about a working-class state and revolutionary political ideas about a world-state are languishing in the Washington cage. The hardy veteran ideas of the elections of the last quarter of the nineteenth century are thriving. The imported squirrels are running like snails. The native squirrels, with a few patches of decorative imported fur on them, are running with all their old accustomed trained steadiness. America, my fellow-citizens, has collided with Europe and has veered off and is America—America—still.

Oklahoma's Klan-Fighting Governor

By ALDRICH BLAKE*

IT is quiet at the Capitol. For several hours Governor Walton has been interviewing job-seekers. He sees them all personally; he would like to help them all. Suddenly the monotony is broken: "A committee from Henryetta, Governor."

Oklahoma's chief executive smiles graciously, rises and shakes hands with his visitors—a minister, the chief of police, and a prominent business man.

The committee begins its story. The people of Henryetta are being intimidated by the Klan. A number of outrages have occurred. One man has been killed. The circumstances were——

The Governor interrupts: "I have heard enough. Mob violence is going to cease in Oklahoma; within five minutes the order will be given to place Okmulgee County under martial law."

The committee is dazed. The press of Oklahoma, always hostile to Walton, howls its derision. The Governor's friends are alarmed. "Jack has made a mistake," they say.

Oklahomans are still talking about "Jack's mistakes." They will tell you they love him on account of the "mistakes he has made." In fact, this young Governor thrives on "mistakes." It is the Walton way—a tremendous decision in a flash, a terrifying attack on the enemy, a wallop that leaves friend and foe alike paralyzed by the impact. You can hit as hard as you like. There are no rules, Queensberry or other. It's "dog eat dog" when Walton sounds the tocsin.

It is so in the Klan war that now splits Oklahoma asunder and threatens to assume national proportions. Academic discussion long since has ceased. A young Jew with a police-court record is seized on the main thoroughfare of Tulsa, taken to the whipping pasture, and severely beaten. The troops are ordered to Tulsa. The Governor is deaf to the suggestion that an investigation first be made by the civil authorities. "Make them feel martial law in Tulsa," are his orders to the adjutant general, "Tulsa is rotten. There is no civil law there, only Klan law. Why waste time?"

The strategy of attempting a civil investigation first does not appeal to him. He jumps a cog, maybe two. It is his way. He leaps across the first- and second-line trenches and engages the enemy in hand-to-hand combat at the very walls of the citadel. And he has never lost a battle. Some say it's the daring of the man that has made him a political leader of such tremendous power; others state he is possessed of unerring intuition, that instinct serves him better than reason.

In any event, Governor Walton does not pretend to be a scholar in politics. He admits that he is not "learned." His enemies assert he has never read a "serious book" in his life. Perhaps so; but his friends are not shocked. Governor Walton has drawn richly from the experience of everyday life and contact with the "under dog." As a locomotive engineer and railroad conductor, he studied men. He loves the poor. If you are "down and out," see Walton —that's what they will tell you in Oklahoma. If he can help you he will do it and he won't ask your politics. Publicly, he is a Democrat, but there are scores of Socialists and Republicans on the State pay roll—put there by Walton.

Just now the Governor is engaged in his greatest battle. For two years Oklahoma had lived under a cloud—a thick mist behind which the Invisible Empire gave its orders to sheriffs, prosecuting attorneys, jurors, and judges, ordered citizens flogged, threatened others, and instituted a business boycott against what they call the "alien world." The more timid leaders urged that the Klan be left alone, allowed to run its course. Meanwhile tens of thousands of citizens silently and sullenly submitted to a gradual encroachment upon their precious liberties.

Such a condition could not endure—not in Oklahoma where men value initiative, enterprise, and freedom. On August 14, Governor Walton sent the troops to Tulsa. In less than six weeks a Grand Dragon and a Titan have been put under arrest charged with rioting, four Klansmen have confessed to flogging a defenseless citizen and have been sentenced to two years each in the State penitentiary, many others have been bound over to the district court, the Invisible Empire has announced that all masked parades and meetings will be "deferred," and the fiery cross, which had brazenly burned in some cases from the tops of the courthouses, has been taken down and destroyed. Walton did it.

Personally Governor Walton is a most charming gentleman. A bitter foe becomes tractable in his presence. A woman with a couple of ragged children can win a pardon or parole for her husband quicker than the warmest political friend or the shrewdest lawyer. In fact, it is almost impossible for Governor Walton to resist the appeal of poverty, no matter what the request may be. Early in his administration he announced that all death sentences would be commuted during his term of office. A storm broke over him but he did not waver. And so again he braved public scorn when he wrote a letter urging President Harding to release the political war prisoners. "Here's the letter; now howl," he said to the reporters when making the communication public. And the papers howled. Another Walton "mistake."

His sympathy for the tenant farmers and wage-earners of the State is almost pathetic. "I cannot give them all jobs," he will say, "and political and industrial reforms are so slow. What can I do?" He has already given them warehouses, an anti-discrimination law, a first-class market commission, and legislation of inestimable value to the growing number of cooperative societies.

Governor Walton gets most of his amusement poking fun at Oklahoma's newspapers. In fact, he never fails to give the "corrupt press" credit for his political success. For years Walton has fought the newspapers and the newspapers have fought him, and Walton has always won.

By his enemies John Calloway Walton is regarded as a political adventurer, corrupt machine politician, hypocrite, and brainless tool in the hands of designing men who have crept into his councils; by his friends "Governor Jack" is hailed as the champion of political freedom and democracy, a two-fisted fighter after the style of Roosevelt and with a heart like the heart of Lincoln.

And so goes the battle in Oklahoma.

In the Driftway

TWO oddly similar tales of shipwreck and suffering at sea have recently come to the Drifter's notice, one recounting the escape of four of the crew of the barque Amy Turner, the other telling the story of the survivors of the steamship Trevessa. The Drifter has seen only the barest outline of the loss of the Amy Turner, attracted to the story by a headline in an English newspaper, reading "23 Days in Open Boat." Now, three days in an open boat, unexpectedly, is usually an adventure worth the telling, and when you add twenty more days, you have the fabric of high romance. The only hint of what those twenty-three days were like, however, in the account which the Drifter read, was contained in one line which said: "Lack of food and water caused the greatest suffering to the crew." One may accept that statement without undue or elaborate argument.

* * * * *

PERHAPS some idea of what the four men experienced may be gathered from the log of the captain of the Trevessa, for he was also twenty-three days in an open boat in circumstances probably not greatly dissimilar. The Trevessa foundered in the Indian Ocean on June 4, last. S. O. S. signals were flashed from her before she went down, but although they were answered, assistance did not arrive in time. The crew had to take to the boats. All got away, one boat in command of the captain and the other under the chief mate. Each boat had a moderate amount of tinned milk and ship's biscuit, but a scanty supply of water. At first the boats kept together, but this proved too much of a handicap, losing them much time, especially at night. So on the sixth day the men in the captain's boat, which had the larger sail, wished their comrades the best of luck, gave them three cheers, and as the captain wrote in his log "shook the reef out, hoisted sail, and carried on," heading as best they could for the island of Mauritius.

* * * * *

THIRST and cold are perhaps the two things most to be feared in an open boat. Owing to their location, the men of the Trevessa suffered only slightly from cold; but the torture of thirst set in almost at once, as the skipper had to limit them to one-third of a cigarette tin of water a day, and did not begin on that until after forty-eight hours. The captain, however, was wise in methods for obtaining relief. On the fourth day out his log reads:

> Instructed men to lift sea water in handkerchiefs and draw water into nostrils and blow out again, and not to allow any to get back in the throat. Tried this with good results. Also to strip to the waist and swill with sea water. Rather cold; only a few tried.

Fortunately the morale of the crew was good. On the fifth day the skipper wrote: "Issued ration milk and biscuit, and were treated by McGreen (A.B.) to the following little song:

"'I like ham and eggs,
I like eggs and bacon.
Anybody here says I don't like 'em,
He is jolly well mistaken.'"

One's heart warms to McGreen (A.B.). Not great poetry nor remarkable song, you sniff. Ah, but the proof of poetry or song is in their effect. Thus judged, the Drifter surmises that McGreen (A.B.) deserves a niche among the immortals. On the eighth day, according to the captain:

> All recognize now the benefit especially of wetting head and neck and keeping them wet. All sucking small lumps of coal and buttons. The latter helps a little to keep our mouths clean. For some days all have had a horrible taste in the mouth, and the mouth and tongue thickly coated with white slime.

* * * * *

THE first death is entered laconically in the log of the seventeenth day: "3 a. m.: Jacob Ali died. 7 a. m.: Jacob Ali buried." Just that for one spent life.

* * * * *

ON the twenty-third day the carpenter sighted Rodriguez Island, and was rewarded with a whole cigarette tin of water. The chief mate's boat landed at Mauritius three days later. In all thirty-three men of a crew of forty-four survived the foundering of the Trevessa. Ten died in the boats and another shortly after reaching Mauritius.

The Rest of West Virginia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. James M. Cain's article in your number of June 27, West Virginia: A Mine-Field Melodrama, is very good as far as it goes, but it is much more the view of a newspaperman going in to "cover" an assignment on the distressing situation in the coal fields than a picture of West Virginia by one who really knows the State. Even though coal may be the dominant force in the industrial and commercial life of the State, a large portion of the population is not directly concerned with it.

The hills of the Alleghany Mountains through the eastern and western "Panhandles" and the central portion of the State are not, as Mr. Cain describes them, "striking in their bleak ugliness" and "hard and barren save for a scrubby whiskery growth of trees." They are low, gentle, peaceful, and friendly, carpeted with grass and daisies or covered with thick forests of pine, chestnut, maple, and ash. In them lives a quiet farmer population much like that of many other of these United States. In them are numerous busy little towns with their inevitable Main Streets like thousands of other towns but saved from the hideousness of Gopher Prairie by their very lovely natural surroundings.

Agriculture is important throughout the State. The lumber industry once thrived and is still important. Oil and gas, two important products of the State, are not mentioned by Mr. Cain. Around Wheeling is a flourishing iron and steel section. Glass factories dot the State. Coal may be king, but there are royal princes.

Nor are all West Virginians mountaineers. The men working in the mines in the Fairmont and Clarksburg coal section, and many in the southern counties, too, are Italians, Slovaks, or Austrians. I have lived for thirteen years in the central and northern parts of the State and I have yet to see my first mountaineer.

West Virginia has been known for years as the Switzerland of America, but the unpaved roads which become bogs of mud in rainy or snowy weather make the State almost impassable for tourists. Moreover farmers from the outlying agricultural regions find it impossible to get to town for shipping their produce and for laying in supplies. Therefore the $50,000,000 good roads appropriation is not "futile."

The State university on the beautiful Monongahela River with its more than 2,000 students should not be dismissed as giving "innocuous and pointless" courses because it has not been able to settle or prevent the coal war. If subjected to such a test where are the successful universities? Nor are the "summer camps for girls" and the "farmer's short courses," extension activities, the main work of an institution which is indeed to be praised highly for trying to build up a grade A university in what is after all a pioneer State. The University of West Virginia has much the same courses of study as any other State university and gives them with much the same degree of merit.

In short, though Mr. Cain's essay is admirable in the field it covers, it is a picture not of West Virginia but of one section of it—the sinister outstanding section, it is true, but still a part and not the whole.

Books for Germany

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I have space in The Nation to voice the plea of Dr. Hertha Krauss, at the recent conference of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, for reading matter for the people of Germany, where the intellectual hunger is as hard to bear as is the physical hunger?

Magazines, no matter how old, are urgently requested, reading matter for children, also scientific papers or books for people financially unable to buy such.

Packages may be sent to her address: Cologne, Germany, care Wohlfahrtsamt. Let them be sent right away and at intervals during the months to come!

New York, September 12 BLANCHE WATSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As professor of English literature and culture at the University of Königsberg I desire to foster here in East Prussia an understanding of American culture, but I cannot do much for lack of books and periodicals. The collapse of the mark raises a high wall not only around the industrial but also around the intellectual life of Germany. In the name of my students I should be very thankful if you could help me with some books or periodicals concerning present-day America. The Nation is kept here both at the university library and in our English seminar. We get it through the World Association for Adult Education. And it is a great consolation for a German heart to read so useful a guide to American culture. Chiefly I get the impression that American culture is now trying to abandon the exclusively utilitarian and materialistic point of view and to become more broad and liberal. I am very much interested, for instance, in the attitude of Mencken, Lewis, Sinclair; in the philosophical movement which goes under the name of the New Realism, as well as in the American labor movement. But you see, we have no book by any of these authors in our library and are obliged to depend on hints and occasional mention in short essays. We would be most grateful if you could help to break the wall around Germany.

Nation Clubs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We who are earnest readers of The Nation well know that the present age is given over too much to the grossly material side of life, producing thereby a drab and soulless life, and tending to kill the intellectual part of human society, without which even Mr. Bryan couldn't perceive the differences between the man and the monkey. In a recent article in The Nation, Bertrand Russell goes as far as to suggest that he would rather see European civilization perish than to have the materialistic machine-age of America govern the people of Europe.

Knowing that Pittsburgh has many young men and women who are zealous readers of The Nation, I think that it would be a good idea to organize a club whose aim would be to further the progressive ideas brought out by the able writers of The Nation.

Young men and women of Pittsburgh, can we not be as interested in the vital things of life as the materialistic majority is interested in its trifles? I shall be glad to hear from those who are interested in forming such an organization.

Questions for Birth Controllers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of May 16, in discussing infant and maternal mortality rates, you say: "Only in regard to birth control do we show no signs of a modern scientific attitude." May I ask what is a modern scientific attitude as to birth control, "voluntary motherhood" as Margaret Sanger prefers to call it, or "voluntary parenthood" as Mary Ware Dennett puts the idea before the world with apparently some grudging recognition of the male as a factor in reproduction? In my opinion the most we can mean by "scientific attitude" in regard to "voluntary motherhood" is a patient willingness to keep on hopefully experimenting. That "voluntary motherhood" will cause some of the fundamental changes in racial or social conditions claimed by its advocates may be true; but nothing that these advocates have yet put forth in the way of facts proves that their contentions are founded on anything more than an earnest wish to see those conditions brought about.

"Voluntary motherhood" as a principle is very far from being generally applied the world over. But even if complete control were possible and were universal as a practice, no one (so far as I know) is in a position to say what its biological and social effects would be. Such little evidence as is at hand indicates, to my mind at least, that the world would decline considerably in population if propagation were left to a pure "parental instinct." That hard-headed sage of an earlier generation, William Graham Sumner, saw this clearly enough when he wrote in "Folkways" some twenty years ago:

> Children add to the weight of the struggle for existence of their parents. The relation of parent to child is one of sacrifice. The interests of parents and children are antagonistic. The fact that there are or may be compensations does not affect the primary relation between the two. It may well be believed that, if procreation had not been put under the dominion of a great passion, it would have been caused to cease by the burdens it entails.

"Voluntary motherhood" by contraception furnishes the conditions where the passion may be satisfied without entailing burdens, and hence we might confidently look for a tremendous decline in the birth-rate were this kind of knowledge universally available and the means at hand to use it.

From such data as are furnished by the birth-rate among American college women there is some slight ground to believe that population would diminish rapidly. It may be doubted if women with even a moderate amount of inborn intelligence are equipped with a sufficiently powerful and overwhelming "maternal instinct" (a term convenient but inexact) to make possible a perpetuation of present economic and cultural values under a system of "voluntary motherhood." At any rate I should like to see birth control advocates give us more explicit evidence to prove the point. As it is we are forced to believe that our present civilization is upheld in large measure by the careless and the "accidents." Perhaps it may never be otherwise. If so, it will be another illustration of the mystic saying of William Blake: "The Tigers of Wrath are wiser than the Horses of Instruction."

The Process of Government

Legislative Procedure. By Robert Luce. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

The Leadership of Congress. By George Rothwell Brown. The Bobbs Merrill Company. $2.50.

"LAWMAKERS must themselves be governed by law, else they would in confusion worse confounded quickly come to grief." Therefore we have rules of procedure, a set of officials with symbols of authority wherewith to keep peace if not harmony in legislative assemblies, and, most important of all, the unofficial but no less effective sanctions imposed by party discipline.

To an analysis, explanation, criticism of these forces in "the art of governing by parties" Robert Luce, an able Congressman with a distinguished record in the Massachusetts Legislature and the Constitutional Convention of 1917-1918, has set himself. The first of four volumes on "the science of legislation" has appeared under the title "Legislative Procedure." It deals with "parliamentary practices and the course of business in the framing of statutes," and explores the history and present practice of procedure with extraordinary thoroughness. Take, for instance, Chapter III, which deals with "the beginning of business." There are references to the practice in this matter of Athens, England (Parliament in three different periods), France, Germany, Switzerland, Russia, and to both houses of Congress, four colonial and eleven State legislatures in this country. On the single question of time limits for the introduction of bills at the beginning of legislative sessions the rules of twenty-six State legislatures are noted. A similar variety of material is used in almost every chapter of the book. Nor is it all gathered from permanent records, or the pages of Hatsell or Hines, where procedural precedents have been preserved; Mr. Luce has gathered his store of incident and argument from the obscure and ephemeral literature of newspapers, magazines, and unrecorded speeches.

Besides tracing the intricacies of legislative mechanics, Mr. Luce devotes several chapters to the more elusive elements of party discipline and partisan control of procedure. Of the caucus, he says: "The most serious of the objections to caucus rule, from the viewpoint of political theory, is that it tends to shut out the minority from all share in legislation. That is the result toward which the Cabinet system of England marches and already its ominous cloud hangs over Congress, when now and then we see vital problems of the most serious import handled under special rules permitting preposterous limitations of debate. . . . That is why he who believes in free speech, in argument, in deliberation, may well question the wisdom of the caucus system."

It is no small achievement to make the explanation of the dry detail of legislative formalities interesting reading; Mr. Luce has succeeded in making a reference work in bulk and range an unusually exciting exploration of the mysteries of quorums and motions, filibusters and caucuses. Layman and legislator alike will look eagerly for the succeeding volumes for which the first has set so high a standard.

One criticism may perhaps be leveled at Mr. Luce's work in those chapters which deal with the hidden things of partisan control of legislatures. He rarely goes behind the externals of the system; one could wish that he had, from his wide store of experience, brought forth a more searching interpretation in terms of psychology and sociology. It is something to be hoped for in a future volume.

If it be said that Mr. Luce has merely shown us the marionettes at work, Mr. Brown has in his "Leadership of Congress" given us a peep behind the scenes at the showman himself. For twenty years on the staff of the Washington Post, Mr. Brown has an intimate knowledge of the mechanics of congressional control, and a quick sense of the realities of partisanship on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Brown deals chiefly with the metamorphosis of the Speakership since the days of Clay. He paints in vivid colors the "revolution of 1910" and the successive depletions of the Speaker's power with the consequent dispersal and dimming of "visible" responsibility.

Out of this "obliteration" of the Speakership, since authority could not follow catastrophe into oblivion, there has evolved a curious partisan system of control, wielded not by individuals but by groups. While the exact organization of the steering committee and the choice of floor leader differ in the two parties, the purpose is the same, and the result. A small group of influential men, indirectly chosen through the party caucus, but often beyond its direct influence, or even defying it, are the wielders of power. They sit outside the formal organization of the House and operate it according to their will or whim. Nothing better indicates the change in relative significance among the intangible forces of party government than the fact that "on the invitation of Mr. Mondell, the Floor Leader, the Speaker, Mr. Gillett, was invited to attend the meetings of the (Republican) Steering Committee" in the 66th Congress.

In The Senate in Evolution Mr. Brown traces the development of "leadership" there, and the shattering of concentrated control by the impact of the agricultural bloc upon traditional ideas of party discipline. He considers that "the destruction of the party system and government by groups would be contrary to basic principles of American government." Whether one believes with Henry Jones Ford in the two-party system as the cornerstone of our political system and the fount of political virtue, or with Ostrogorski in his analysis of its breakdown in practice, depends on one's sectional and other social traditions, but it would be hard to convince "the richest man in Kansas" that he is a socialist, and we do not generally put anarchists on the Federal bench. Perhaps we are erecting a shibboleth into a symbol when we indict the emergence of political realities under the leadership of Senator Capper and Judge Kenyon.

Some Editorial Reminiscences

From McKinley to Harding. By H. H. Kohlsaat. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

People and Politics: Observed by a Massachusetts Editor. By Solomon Buckley Griffin. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

MUCH fun has been poked at this book of reminiscences by Herman Kohlsaat, one of the very finest examples of the now passing type of proprietor and editor we have had. Some have felt that it was a case of "Me and the President," with the particular President it might happen to be acting solely on Mr. Kohlsaat's advice and suggestion. Since these are avowedly random recollections of his friendships with the presidents of latter years, it is but natural that Mr. Kohlsaat should have dwelt upon his personal relations with them and emphasized the successes he achieved thereby. That it is all tinged with a harmless vanity is unquestionably true; but the fact is that editors in America have influenced politicians behind the scenes to no little degree. Even those who differed politically from Mr. Kohlsaat, particularly in his adoration of McKinley (whom he and Mark Hanna and others helped to foist upon the American people by paying his debts as governor and thereby creating such an obligation as, whether utilized or not, no president should suffer), have admired Mr. Kohlsaat's unselfishness, his refusal to take office, and his genuine desire to serve the country according to his best light. There are no deep or weighty judgments to be found in this volume, but many sidelights upon happenings which the historian of the period under consideration will have to take note of. Mr. Kohlsaat writes very frankly and correctly about a number of lesser personages than presidents, though chiefly of the latter. His book will not appeal to the society which has been formed for the glorification of Theodore Roosevelt and the professional extolling of his virtues, for Mr. Kohlsaat puts on record some of the falsehoods which, as every informed newspaperman knows, Mr. Roosevelt was constantly guilty of perpetrating. Particularly interesting is the light thrown by Mr. Kohlsaat upon the breaches between Taft and Roosevelt, and Wilson and Colonel House—the two warmest friendships in our recent political history, both of which ended abruptly.

Mr. Griffin's volume is much more solid, but not of greater historical value. It is disappointing in that he does not give us more of a picture of the inside workings of the Springfield Republican, that remarkable newspaper to which the senior and junior Bowles brought such high character, superb Americanism, and true idealism. It would have been extremely valuable for students of journalism if Mr. Griffin had omitted some of his recollections of local political worthies and devoted several chapters at least to a longer portrayal of the inner life of a great newspaper. Particularly scanty seem to us the references to the younger Bowles, to whom, however, Mr. Griffin pays in a short space a glowing and well-deserved tribute. For the fraternity it would have been interesting, too, to have Mr. Griffin's reflections upon the more recent decadence of what is still, in many respects, the foremost New England newspaper. In the cleanliness of its columns and in service to its locality it is one of our best American dailies, though without that noble internationalism, that breadth of spirit and mugwump idealism, which once made it the inspiration of liberals and anti-imperialists the country over. For the rest, Mr. Griffin's comments upon presidents and governors and other politicians are worth having, though there is nothing new or startling or original in his judgments, or in his presentation of many striking happenings. He, too, is aware of the glaring exceptions Mr. Roosevelt made in his application of the doctrine of the square deal, and he explains them as "due to temperamental intensities." For the late Senator William Murray Crane Mr. Griffin has a tremendous admiration which is shared by many who knew and loved the Senator personally, but there is a sad lack of discrimination between Crane the man and Crane the politician. For the local Massachusetts historian Mr. Griffin's estimate of Massachusetts governors will have some but not great value.

America and Asia

Americans in Eastern Asia. A Critical Study of the Policy of the United States with Reference to China, Japan, and Korea in the 19th Century. By Tyler Dennett. The Macmillan Company. $5.

EVEN if there may be some disagreement concerning the interpretation by Tyler Dennett of the events that had taken place in the Far East during the last century, one has to admit that the wealth of historical data contained in his most recent book testifies to indefatigable industry and zealous accurateness which turn the balance in his favor. Praise is due him not only because the field he covers is immense but also because he forces his way through the iron doors of diplomatic secrecy and presents to the American public a clear survey of the American relations with the Far East. The author distinguishes between two concurrent, but at the same time antipodal policies in the dealings of America with Asia. One of them can be described as resting on moral coercion while the other one is footing on a more or less cleverly veiled material coercion, or, at least, on its demonstration performed with an intimidating purpose.

The representative man of the first policy in America's Far Eastern relations was Caleb Cushing, pioneer, and father of the policy of the "open door." His idea of keeping the Chinese Empire intact in face of the aggressiveness of the European Powers was upheld by Humphrey Marshall and Anson Burlingame, two outstanding figures in the Far East who in their zeal to preserve the unity of China were chiefly responsible for the failure of the Taiping Rebellion, the greatest democratic movement of the East in the nineteenth century, coated in an unseemly religious bigotry. The policy of material coercion found its energetic advocate in Commodore Perry, who opened up Japan for the Western Powers. Perry dreamed of an unchallenged American supremacy in the Pacific region achieved by sheer force of arms. Dr. Peter Parker, the only American minister to China who spoke the language of the country, went even farther than dreaming when he submitted his plan to the Department of State for the occupation of Formosa. The distance between his policy and that of William H. Seward, Secretary of State at that time, was only one step but this one step is called common sense. In principle Seward was an adherent of the "gun-boat policy." He warned Japan that "the policy of forbearance and encouragement which the treaty Powers have hitherto practiced in Japan shall be reversed."

To understand the language used by Seward which seems so antiquated today it must be borne in mind that this was the time when, according to a report of Townsend Harris, France, in concert with Great Britain, was seriously contemplating the partition of Japan. The island empire was at that time in the fetters of the treaties of the Western Powers granting extraterritoriality to their nationals and reducing Japan in many other respects as well to the status of a slave state. The same double-faced policy made its appearance when McKinley and John Hay had charge of the American foreign affairs. McKinley went so far as to suggest the dismemberment of the Chinese Empire while John Hay became the champion of the territorial integrity of China. With masterly skill he managed to "keep the door open" in the most troublous times without resort to either force or alliance.

The question of a cooperative policy of the American administrations with the European Powers in the affairs of the Far East is another broadly discussed problem. Proceeding from event to event Mr. Dennett points out the absence or presence of cooperation with an apparent sympathy for the latter and thus tries to reach conclusions and to explain symptoms for which—in the opinion of many of his readers—it would be difficult to find any other satisfactory justification. The annexation of Hawaii and of the Philippines as a necessarily resulting natural consequence of the lack of cooperation is one of the many instances which might be cited here.

In addition to this main narrative there are episodes in the book which prove not inferior in dramatic value to the most popular "thrillers." Here is the account of the breathless struggle of Japan for recognition. After their "discovery" by Commodore Perry, the Japanese had no greater ambition than to be treated by the Powers as the equals of the Chinese. And, lo! in a marvelously short time they are sitting at the table of the white man treated as his equal.

The struggle of the Chinese against the white opium trader is another dramatic piece of the book. The Chinese protested against the import of opium, but the white opium dealer came, backed up by men-of-war and cannon, and loudly proclaimed his inalienable human right to do business wherever he chooses, even if it meant the miserable death of hundreds of thousands. The regulation by America of the Asiatic immigration, deprecated by Dennett, is commented upon as being the only problem in connection with the Far East in the solution of which the American Congress took the initiative. A picturesque description of the Boxer Insurrection and of the events that followed it heighten the value of the book as an interesting contribution to a rather dry topic.

Summing up the results of his investigation, Dennett finds that the fundamental principle of the United States in its relations with the Far East can be condensed in a short sentence:

"The American government demands most-favored-nation treatment." Unlike the European governments, insists the author, the United States wanted a strong East. The question was whether the United States should follow an isolated or cooperative policy to secure the open door. Dennett finds that the isolated policy is necessarily belligerent. It would inevitably lead the United States into a conflict not only with the European Powers but also with the Asiatic states, although, in the opinion of the author, the probability of such a conflict in the near future had been lessened by the agreements of the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and the Problems of the Pacific. ## Honest Pastorals

The Village. By Ivan Bunin. Translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The Sentry and Other Stories. By Nicolai Lyeskov. Translated by A. E. Chamot. With an Introduction by Edward Garnett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The Left Leg. By T. F. Powys. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IT is the same thing and yet it is always different. Every book from Russia is another document demonstrating the viciousness of Czarist rule; it is additional evidence of the tortures suffered by the people under that medieval and oriental autocracy; it is a new indictment on fresh counts; it is both explanation and vindication for the excesses of the revolution. This time we view the unbelievable poverty, bestiality, and abnormality of Russian life through even stronger glasses.

I find these two Russian volumes singularly supplementary; together they furnish an all-inclusive description of cause and effect in the existence of Russia's millions. The novel confines itself to the village and its mujiks. In its pages we are given the very essence of "Holy Russia." Here and there are overtones in which we hear faint sounds from city and church, prison and palace, but no official, no stranger, appears on the scene. None but sylvan characters act in this pastoral, and the villain of the piece is never seen. For here tragedy comes from the fact that the village is a perfect product of stupid governmental oppression exercised on a primitive folk.

Gorki has recently pointed out that the Russian revels in a diabolic cruelty and that Ivan Bunin's novels disclose this quality in the peasants' daily relationships. In this respect "The Village" is undoubtedly the most significant of these novels. Kuzma, its raisonneur, makes cruelty his theme and his key to the interpretation of the mujik. "Just think it over: is there any nation more ferocious than ours? In town, if a petty thief snatches from a hawker's tray a pancake worth a farthing, the whole population of the eating-house section pursues him, and when they catch him they force him to eat soap. The whole town turns out for a fire, or a fight, and how sorry they are that the fire or the fight is soon ended! . . . And how they revel in it when some one beats his wife to death, or thrashes a small boy within an inch of his life, or jeers at him! That's the most amusing thing in the world." It is the cruelty of those who neither value their lives nor respect their persons.

Lyeskov shows why. He shows the martinet army which demands that the soldier divest himself of reason and pity. He presents Russia during the days of serfdom—drunken, ignorant autocrats madly tormenting thousands of helpless beings. He tears away the cloak of holiness from the church showing its bureaucracy, stupidity, and worldliness. He depicts, in short, the background, the institutions, and the machinery whereby Russia has dehumanized her peasantry. Let none get the impression that these stories are less interesting as fiction because they contain so much of truth. Quite the contrary! The four tales in this volume are equal to the best of Chekhov or Turgenev, and they are better rendered into English.

Mr. Chamot has achieved a remarkable translation. It is smooth and compact and, in addition to being good English, it brings back a tang of the Russian. Miss Hapgood's work, though it carries on the spirit of the original, is technically less admirable in that it is often far-fetched and almost always verbose. The quality of Bunin's prose is more nearly approached in the volume "The Gentleman from San Francisco." There, too, in the title story one has a basis for comparison with our own detached short-story writers. M. Bunin is more delicate, more ironic, and also more macabre.

Both he and Lyeskov treat a spade as an unadorned farm implement. Mr. Powys ties ribbons around it and puts it in the hands of a fool to use as a baton for some weird, cacophonous troll-danse. That's his manner of escaping brutal and ugly realities. For he, too, has found the harsh and the bestial in peasant life. His Dorset villagers are no more idealized than Ivan Bunin's mujiks though they are fantastically garbed. Their cupidity and ambition, passion and cruelty are real enough, but the characters themselves flap like scarecrows in the wind, dancing an awkward jig. The trick works, for it is hard to associate tragedy with the carnival spirit of a masquerade.

At times it is more than a trick. There is an individual charm and piquancy in the imagery and in the cast of expression; occasionally there is great beauty. On the other hand, Mr. Powys's mannerism is often confusing and, after a space, becomes monotonous. His country themes are kin to Mr. Hardy's treatment of rural life. He might well emulate the master's strong simplicity. At present—in contrast to both Russian authors—he is worth reading for what he has to say rather than for the way he says it.

Christian History

A Short History of Christianity. By Salomon Reinach. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

LIKE the compiler of an anthology, the writer of a "short history" can hope to satisfy but few. His sense of selection is so bound up with his own personality and point of view that there will always be found good grounds for caviling at the relative value of the facts which he includes in his résumé and those which he omits from it. And this is particularly true of theological history. Therefore, despite the structural shortcomings of Dr. Reinach's "Short History of Christianity," it is no difficult matter to accept a nolle prosequi at the outset. But it may still be necessary to insist that what he has given us is not a history of the Christian religion, as one might expect from the learned author of "Orpheus," but a history of the Christian church. Only in spots does he deal with the religion of Christendom, as distinguished from the organized forms of its worship and the dogmas of its creed. As a brief history of these his book is interesting, serviceable, and at times significant on its own ground. The first of its five chapters is an adequate and dependable presentation not only of the recoverable facts of Christian origins but also of the valid interpretations of those facts which commend themselves to that higher criticism so little understood by the average "counsel for creeds." A reading of the second chapter will make any average outsider realize how hard a task it is to tell, from the point of view of dogma, what Christianity really is.

The story which Dr. Reinach re-tells covers nineteen centuries, and it was to be expected that the wealth of source-material alone between the Reformation and our own day should make his account of that period seem sketchy and fragmentary. The task of marshaling the materials selected without losing perspective is a difficult one at best. Yet it has been done; e. g., by the late George Park Fisher in his "Short History of the Christian Church." Dr. Reinach's gifts would seem to appear to better advantage when exhibited on a higher level of scholarship. It is a far cry from "Le Mirage Oriental," or even from "Orpheus," to this barely respectable performance, in which a reputable scholar prunes his talents to the proportions of a popular handbook.

In the days of Buffon it was perhaps excusable for a naturalist to trim his evolutionary interpretations to the gusts of popular passion. But such a procedure on the part of a scholar in our day deserves condemnation. It is to be regretted that Dr. Reinach has seen fit to throw dust in the eyes of the educated mob by his post-mortem praises of a Christianity whose historical origins and supports he has so carefully undermined. The militant skeptic and the ruffling apologetic have driven many of us to turn our backs on both with "a plague on both your houses!" But even we are somewhat non-plussed at the easy virtue of Reinach's preface, wherein he maintains that "Christianity . . . has taught and teaches the only moral lessons accessible to everyone." And he repeats this sort of thing in the first and last chapters, in the face of Asiatic Buddhism of the present and Mithraism of the past. Certainly these are singular pronouncements to come from an historian of religions, and we look askance at this suspicious terminal glorification of a creed which he has just torpedoed. But perhaps it is well that a history of Christianity should give us furiously to think; and this book of Dr. Reinach does accomplish that very desirable end.

Castile's Darkest Hour

Le Roi Sauvage. Par J. Lucas-Dubreton. Paris: Librairie Académique Perrin.

SOME ten years ago M. Lucas-Dubreton published a study of sixteenth-century Florence, under the title "La Disgrâce de Nicolas Machiavel." The volume, which was unique in the vividness with which it reconstituted an epoch about one of its commanding characters, was favorably received and was crowned by the French Academy. Now the historian has done a similar service for the Castile of the middle fifteenth century. The random, baffled life of poor Henry the Impotent is here only the occasion for a study of Henry's country and his countrymen. If Henry IV had one constant passion it was his love for the somber hill-city of Segovia; and the first and best chapter of M. Lucas-Dubreton's book is a lively description of the city and the region, every corner of which the conscientious author has explored. He has been so caught by the desolate charm of Castile and the gloomy fascination of the period that he has written an absorbing book, if not a cheerful one. The title-page carries for a motto the comment on poor Henry's musical turn, "Tout chant triste le délectait," and the author remarks as he leads his reader along the dreary way from Burgos to Toledo: "L'histoire d'un peuple, ce sont les phases de ses maladies."

This study in folly and misery has no place for Henry's vigorous half-sister and successor, Isabella, or her shrewd and enterprising husband, Ferdinand of Aragon. They appear occasionally in the last pages, but M. Lucas-Dubreton has set himself to deal for the most part with brutality, wantonness, decay, and failure. His period is the dark hour before the dawn, and he only hints at the relief which is coming. He does, however, leave the reader with a kinder feeling toward Henry than one gets from the summary estimates of him in most of the histories. This unclean and futile idler-monarch was not, it appears, wholly bad after all. His tolerance for Jews and Moors was the fruit of a kind heart and not simply of perversity; and most of the misdeeds of his reign were the misdeeds of unscrupulous favorites who molded him like wax. If it is true that Isabella and her clever consort poisoned him, they did Spain a service; but we can feel more sympathy for him, perhaps, than if M. Lucas-Dubreton had not called our attention to his amiable qualities.

Books in Brief

William Hemminge's Elegy on Randolph's Finger, Containing the Well-Known Lines on the Time-Poets. Now first published with an Introduction and Notes by G. C. Moore Smith. D. Appleton and Company. $1.

An amusing excursion into a very small corner of seventeenth-century English poetry. Thomas Randolph lost his little finger about 1630, and this was the subject of some clever versifying by him and his young contemporaries. Hemminge's poem of 268 lines is very bad, but it contains many interesting references to living writers. A portion of it has been known for years.

Ein Zweig vom Schlehdorn. Irische Dichtungen ausgewählt und übertragen von Hans Trausil. Mit einer Einleitung von Padraic Colum. München-Pasing. Roland-Verlag.

In this most interesting and significant little book Ireland introduces herself to Germany through her ablest spokesmen, the ancient Gaelic bards and the poets of the modern Renaissance, the latter including Yeats, A. E., Dora Sigerson, Pearse, MacDonagh, and Mr. Colum himself.

The Principles of English Metre. By Egerton Smith. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

A wise and liberal treatment of the claims now of regularity and now of variety in verse. But its three hundred pages only add to the thousands now being produced in England upon issues which are almost purely the creation of metrical theorists, and which, if they mattered, could be settled in a minute by a poet.

A Concise Bibliography of the Works of Walt Whitman, with a Supplement of Fifty Books About Whitman. By Carolyn Wells and Alfred F. Goldsmith. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Convenient as far as it goes, and useful for what it pretends to be, a check-list for collectors and librarians. An exhaustive bibliography continues to be desired, not only of the various editions of "Leaves of Grass" but of the books and articles written about Whitman, so that his influence can for once be estimated.

Proserpine and Midas. Two Mythological Dramas by Mary Shelley. Edited with Introduction by A. Koszul. Oxford University Press. $1.20.

Verse plays of little interest other than as they are connected with the life of a remarkable woman. Four lyrics by Shelley appear here for the first time in their original setting.

First Fruits

THOSE who want plays of native authorship will be consoled by several successive recent openings; those who want good plays will not be quite so happy in their minds. For these American playwrights seem to be primarily "fellows whom it hurts to think." Yet they are somehow aware of the necessity of thinking in art; they do not want to be or to be thought quite frivolous and empty. So they go through the gestures of having reflected on life as well as observed it. But the gesture is false and the dramatic reasoning obviously specious, and in the conscience of Mr. Lee Wilson Dodd, at least, there must be, however smothered and disregarded, a little aching core of discomfort and regret.

Mr. Dodd's play, "The Changelings" (Henry Miller's Theater), is brilliantly cast. But it is more than a personal impression that neither Blanche Bates nor Henry Miller nor Ruth Chatterton nor the admirable Laura Hope Crews had either their accustomed elegance or fire. In spite of the wit and verve of not a few passages, the play lacks essential life. It lacks such life on purpose. Mr. Dodd dramatizes the conflict of moral concepts—the method of the great playwrights from Euripides to Shaw. But he takes as his motto the saying of Talleyrand: "Plus ça change, plus c'est le même chose." Now that weary and unveracious cynicism is the flat denial of the drama of moral concepts. For it is change in the moral world which makes that drama dramatic. In a perfectly static moral world there would be no stuff for drama. Since Mr. Dodd is a scholar I point out to him those memorable essays of Hebbel in which it is explained that great drama arises at the precise periods when one order of moral concepts is beginning gradually to yield to another. No, this is not breaking a butterfly upon a wheel. Mr. Dodd is a gifted man of letters. His structure and texture are accomplished. At the end of his play the starched and ermined resisters of change will go away comforted: "Aha, I always said, didn't I, that all this talk about freedom and flexibility and a new cleanness and abundance of life was only the babble of parlor Bolsheviks and silly Bohemians. Naw, human nature doesn't change, and so long as it doesn't—well, what was good enough for my ancestors is good enough for me. We'll just put down these people who want to be indecent and call their indecency by highfalutin names." That not only will happen; it has happened. So I am afraid that I must, strictly speaking, call Mr. Dodd's play an immoral one.

"The Lullaby" (Knickerbocker Theater), by Mr. Edward Knoblock, would need no mention save for its author's reputation. It is unbelievably meretricious and rancid. The scene is laid in France. But not in any country that exists under the sky. It is the France of Georges Ohnet. But to compare "The Lullaby" to the works of Ohnet—even that is doing it too much honor. It is one of the half-dozen worst plays in the world. Whoever has any kindness for Mr. Knoblock will try to forget it. Miss Florence Reed has versatility and power. Both are wasted here.

Mr. Jules Eckert Goodman's "Chains" (The Playhouse) is the best of these American plays. It is neatly written; it is honest; it is intelligent. It is the reverse of original. Mr. Goodman must remember that famous or, at least, once famous Magda Schwartze who, though she had a child, would not let her father force her to become an "honest woman," but preferred to remain a self-sustaining and honorable one. He must also remember a certain young person named Violet who appears and very formidably states her case in the first act of "Man and Superman." His restatement of the case in the terms of contemporary American life, however, has freshness and sincerity. You can tell that here is no dry imitation but that the case and its significance have been a real inner experience to Mr. Goodman. The result is that "Chains" is palatable to the intelligent and likely to be helpful to those whose ambition it is to be intelligent. A very engaging performance is given by Miss Helen Gahagen and others scarcely less agreeable by Miss Katherine Alexander and Mr. Gilbert Emery. A play almost equally praiseworthy in intention is "Peter Weston" (Sam H. Harris Theater), by Frank Dazey and Leighton Osmun. But its idea is worked out in terms of quite scandalous melodrama which not even the excellent acting of Frank Keenan can render credible.

I feel it a matter of duty and justice to call attention to the production of "Sabatai Zevi" at the Jewish Art Theater. The play, based upon a half legendary, half historical event in the post-exilic history of Israel, is hardly of the first order. The production by Mr. Maurice Schwartz and all his associates, down to the humblest super, has a splendor, a nobility, harmony, power, and expressiveness that it would be hard to praise too highly. Those who took such delight and such just delight in the Moscow Players' production of "Czar Fyodor" should pay a visit to the Garden Theater.

Japan and the United States

THE following open letter and its inclosure, sent by Viscount Shibusawa to friends in the United States, expresses the attitude of liberal Japanese toward American-Japanese relations. Viscount Shibusawa, who is now eighty-three years old, is Japan's leading merchant, and one of her wisest and most prominent publicists.

More than a year has now passed since the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armament. Many considerations render it desirable that the peoples of our two countries should take stock of what has already been accomplished and what remains to be done in achieving the desire of the great majority of us on both sides of the Pacific, that the best possible understanding and even the kindliest feelings shall prevail and continue indefinitely.

I inclose a statement in regard to the present situation, just issued by the Japanese-American Relations Committee of Tokio, in which I am sure you will be interested. And I am also venturing to write you somewhat fully on this matter, in order that you may know quite accurately what we on this side of the Pacific are thinking. . . .

That our countries have entered into new relations of a highly hopeful character can be disputed only by those who have not sufficient knowledge to appreciate what has been done and by those who are determined, for reasons of prejudice or personal interest, to promote suspicions and distrust. It is obvious that whatever militaristic disposition prevailed in Japan has definitely and irrevocably passed, and it is equally clear that the intentions of the United States to take advantage of her power and create an overwhelming navy are no longer to be regarded as a potential menace to us.

These are both causes of great and widespread relief to the Japanese people; and it would now be impossible to revive the old condition, with its concomitants of anxiety and resentment toward the United States and the anticipation of possible conflict between us. . . .

It may be even that a great entente, better in its mutually free understanding than in any binding commitment, has developed among the greater naval Powers of the world. That is a great and incalculable stride forward toward permanent peace, at least upon the seas. It is a basis upon which we can build new and nobler things, truer to the purposes of God and of enlightened human beings.

As far as Japan is concerned a great load has been lifted from our hearts, and we are turning with new vigor to the solution of pressing social, economic, and industrial problems. Already, though the naval treaty is not yet fully ratified, we have been relieved to the extent of more than $58,000,000 in the appropriations for a single year for our naval budget; such is the reduction of 1923 below that of 1922. A relief of similar and possibly greater sums, which might otherwise have been spent, can be expected for as many years as the naval agreement lasts. Likewise due to the understandings that have been reached, though not required by their terms, we have reduced our military force and have thereby saved many million dollars more; and this again is only the savings of the first year.

As a result of this notable relief, our Government has been able to add $15,000,000 to our annual national grant to the prefectures for the promotion of primary education. And, as an indication of the spirit that has come over us as a result of the relief, I might cite the significant fact that our Government intends to set aside as a permanent fund the remaining $22,000,000, due us from China in the Boxer indemnity, together with $10,200,000 from the payments on the Shantung railway and other properties and received in Shantung for the development of educational, medical, and other institutions that are so sadly needed in that unfortunate country and for the support of Chinese students in Japan. I may add that it is our hope that this and similar acts of consideration for our afflicted neighbor will, in the course of time, remove whatever suspicions may prevail that we harbor territorial or political designs that are incompatible with China's independence or integrity.

I am gratified to say that a great step forward has been made already in reassuring the Chinese, for, as is well known, the small garrison that we maintained at Hankow, about one thousand men, was withdrawn from that port last summer; in the autumn the 2,500 troops that we had in Shantung were all brought back to Japan; and northern Manchuria was evacuated by the thousand or more that we had stationed there. Meantime, the Japanese and Chinese delegations that met at Peking in the summer and autumn succeeded in agreeing upon terms for the transfer of the Tsingtao Tsinan-fu Railway to Chinese authority, and the port of Kiaochow was handed over in due course to Chinese administration; by January first all of the Japanese post offices in China proper were closed; and the new customs tariff, providing an effective 5 per cent, as agreed upon in Washington, was put into effect. In October of last year the garrison that we had been maintaining in and around Vladivostok was also brought home, leaving no further Japanese forces in Siberia. Our Government, moreover, has stated that it is also its intention, at the proper time, to withdraw the force that now occupies the northern half of Sakhalin Island.

Unless the will and spirit of the people supported the policies of the Government, it would have been impossible for such definite actions to have taken place, and it is, therefore, evident that whatever Government may come into power, there will be no radical change or retrogression from this far-seeing policy. . . .

With this basis of peace and security assured, we ought to be able to work out the minor difficulties and disagreements that exist between our two countries. To do this, patience and a consideration each for the other's point of view are essential. It is natural that some irritation and suspicion will continue to exist among some of our people, for we hear constantly of proposals for the increase of fortifications and naval accommodations in Hawaii, calling for the expenditure of scores of millions of dollar; we are informed of efforts to obtain appropriations for great naval bases in California; and we are even told that suggestions to fortify Guam, in spite of the Washington agreement, are made by men of some standing. Serious and well-informed Japanese, of course, realize that no American Government can view such proposals as in any sense necessary. Nevertheless, the discussions of such needless projects by American newspapers and politicians naturally create a certain measure of distrust in our country.

Is it not natural that our people are also deeply disturbed by reports from the United States of fresh plans for State legislation essentially humiliating to our race, proposals, for instance, to deny to American-born children of Japanese parentage the right to American citizenship, and proposals to rescind citizenship papers already given to Japanese young men who served in the American army during the Great War, citizenship which they secured, along with tens of thousands of young men of other nations who volunteered to meet the call of the President of the United States to serve the cause of America and the Allies in Europe? We Japanese find it difficult to understand such proposals. They seem carping and mean and not in keeping with the character that we have come to respect as American.

We find it difficult, moreover, to understand the persistence of the anti-Japanese agitation. In recognition of the desires of certain Western States for the limitation of Japanese labor immigration, the Japanese Government entered into what is called the Gentlemen's Agreement, which got into full operation by the summer of 1908 and by which, since that date, all such immigration to the United States has been effectively stopped.

Our Government has been administering the agreement with scrupulous care and fidelity. As a result of all this, Japanese males in America (including Hawaii) have actually decreased in number by nearly 20,000 since the summer of 1908. In order that no charge could be launched fairly against us, we have even restricted emigration to Mexico. It is, therefore, hard for us to understand the recent proposal to annul that agreement by a mere act of Congress, without conference with our Government, and, therefore, in a manner unusually arbitrary in the customary dealings between nations. Not unnaturally we regard such proposals as unfair and unfriendly and would consider the enactment of such a law as a decidedly wanton affront. For, if in any respect adjustments in the Gentlemen's Agreement are desired, it will not be difficult to secure them by friendly conference.

In order that there shall be no possible apprehension in America in regard to the nature of our ideas and desires, let me assure all Americans that we have no thought of asking for our labor people any privileges of free immigration to the United States. We distinguish quite clearly between the questions of immigration and those of discriminatory legislation against Japanese already lawfully residing in your country. Your discriminatory legislation seems to us to be contrary to the principles of humanity and of the great Christian faith which so many of you profess. We ask for nothing from the people and Government of the United States, in their dealings with members of our race in your land, except that which is fair and honorable. We seek no special privileges or favors. We ask only, and we ask earnestly, that nothing be done in respect to our people that is essentially humiliating to them, nothing that discriminates between them and other races in the United States merely on the ground of color or difference of facial contour and expression.

It may not be amiss to state in this connection that since the adoption by Japan, in the last half of the last century, of the main principles of Occidental government, we have no discriminatory laws based on differences of race or nationality or religion. This principle we learned from the West, chiefly from your own country. Americans in Japan enjoy the same privileges and rights of land-ownership, naturalization, and everything else that we grant to individuals of any other nation or race.

It may be also well for me to state in the clearest terms that we do not have the least objection to the deportation of individual Japanese who are found to be unlawfully in the United States; nor do we object to the rejection of Japanese travelers who may be lawless or who do not conform to general standards of moral character, literacy, and the like, such as are applied generally to all travelers from every race and people. But I think you will easily understand why we as Japanese cannot but resent proposals and laws that discriminate against Japanese merely as Japanese, regardless of their individual and personal qualifications. . . .

Our Tokio Committee on Japanese-American Relations has been doing all that is possible to promote mutual understanding, appreciation, and good-will; but so long as anti-Japanese legislation and unfair discrimination is constantly reported from your Western States, it is very difficult for us to eradicate the feelings of irritation that exist among a people of sensitive disposition and of natural pride in their own achievement in culture and civilization

It has long seemed to us on the committee that a Joint High Commission appointed by our two governments for the thorough study of all questions tending to complicate and irritate our mutual relations might well be established. It would seem as though such a commission could throw much light on the facts, and give, each side to the other, the information that is evidently needed; and the commission might ultimately find a thoroughgoing solution for the various questions that are now the causes of frequent agitation and more or less of irritation.

Again let me say that in case the present Gentlemen's Agreement is not, in the judgment of the American Government, working satisfactorily, I am confident that our Japanese Government would be more than ready to confer upon the matter with a view to mutually satisfactory adjustments. This would seem to be the gentlemanly way of securing the desired changes, rather than by ex parte legislation. The recent Washington Conference has taught us how to settle difficult international questions.

I am venturing to write thus frankly because of my earnest desire to promote the mutual friendship and good-will of our two countries and to place our relations on such a basis of mutual consideration and appreciation that all difficulties may be effectively and completely removed.

Tokio EIICHI SHIBUSAWA

The statement of the Japanese-American Relations Committee, mentioned by Viscount Shibusawa in his open letter, follows:

The Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament constituted a happy turning-point in the relations of Japan and America. Dark clouds were rolled away from our common horizon and a great load of anxiety was removed from our hearts. A new era of mutual good-will and confidence has begun which we trust may ever remain unbroken.

There is, however, one remaining matter that threatens our future friendship, the matter, namely, of the treatment of Japanese residents in the United States. The early and mutually satisfactory solution of this question is an urgent necessity. The Tokio Committee on Japanese-American Relations, availing itself of the friendly attitude now existing as a result of the Washington Conference, ventures to make the following statement and to suggest a definite plan looking to a fundamental solution.

When the news reached Japan in the summer of 1921 that President Harding had invited the Powers to send delegates to a Conference on the Limitation of Armament and Far Eastern Questions, some of our people misconstrued the intention of the American Government; but the majority took an entirely different view of the President's note and insisted that Japan should heartily welcome the invitation as an opportunity in which she could express herself frankly and openly, because America, whose national ideal is justice and humanity, must have conceived her proposed plan on no other ground but her ardent desire for promoting the permanent peace of the world. The Japanese-American Relations Committee unequivocally advocated this view.

We were rejoiced when the Japanese Government accepted the invitation from America. The Japanese Delegation at Washington consistently carried out the government policy of hearty cooperation with the United States in its epoch-making program, with the outcome already referred to. The Japanese public was highly pleased with the glad tidings of the restoration of the happy relations that had for decades been maintained between the two countries.

The Japanese attitude toward the Washington Conference was expressed through the acts of her delegation and proved to be fair and square. To mention a few instances of her readiness to cooperate with other Powers in the interest of world peace, attention may be called to her agreement to abolish the time-honored Anglo-Japanese Alliance. She likewise agreed to the return of Kiaochow to China, in harmony with her repeated statements before, during, and after the Paris Peace Conference. She consented to do away with her post-office system in China, although it meant to her great inconvenience. She had withdrawn her garrison from Hankow, notwithstanding her knowledge of the unrest and disorder in that country. She has also withdrawn her troops from Siberia, although the Siberian situation was far from safe. And she conceded to America much more than any other Power in dealing with the mandatory right over the island of Yap and with the disposition of its cable lines.

In addition to so great and numerous manifestations of her policy of fair and friendly relations, Japan whole-heartedly agreed to the decisions of the Conference concerning the future ratio of naval armament and the limitation of the defense measures of the Pacific islands, and has been resolutely and faithfully carrying them out, in spite of the opposition of certain groups which hold that those decisions were derogatory to Japan's national dignity. But here again the great majority of our countrymen unwaveringly held to the view that it was appropriate for Japan to make these sacrifices for the sake of friendship with America and the welfare of humanity.

The people of Japan, having thus done their very best for conciliation, naturally entertained the thought that America would appreciatively reciprocate the course pursued by them and, waking to the unfairness of discriminatory treatment of Japanese immigrants lawfully residing in America, would solve the question in a fair and friendly fashion.

So far as the number of Japanese in America is concerned, it is small, only about 115,000, of whom some 30,000 are American-born children, who are therefore American citizens. But the nature of the treatment to which they are being increasingly subjected is so grave that it may endanger our international relations and welfare. Originally our immigrants went to America in response to the invitation of American capitalists when the Chinese exclusion law drove the Chinese laborers from the West coast of America, thereby causing shortage of labor. Those immigrants diligently applied themselves to agriculture and other forms of hard labor, to the great advantage of those Western States and greatly increasing their agricultural products.

But in spite of their industry, fidelity, and law-abiding character, the Japanese immigrants in those States have been deprived of the right of owning and leasing land and it has been made as difficult as possible for them to get married. It is also planned to close up the Japanese-language schools. Not only does the present Federal law refuse, on the mere ground of race, the right of naturalization to fully qualified Japanese, but certain groups are even proposing by the unilateral act of Congress to abrogate the Gentlemen's Agreement and also to deprive American-born Japanese of their constitutional birthright of being American citizens.

Those conditions, activities, and proposals deprive Japanese, who have lawfully entered and have long been residing in the United States, of the ordinary civil rights and economic opportunities freely granted to aliens from many other lands. They are in themselves real hardships and are naturally regarded as invidious and unjust, and as not in keeping with the general character of American ideals and practice. And they are also inevitably regarded as racially humiliating, and in marked conflict with the principles of international comity and good-will expressed in all our treaties and upon which alone can right international relations be maintained for the decades and centuries ahead.

The Japanese-American Relations Committee of Tokio has been studying the situation for several years and is well aware of the many diverse views and arguments that have been urged in connection with this matter. The foregoing very brief statements are not regarded as a full and adequate discussion of the whole question; they present merely certain aspects that are deeply felt by our people. In its efforts to get at all the facts, this committee has repeatedly conferred with the Japanese-Relations Committee of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce and has exchanged views with other leaders of both countries. As a result of these conferences, in view of the highly complex character of the many conflicting interests and diverse factors, economic, racial, and political, and in the light of Washington Conference as disclosing a method for the solution of well-nigh insoluble questions, this committee sug-

It shall be the duty of the commission to examine the whole question with the utmost care and frankly to exchange their views; to investigate the real causes of misunderstanding and discord; to consider methods for the fundamental and permanent solution of the entire question; and to report their findings and specific recommendations to the respective governments, and also to the public of both countries." . . .

Making Friends in the Pacific

According to the Peking bulletin of the Rosta News Agency of August 20 Mr. L. M. Karakhan, Russian Plenipotentiary Envoy to China, has given the following interview to the Russian, Chinese, and Japanese press:

. . . If in Europe, after the defeat of Germany and the humiliation of the German people which we see at present, the danger of a new general battle of European nations is postponed for some time, on the Pacific we see quite a different picture. . . . The attempt at the Washington Conference to limit somewhat the feverish progress of armaments could not of course give any serious results. . . . When we came back to the Pacific we had to watch very carefully these events. We must not be suddenly caught, we must be prepared so that peace and order within our territories may not be disturbed.

Our interests lie not in participating in the solution of the Pacific problems by those methods which are natural for the imperialistic countries, but we must have sufficient force to protect ourselves from entanglement in this struggle.

From this point of view peace and friendship with our closest neighbors, China and Japan, acquire a first-rate importance.

Our representative in the Far East, Mr. Joffe, was intrusted with the task of establishing and regulating relations with China and Japan. He has done a great and difficult work because he was the first to bridge the breach, and to take first steps is always difficult. . . . I can tell you that the suspension of further negotiations between Mr. Joffe and Mr. Kavakami took place only because both sides had sufficiently elucidated their respective attitudes. There appeared certain points on which Japan insisted and which were unacceptable to Russia. Under such conditions it was found expedient to stop further private negotiations which were not binding on either party. The Russian Government believes that the time has come for opening official negotiations, at which each step will be responsible. We are not going to propose them, but we hope that Japan will understand herself what she ought to do. . . . China and ourselves are on one side of the front in international politics. We have just emerged from a difficult struggle against the imperialistic countries which wanted to turn Russia into their colony. China has not yet finished this struggle and is still fighting for her complete liberation. . . . We should like to see China strong and united, because only on this condition can she withstand those who allow themselves to act in her territory as if they were at home. . . .

In my policy I shall be guided by this idea and on this I shall build the friendship between China and the Union which I represent. We have no such questions at issue with China on which it will be impossible to reach an agreement. . . . The reception accorded me by Chinese authorities and the Chinese public testifies that not only the Government but also the people desire to have friendly relations with us, and this gives me force and courage for my difficult work in China. . . . One of the principal questions is that of the Chinese Eastern Railway. I have no doubt that here we shall find a common language. The Chinese Eastern Railway was built by the means and energy of the Russian people. As a commercial enterprise it belongs to the Russian people, but it runs through Chinese territory and plays an enormous economic part in Northern Manchuria. . . . These interests—our rights on the C. E. R. and the sovereign rights of China on the territory through which the railway passes—can be easily solved and settled without the just interests of any party being infringed. . . .

No third party has any right to interfere in the affairs of the railway. I am sure that this question as well as all other Russo-Chinese affairs will be safely settled very soon. . . .

The reception which was accorded me by the Manchurian authorities makes me think that I shall meet an especially strong desire on behalf of Manchuria to settle this affair quickly. From Manchuria I shall go to Peking and only on my arrival there I shall be able to say anything definite regarding the time and form of the Russo-Chinese conference.

Unfortunately some statesmen in Peking do not exhibit such an attitude as I have seen here in Manchuria and such as naturally ought to have resulted from a right understanding of their national interests. But I still hope that in Peking also I shall be able to find a common language which will help me to settle all outstanding questions. . . .

I have said already that we are ready at any moment to open official negotiations with Japan. . . . Of course at the moment we can talk only of a treaty covering not only trade but also juridical relations between both countries. The time for bastard trade agreements has passed forever. Japan understands that since the Dairen Conference through the stages of Chang-chung and Tokio, Japan has gone a long way toward the place where agreement with Russia is no longer an impossibility. I welcome this change, but I do not want to be understood in a sense that I wholly approve the present attitude of Japan. . . .

We can wait until other states understand the necessity of establishing normal relations with Russia. We have passed already through a difficult time and now we have entered into a period of gradual reconstruction of our industry and healing of our wounds. Even without contact with the world outside we are improving our economic situation. Normal relations with other countries would certainly accelerate that process, but they cannot have any other influence. Therefore, we are not going to pay a special price for them.

THE Coolidge Administration seems to be faring no better when it comes to the approval of the voters than did that of Mr. Harding. In the first Congressional election under the new President a Democrat, Sam B. Hill, has been sent to the House from the Fifth District of Washington, a bailiwick that in 1920 elected a Republican by a majority of 10,000 and in 1922 selected a member of the same party by 2,000. Nor was Charles E. Myers, Mr. Hill's opponent, any Old Guardsman; he was a Roosevelt Republican with a fairly progressive record. But he ran on the Harding-Coolidge policies, and that killed him. On the other hand, discontent rather than Democracy elected Mr. Hill. His platform contained an economically absurd and practically impossible declaration in favor of a government-fixed price of $1.75 a bushel for wheat, which probably gave him support from the group which two years previously cast 3,000 votes for a Farmer-Labor candidate. Mr. Hill will adhere to the farm bloc in Congress, but will he contribute sanity or wisdom to its political counsels?

PIRACY is not dead. Five armed men boarded a ship in the East River, off Brooklyn, the other day, gagged the crew, and made off with $11,000 worth of platinum; and Italy is pirating on a larger scale. She has evacuated Corfu—pirates seldom care to hold on to the ships they seize or the lands they terrorize; but she has evacuated at a cost of 50,000,000 liras and her own honor. The world will not soon forget that because unidentified brigands killed an Italian mission on Greek territory Italy bombarded an almost undefended port, killing women and children, and held it for ransom. Nor will it soon forget that the League of Nations pusillanimously permitted Italy to override it and that the Western Powers did no more than save their faces. First they persuaded Greece to deposit in a Swiss bank the sum Italy demanded, to be paid to Italy only if it were proved that Greece had not done her best to capture the assassins; then, without waiting for such proof, they yielded to Mussolini's threat and delivered the swag—a fifth of which he has since returned for the relief of the orphans he bombarded. Some say that the League, or the Council of Ambassadors, prevented European war—but war between Italy and Greece was about as likely as war between Haiti and the United States; and Italy left Corfu not because of the League, but because of the strategic interests of France and Britain in the Mediterranean.

THE Latin American republics continue to poke their heads into the noose of Wall Street control. The latest announcement is that Salvador has negotiated with a New York Stock Exchange house for $6,000,000 for twenty-five years at 8 per cent. The conditions are not yet announced, in advance of which one can only surmise what measure of political control Salvador is ceding. At the same time the Minister from Nicaragua leaves Washington to return home, it is said, for a conference with his Government in regard to an American loan, while agents of President Orellana of Guatemala are reported to be in this country to ascertain the possibilities of a bond issue, the last proposal of that nature having been rejected by the Guatemalan Congress after everything seemed to have been sewed up for pushing it through. Well, every man and doubtless every nation has a right to choose its own kind of bondage. Only, we would feel better about these Latin American loans if it were not for evidence that a few self-constituted and self-seeking "leaders," natives of those countries working hand in glove with our own citizens, generally manage to choose the bondage which thousands of simple-minded "followers" have thenceforward to endure.

THE official inquiry into the disaster on the California coast in which twenty-three sailors were drowned and seven destroyers totally wrecked has done nothing to increase public confidence in the personnel of the Navy. The officers on trial stuck to one story and by one another with a tenacity characteristic of the service, denying the presence of liquor or any other breach of discipline. The commander of the squadron, Captain Watson, magnanimously took upon himself all blame for the tragedy, saying that in disregarding the position of the destroyers as given by the radio compass from Point Arguello and in assuming the correctness of his bearings as indicated by dead reckoning he had acted upon his best judgment developed after many years of sea service. The radio compass is not yet a wholly proved device and Captain Watson may have been justified in suspecting it (although in fact it turned out to have been right), but what excuse is there for other, and greater, negligence? How explain the fact that no soundings were taken, although this is admittedly the navigator's best check on his position when near shore? And, still worse, what possible palliation is there for dashing through a fog at twenty miles an hour, a speed which would have been foolhardy and illegal under the international code even if the squadron had been hundreds of miles from a rockbound coast?

THE strike of the pressmen of the New York City dailies is over, and a public dazed and disturbed by abbreviated newspapers has gone back to the oblivion of the fireside story, the slapstick comics, and Aunt Jenny's beauty hints while riding back and forth to work. The joint pressure of the publishers and the international union was too much for the New York local. It lost its fight and its charter, although most of the individual members have regained their jobs upon considerably improved conditions. As soon as they abandoned the pretense of a "combined" newspaper and began to increase their size the various dailies resumed their editorial pages, whereupon the New York Times proceeded to lecture the irreverent critics—The Nation was one—who had suggested that in this omission the publishers had tacitly recognized and dropped out the least important of their features. No, said the Times, the reason for the omission was that as "combined" newspapers they could not have an editorial policy. This, as Mr. Dooley would say, is interesting if true. But how true is it? The fact is that all the newspapers maintained their characteristic style of heads and make-up and did their best to retain their individual features. Even a casual reader could tell them apart at a glance, and if he had any doubt it was dissipated by such explanatory lines as "Copyright, 1923, by the New York Times Company."

A PARTICULARLY disgraceful case of judicial persecution neared its end the other day when all but two of the series of indictments brought against members of the Kuzbas Organization Committee in New York City were dismissed. This committee sponsored in the United States the effort at industrial pioneering with whose history readers of The Nation are familiar. A group of disgruntled colonists who resented the fact that they found themselves privates instead of generals in Siberia returned to this country last spring and discovered that newspapers and propaganda groups such as the National Civic Federation were ready to record them as heroes in return for elaboration of their personal woes into a general condemnation of the soviet system. Naturally their woes grew apace, and all the members of the Kuzbas committee were soon indicted for larceny—the colonists complained that they had accepted money on false pretenses. The newspapers made it a front-page story; the defendants were held in $7,500 bail each, an absurdly high figure. The efforts of the defense attorneys to force a trial for the remaining two indictments will doubtless be vain. The damage has been done; the effect has been gained.

WHEN the warden of one of the world's greatest prisons declares his opposition to capital punishment it is clearly not the opinion of a theorist but the view of what we like to call a "practical" man. Hence we are glad to see Lewis E. Lawes of Sing Sing taking a stand against this survival of barbarism, because his words may appeal to persons who attach no weight to similar declarations from other quarters. Mr. Lawes, speaking from a wide experience with criminals and from a knowledge of conditions in those of our States which do not as well as those which do have the death penalty, has come to the conclusion that it is no deterrent to crime. He goes on to say that if there is any merit in capital punishment as a deterrent, then we ought to make executions public spectacles—as in earlier days—and so reap the widest benefit possible. The argument is logical, but of course we shall not act upon it. The question is how soon we are going to adopt the only logical alternative and abolish the death penalty throughout the Union.

WHEN death has come into the house it is well to forget old scores and put aside suspicion of people who seek to help you. Japan in her time of tragedy and terror was offered the help and the pity of the whole world, and accepted that of everyone but her neighbor, Russia. On September 15 the Russian ship Lenin sailed into the harbor at Yokohama carrying sixty-nine doctors and nurses and a load of medical supplies for the relief of Japanese workers; the authorities refused to allow it to dock. The Japanese Embassy at Washington explained that "the assistance brought was intended for laborers only" and that "the relief mission looked upon the disaster as a providential opportunity for furthering the revolutionary movement." Thus, on the basis of a suspicion of motives that could not possibly be proved, and without even attempting to impose conditions which would eliminate danger of discrimination or propaganda, the Japanese Government refused assistance that might have saved some thousands of her people. What if it was limited to workers? There were enough lives to be saved so that a little extra aid for the poorest and most helpless should hardly have been scorned. And what if propaganda were to be distributed with the medicine and the care? Did the Japanese Government prefer to have its workers dead rather than let them read a communist tract?

SINCE citizenship in the United States may be extended only to "free white persons" and "aliens of African nativity" and "persons of African descent" the Supreme Court probably could not do otherwise than refuse naturalization to a high-caste Hindu of Indian blood. Even in India this decision was received with sorrow but with little protest. It is plain that according to the common meaning of the wholly unscientific term "white person," a native East Indian must be ruled out. It is equally plain that he cannot qualify as a Negro. Nor would it be reasonable or just to grant citizenship to Indians while denying it to Japanese, Chinese, Siamese, Koreans, and other Orientals with skin darker than our own. Protests must be directed against a law which shuts out from the fellowship of Americans all persons, however desirable, who happen to be neither white nor—ironical exception!—black.

PROTESTS should also be directed against the probable effects of a decision like this. The Government has already prepared petitions asking for the cancelation of naturalization papers of Indians who came to the United States and became citizens years before the Naturalization Act became law. The constitutionality of such proceedings will certainly have to be tested in the courts; it seems to us unthinkable that the law can be used retroactively to disfranchise persons who met the existing citizenship requirements and were naturalized in good faith according to the law as it then stood. Even more serious is the possibility of applying the California Anti-Alien Land Law to Indians owning property in that State and dispossessing them on the basis of their ineligibility for citizenship. The United States has protested loudly enough against the enactment of retroactive confiscatory legislation against foreigners—when we happened to be the foreigners. Will we guard with equal fidelity the property rights of foreigners on our own shores?

NOT many town councils get a chance to figure in the religious history of mankind, but the Bombay Municipal Corporation may now claim that distinction. According to the Indian newspapers the Bombay Municipal Corporation "after a three days' heated debate" has squelched the Parsee "reformers" who sought to substitute cremation for the historic Parsee method—that of leaving the dead to be consumed by vultures in their Towers of Silence. The Bombay papers are curiously reticent about the theological arguments, pro and con, but state the issue clearly enough. The "reformers" who had organized the Parsee Cremation Society asked for a plot of municipal ground on Love Grove Road on which to erect "a crematorium and fire temple for the use of such Parsees as favor this method of disposal of the dead." Against this suggestion the majority threw itself with passion; crowds attended the debates in the corporation and the chairman "had the greatest difficulty in preserving order." Finally, when the corporation rejected the plea of the "reformers" the majority "threw umbrellas and hats in the air" and "carried their champion from the hall on their shoulders." It sounds very much like stories which we have heard from some Christian countries.

MR. STANLEY ROWLAND, writing in the Nineteenth Century, complains that London has become a very inferno of noise; besides the ordinary door-slamming, shoe-squeaking, and newspaper rattling that infest any household, Mr. Rowland, evidently a sensitive man, hates jazz and motor horns and the clump of horses' feet on pavements. To the New Yorker, whose nerves are no longer able to jump at anything, attuned as they are to five-ton trucks tearing over cobblestones at three o'clock in the morning, this complaint comes as something of a surprise. London has always seemed to him a soothing and gentle spot—as soothing and gentle, say, as White Plains or New Rochelle. And yet, alas, White Plains, that placid hamlet, is no longer gentle; for several years it has been the stopover for thousands of grackles on their way South. They roost on the trees and make a ridgepole along the top of the City Hall; and being vigorous birds that do not know fatigue, they emit and keep on emitting a noise somewhat like that generated when heavy brown paper is torn in two. In vain the Mayor and the nerve-racked citizens have fired rockets and sent up flares; the birds refuse to be dislodged or quieted. The latest remedy suggested is to import hoot owls to scare them away. This, of course, is ample proof that while the White Plainers have heard grackles cackle they have never been favored with a hoot owl's hoot. Any New Yorker who has would smile and drop to sleep, soothed by the thought that he had only a truck to listen to.

ONE discovers that willows grow to a man's height and that vegetables can be grown in Greenland with something of the same shock with which one learns that most of the Sahara is high, mountainous country. Most of us will be even more surprised on learning, from the fascinating story told in the American Scandinavian Review, that Greenland has ruins of eleventh-century churches, and that a Danish commission two years ago dug out of the frozen soil there fifteenth-century costumes very like the Paris and Florentine fashions of the period. No European museum, Poul Nörlund tells us, possesses a single secular costume dating from the Middle Ages; the polar climate of Greenland saved these garments from decomposition. There was not wood enough in Greenland for coffins; so the Norse colonists wrapped their dead in their old clothes, laid carved wood or walrus-tusk crosses upon their breasts, and lowered them into the cold ground. Men and women both wore skirted dresses in those days, but the men's were shorter and the women's fuller—some four yards full at the feet.

IT was Eric the Red, father of that Leif Ericson who discovered "Vinland" somewhere in present-day Canada or New England nearly half a millennium before Columbus sighted American soil, who first settled Greenland, in 986. Twenty-five ships set sail with him from Iceland—long Viking ships, open amidships to the sky, and loaded down with cattle and grainsacks as well as humans—but only fourteen of them ever reached Greenland. For five hundred years—a longer period than that between Columbus's discovery and our own day—Norsemen lived in Greenland. During most of that time Greenland had its own Christian bishop and a republican form of government. At one time 5,000 Norsemen lived there. But the Greenland trade became a monopoly of the King of Norway, and ships sailed thither more and more rarely. The last recorded voyage was in 1410. For perhaps a century more the Norse Greenlanders lived on, staring their eyes out looking for the ship that never came—they had no wood to build their own—and, as the skeletons in their graveyards show, becoming physically degenerate by intermarriage and undernourishment, stunted and hunchbacked. A Norwegian missionary who searched for them in 1721 found only small brown Kayak men in possession of the land. The Norse houses were already in ruins. A whole civilization had died—yet today we are thrilled by the death of one man on Wrangel Island, no further north than these Norsemen penetrated. Our ships are better and our knowledge greater; but where are the men today to match those Norsemen who sailed without compass on an uncharted sea?

The Death of a Nation

POINCARE has his way; Germania delenda est. Reparations are not being paid; reconstruction is delayed; anger and hatred, the seeds of future war, are scattered broadcast. But Germany is being destroyed.

Bavaria already stands apart from Northern Germany, defying federal legislation, obeying a monarchist dictator who only waits the moment to proclaim Prince Rupprecht king. A Saxon minister has announced that when that proclamation comes Saxony will proclaim the dictatorship of the proletariat, and invite neighboring states to join her. East Prussia is already separated from the mass of Germany by the Polish corridor, "made in France." Monarchists are in revolt in Küstrin in the heart of old Prussia. And in the Rhineland the French, allied with starvation, are goading the inhabitants into establishing an "independent Rhineland Republic," which would have French currency and be as little independent as were the states created by Napoleon, the master-wrecker of Europe, whose dreams still dominate French policy. The German Reich, which withstood four years of war against the world, is crumbling in the prolonged battle of the peace.

The editor of The Nation, telegraphing from Geneva, reports almost unmitigated gloom at the capital of the League of Nations. Americans may be surprised, because the apostles of American participation in the League have filled our newspapers with their unquenchable faith in the messianic destiny of that organization. But to those who read the news and ponder upon it without such a superrational mysticism to comfort them, the gloom at Geneva is only too well justified, and the days which have elapsed since Mr. Villard filed his message must only have deepened it. While the League has been prating principles the ugly cancer in the heart of Europe, which the League has refused to face, has been spreading its poison. The Franco-German melee gives the keynote to all Europe. What France can do untrammeled by the League Italy, Poland, Lithuania also have done, and Hungary, Serbia, Rumania feel they may do. And as a sample of what France is doing, reflect upon a paragraph in a dispatch to the generally Gallophile London Times.

The French provided free trains for the 15,000 Separatists who met at Düsseldorf on the Rhine on that Red Sunday which closed the month of September. They had financed this Separatist movement throughout; its chief, Dr. Dorten, was in Paris conferring with the French Government when the bloodshed occurred. Another Separatist leader, Josef Matthes, had just proclaimed that the Separatists wanted only peace and tranquillity when shots were fired, no one knew whence. Pandemonium ensued, and the German police advanced, firing, and broke up the Separatist demonstration—which German officials had prohibited and the French encouraged. After the German police had dispersed the crowd French cavalry and tanks arrived upon the scene. This is what followed, as recounted by the correspondent of the Times:

> Twenty French cavalrymen, led by a dozen men of the Rheinwehr [the Separatist unofficial police organization], galloped up to a green [German] policeman on duty close to the hotel, surrounding and disarming him. When this was done the Separatists turned on the disarmed man and beat him to death with leaden pipes. The policeman covered his face with his hands and sank to the ground. A score or more blows were rained on him during the half-minute it took to kill him. The French remained impassive, and when it was over the Separatists shook hands with them.
> A few yards away the hideous scene was reenacted, although this time the green policeman appeared not to be killed outright. Both bodies were left where they were. Separatists who tried to repeat these murders on another already wounded German policeman with a different group of French cavalry were foiled. . . .

It is not merely that the German state is being broken into pieces; in that process the soul of a great nation is being corrupted and a poison as deadly as any poison gas which Wellsian romancers can conceive is being injected into Europe. No spiritual regeneration is issuing out of this decay of Germany. Visitors to that miserable country in 1919 recall that out of the ashes of military defeat a new and nobler Germany seemed to be rising, a Germany that hated war and faced toward the future rather than the past. All that is changed. The new Germany found no new Entente to welcome it. It met only suspicion and rebuke. The Entente which had so bitterly denounced German militarism adopted its worst features. The League of Nations which was to have developed a new world following the war turned out to be an instrument of Entente policy, excluding the Central Powers and Russia. The new spirit in Germany, meeting only rebuff abroad, lost force at home. Cynicism replaced hope; Poincaré has reconvinced those who had abandoned faith in brute force.

So Germany is today a kind of madhouse of embittered men and women, where monarchist fights republican, and both fight the Communist, and all are only too ready to turn their miscellaneous weapons upon the invader. The final collapse of the magnificent campaign of passive resistance with which a disciplined disarmed people met the overwhelming armed force of the French has seemingly brought with it a sort of collapse in general morale. When men despair, and see no escape from the terrific burden of daily life, they turn upon each other in irrational anger, and put their faith in myths. Dictatorships feed upon such hopelessness and such myths, and we may expect to see petty little dictatorships springing up on various programs in various parts of Germany. The myth of French stability is one of these deceptive mirages, which may for a time lead some of the discouraged population of the Rhineland, appalled at the careening of the German mark, to espouse the Separatist cause which in their hearts they despise.

Some readers of this paper are continually writing its editors begging that they be more optimistic. They are a little like Mr. Bryan, who denies the principle of evolution because, as he puts it, he prefers not to believe it. These people demand optimism because they prefer optimism. So do we. But we believe in facing facts, and the fact is that through these post-war years Europe has been steadily sinking. Only in much-despised Soviet Russia is there reason to believe that things are definitely on the up-grade.

Poincaré can kill the German republic. He can destroy German unity. He can starve Germans. In that sense we may witness the death of Germany. In a larger sense he can kill only his own nation. France won the hearts of the world when she stood in mourning on the Marne. The France we loved then is dead; Poincaré has killed it.

Anarchy in Oklahoma

READERS who have felt that The Nation has been too harsh with Governor Walton of Oklahoma will probably find justification for its position in more recent events. No one is more opposed to the lawless methods of the Ku Klux Klan than The Nation, nor is it without admiration for the courage, the directness, and the democratic instincts of Governor Walton. But although his instincts may be democratic, his methods are the reverse of that, and at this writing seem to be leading the State of Oklahoma further and further into the civic anarchy which is the inevitable consequence of trying to meet one kind of lawlessness with another.

Governor Walton initiated military rule not because the existence of the State government was threatened by an extraordinary emergency—about the only justification for such a proceeding—but because civil government was not working properly in certain regions on account of Klan influence. In other words, the Governor suppressed civil government as a method of civil reform. But reform did not follow—indeed, could not do so as long as military rule prevailed. And the Governor found that although it was not hard to begin martial law it became increasingly difficult to end it. His action divided Oklahoma more than ever into two camps, more concerned with smashing each other than with preserving the State. It became, as the Governor's Executive Counselor described it in The Nation last week, a case of "dog eat dog." From a comparatively mild dictatorship Governor Walton was driven, in order to save himself from impeachment, into declaring that a referendum, which the State Supreme Court had just decided had been legally called, should not take place.

"This is my election," the Governor is quoted as saying. "I called it and I certainly have the right to postpone it." Wholly untrue! It is not the Governor's election but that of the State of Oklahoma. His calling it gives him no right of subsequent recall any more than he could veto a bill of the legislature after once approving it. The Governor's assumption of a dictatorship simply forced him from one extreme to another in order to maintain himself. From an original professed desire to restore civil government in Tulsa the Governor was led to ordering the mobilization of 100,000 persons and talking seriously of bloodshed.

What, some will be asking, should Governor Walton have done in the face of the outrages of the Klan in his State? It was reported to him, probably correctly, that the prosecuting officers of a certain county were all Klansmen and that they refused to proceed against individuals who were organizing and conducting floggings. Not a happy situation, to be sure. But the derelict officers were put there by the votes of their fellow-citizens. If a majority of the voters wanted that kind of thing, it was their affair. If they had simply blundered into it through carelessness—which is more likely—they deserved to fry in their own fat until they could make a change. What about protecting the minority, someone asks? Ah, but minorities are never protected except through the operation of law or self-restraint. Consideration for them is the finest flower of peaceful and disciplined democracy—a bloom that is first to perish in any rule of sheer force. To preserve civil process, however imperfect, is generally more important than to remedy abuses through setting it aside.

The Deadly Grade Crossing

AN express train from a popular inland resort to New York is speeding through a region where Nature spreads before the eyes of the passengers one of her finest panoramas of river, mountain, and woodland scenery. Suddenly there is an abrupt jar, almost violent enough to throw down anyone who happens to be on his feet. It is followed at a brief interval by another shock, and the train is at a standstill. The call sounds through the cars: "Is there a doctor on board?" But the emergency which prompted the summons is already over. In the middle of the highway a few yards distant lies a twisted mass of metal, from which the train crew extricate the lifeless bodies of a man and a woman who only a few moments ago were in buoyant health and vigor. The corpses are quickly covered by a sheet, from beneath which trickle small streams of blood. The blinds of the dining-car are lowered lest the sight provoke nausea among passengers just sitting down to their midday meal.

From conductors and porters one soon picks up the outline of the story. The road by which the automobile was traveling runs for a considerable distance almost parallel to the railway track, and the train must have been clearly visible to its occupants. But some demon of foolhardiness must have inspired its driver with the ambition of challenging the express to a racing contest. With his own speedometer registering sixty miles an hour might he not hope to reach the crossing ahead of the locomotive? Indeed, he does reach it first, and he almost clears the danger-point —almost, but not quite. The engine strikes the rear wheel of the automobile and hurls the whole machine fifty feet along the highway.

The scene just described is of such poignant tragedy as to haunt even the waking thoughts of the train passengers for many days afterward. The memory of that ghastly heap in the road comes back to them unbidden again and again. But an incident of this kind is so much a commonplace of railway travel nowadays that it has not even a news value. The next morning it is recorded in the press of the district, but outside that area it finds no mention at all. It lacks that attribute of the exceptional which attracts the attention of the journalistic newsgatherer. It happens today in New Hampshire. It will happen tomorrow in New Jersey and the day after in Illinois and so on through the calendar. For every day in the year, on an average, three persons are killed and twelve injured at grade crossings in the United States.

De mortuis—yes, but only the plainest language befits such a mad freak if it is to serve as a warning to the living. There may be rare occasions when a motorist is justified in taking great risks, but it is inconceivable that on a country road with a grade crossing just ahead and a train in actual sight there can be any adequate reason for running an automobile at the speed of a fast express. The line is very thin that separates such conduct from suicide. It might easily bring with it manslaughter also. And all for the satisfaction of a depraved sporting instinct and the saving of a few seconds on a holiday tour through a region so delightful that most travelers would wish to prolong rather than abbreviate their savoring of its charm!

But granted the reasonable obligation to stop, look, and listen when approaching a grade crossing, a heavy responsibility lies upon the railroad companies for permitting the existence of so many points of danger. In England one seldom hears of a grade-crossing accident. The annual toll in the British Isles from this cause is forty killed and sixteen injured, as against 1,259 killed and 4,493 injured in the United States. The difference is not to be explained by our greater railway mileage. The British railways carry over their shorter tracks half as many passengers again as the American, which must mean that the number of their train journeys is much greater in proportion to the length of tracks. The reason of so striking a contrast is obvious to any American visitor on his first railway or automobile journey in England. He will notice everywhere how the building of bridges has almost eliminated the grade crossing, and how, even where it is allowed to exist, the precaution is taken of providing a gate or bar operated by a neighboring signalman. In the United States, on the other hand, according to an estimate by the American Railway Association, there are no less than 250,000 grade crossings—virtually one for every mile of track. Our railways, moreover, afford in many places the spectacle of trains running through the streets of a city without the slightest fence to separate them from the ordinary traffic. When he was over here some years ago Arnold Bennett was amazed to see trains making their way in this fashion along the thoroughfares of Syracuse. That city, with a population of over 170,000, can still offer its foreign visitors a spectacle which would seem incredible in Europe, even if presented on a movie film.

Cap'n Josh Slocum

ALAIN J. GERBAULT, the Frenchman who recently reached New York after 142 days spent in crossing the Atlantic Ocean alone in a thirty-foot sail-boat, hopes soon to start on a voyage by himself around the world, which he expects will take him three years. A great adventure! Indeed, yes—but not a new one. Probably he may have heard of (and others will recall) Captain Joshua Slocum, who returned from such a voyage twenty-five years ago. Captain Slocum set out from Boston on April 24, 1895, and after sailing 46,000 miles, in the course of which he circumnavigated the globe, this doughty skipper dropped anchor in the harbor of Newport, Rhode Island, on June 27, 1898.

Captain Slocum's boat, the Spray, was about the same size as that of Mr. Gerbault. The Spray was a bit more than thirty-six feet over all, and twelve tons gross. Mr. Gerbault's vessel was thirty feet in length and measured about ten tons. There was no similarity in build, however, between the craft. The French boat was laid down on yachting and racing lines, and much of the trouble that her skipper had in his voyage across the Atlantic was perhaps due to this consideration. The Spray was a fishing boat model and an admirable rough-water sailer.

Captain Slocum has told the story of her building and her voyage in his book "Sailing Alone Around the World." And a fine sailor-like yarn it is!

By origin Captain Josh was a Nova Scotian, coming of a long line of seafaring forebears, although by some accident his father happened to have turned farmer. The boy had his choice between the sea and the rockbound farm on which he grew up. Perhaps there wasn't much choice. Anyhow young Slocum early decided not to become a Nova Scotian farmer. Eventually Captain Josh was naturalized as a Yankee and became a skipper in the old-time American sailing fleet. In the eighties he skipped the full-rigged ship Northern Light, but finally was the victim of a shipwreck on the coast of Brazil, after which—with the demand for sailing-ship skippers on the wane—he found himself back in New England "on the beach." Somebody offered him an old sloop as a joke. He took the gift seriously, and after spending thirteen months of his labor and $553.62 in virtually rebuilding the craft, he was ready to start out—where? As there seemed to be no other trip especially worth taking, he decided on a single-handed journey around the world.

Perhaps the thing from which ordinary people would shrink most in a voyage like that of Mr. Gerbault or Captain Slocum would be the loneliness. This does not so much concern a born sailor. The sea is a lonely place in the best of circumstances, and nobody can qualify as a true lover of it who does not love loneliness too. Yet it can be overdone. Captain Slocum confesses to an unpleasant degree of loneliness during the first few days of his voyage, but after that it disappeared, not to reappear. The first leg of his course was to Gibraltar, by way of the Azores. Thence he headed for Brazil, following the coast down to the Strait of Magellan. When Captain Josh set out on his voyage the Spray was sloop-rigged, as was the craft in which Mr. Gerbault crossed the Atlantic. After some experience, however, Captain Slocum rigged the Spray as a yawl, thus making it easier—as most sailors would testify—for one man to handle. Also Captain Josh found the Spray so well behaved that he could set the course, lash the wheel, and in ordinary circumstances his good ship would jog along by herself with little or no attention from him. This relieved the skipper of a vast amount of tedium at the wheel, allowed him to put in hours reading, and permitted him even to roll over in his bunk and go to sleep at night while the Spray forged on.

Captain Josh went through the Strait of Magellan, spent months in the South Seas, visited Australia, traversed the Indian Ocean, rounded what sailors call "the Cape of Storms" or just "the Cape" (Good Hope), laid his course across the South Atlantic for Brazil, and then sailed up through the West Indies and home. Of course he met many dangers, surmounted many difficulties. Time and again he was close to shipwreck and death, but his account shows that he was not only cool-headed and resourceful but a capital practical seaman also. And those qualities pulled him through. His own comment on himself and his boat at the end of the voyage runs thus:

> Was the crew well? Was I not? I had profited in many ways by the voyage. I had even gained flesh, and actually weighed a pound more than when I sailed from Boston. As for aging, why, the dial of my life was turned back till my friends all said: "Slocum is young again." And so I was, at least ten years younger than the day I felled the first tree for the construction of the Spray.
> My ship was also in better condition than when she sailed from Boston on her long voyage. She was still as sound as a nut and as tight as the best ship afloat. She did not leak a drop—not one drop! The pump, which had been little used before reaching Australia, had not been rigged since then at all.

But for all that, Gentle Reader, do not imagine that such an adventure is too easy or too safe. Captain Slocum came back—yes, that time. Some years later he set out on another such voyage, and has never been heard from since.

The Only Hope

(Special Radiogram to The Nation)

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Geneva, September 30

UNDER the darkest skies Europe has seen since 1914 the fourth League Assembly comes to an end. The facts that the trouble between the Serbs and Italians is blowing over, that a Greco-Italian war has been averted, that the Ruhr resistance is at an end do not affect the intense depression among the Assembly delegates. "Over all of us," said one of the ablest and most influential Englishmen, speaking today, "hangs the shadow of the French army and the fact that their airplanes outnumber the British four or five to one. We have but substituted one militarism for another." And he agreed with one listener that the French today are more dangerous than was the old Germany because they are abler, more subtle, and less stupid.

There lies the stumbling-block to European progress and the greatest danger to the League itself. Throughout this session the French have tried to block every forward movement, have done their best to end the Temporary Mixed Commission on Disarmament, have opposed the effort to refer really important points to the World Court, have stood in the way of every hopeful suggestion.

Not over reparations only are the English and the French utterly opposed. Here they disagree at every turn. It is perfectly plain that the French do not wish the League to gain prestige though they are willing to use it for their own purposes. Since the Ruhr collapse all talk about French security, never in my opinion sincere, has stopped, and the French strength has been thrown into the effort to block disarmament.

When one recalls the historic opposition of these two nations and beholds the present situation one can only tremble for the future. England and France now lock horns at every point. Today wherever one looks the gravest dangers confront one. France is rejoicing over her great victory over the completely abased Germans, but all advices here foretell catastrophic events in Germany. Even French dispatches admit that Paris is anxiously watching, and is welcoming the Bavarian dictatorship and the state of siege there. The Communists are delighted over the German prospect. Most economists here do not believe that the French will have an easy task to reorganize and operate the Ruhr. They feel that Germany is too far gone to fail to collapse. This may be postponed. Watched-for revolutions rarely boil on time, but the fact is that the situation is so grave that the soberest men shake their heads in despair. Nation readers would be amazed if I could tell the names of those who have said to me that the situation is absolutely hopeless.

Fear of Mussolini is general. He is called a crazy man here—also a great man. No one can tell where he will erupt next, now that the Council of Ambassadors has given him the Greek liras so unreasonably. This is called downright robbery here; Englishmen are hanging their heads because the British Ambassador voted for this screaming injustice. Indeed, the way the League has been duped in this matter by the Council of Ambassadors is one of the hardest blows it has received. Mussolini can now claim that he has the complete approval of the Great Powers for his every act, including the Corfu murders. Liberals here utterly deplore the fact that two great nations have now upheld the principle that they can grab where they please and compel payments and submission. France and Italy, both members of the League, have thus deliberately violated the very spirit of the Covenant. The principle that force is supreme, charged to the Germans, is now triumphant again. It is a victory for the brute side of human nature. Then, too, France may have made the dangerous discovery that whole masses of industrial populations, whole peoples can be starved into slavery and submission—which is a terrible lesson to teach imperialists and big industrialists the world over.

Meanwhile, the League trembles in the balance. Five years after the war to safeguard democracy Europe rushes to economic disaster. One dictatorship follows another—Russia, Italy, Spain, Bavaria. Probably soon the whole of Germany will be subject to a dictator, but observers here feel that even so he could not hold himself in power long and that the Allies may be compelled to undertake the ruinous task of governing more portions of Germany than the Ruhr.

It is not time to despair yet. Information from a London source hitherto reliable reaches me that Mr. Baldwin is considering a new offer of startling importance, to buy off the French and get them out of the Ruhr and Germany altogether by assuming the position of guarantor of Germany at Poincaré's terms—fifty billion gold marks. If this should be accepted it would save Germany, give France her pieces of silver, and perhaps rescue Europe at a tremendous sacrifice to England. There is no other possibility in sight of immediate rescue, no other way quickly to restore England's lost prestige and rehabilitate her shattered influence since Mr. Baldwin assumed conduct of affairs. Even this solution would leave bitter rancor and festering hatreds, the inescapable legacy of the worst of wars, and would not remove the danger of future wars. It certainly would make inevitable a British-German alliance, as England would have intrusted her financial future to Germany's good faith. England would run a tremendous risk if the expected Communist rebellion should sweep Germany or, what is more likely, if an exhausting, bloody, planless civil war should ensue.

Over all broods the sinister spirit of French-Italian chauvinism, acting in the manner of pre-war diplomacy and greed and lust for power. No wonder people despair. Geneva feels intensely the failure of the Americans to aid spiritually and morally. They no longer expect our entrance to the League, but if no unexpected help such as the proposed British move just outlined comes, they feel that only America can save Europe from the bloody-handed, base-minded diplomats and the spineless prime ministers who are leading her to destruction. Liberals feel, like the editor of The Nation, that America has thrown away a glorious opportunity to lead the world, a leadership which was possible without war guaranties, without entering the League, and without entangling alliances.

Heywood Broun

By HEYWOOD BROUN

(Mr. Broun's account of himself as a critic is the first of a series of articles by critics about themselves which will appear in The Nation during the coming winter. Arrangements have been made with Ludwig Lewisohn, H. L. Mencken, and Carl Van Doren for similar articles, and further announcements will be made as the series develops. Heywood Broun went from the New York Tribune to the New York World in 1921 and since that time his column "It Seems to Me" has been one of the World's chief features. Mr. Broun's criticism is always a frankly personal reaction, so that his opinion of himself carries with it added literary significance.)

ONE of the things in which I used to take pride was the fact that I never lost sight of the fallibility of my opinions. But I ought not to take pride in this for it is among the factors which limit my usefulness as a critic. Humility ill becomes those who sit in judgment. The taste of American readers improves, and it has been developed almost entirely by mentors who never had a doubt as to the utter rightness of every decision which they handed down. People hereabouts have been shamed into appreciation. Perhaps there is some reason to doubt the value of rearing up browbeaten aesthetes. The tyranny has developed to such an extent that 90 per cent (this is an estimate, since the statistics have not yet been issued) of all the reading done in this country today is motivated by a sense of duty. People read so that they may converse more intelligently, get better jobs, develop a powerful will and a magnetic personality. Only a few read for fun, which seems to me the best of all possible reasons.

In a bookstore the other day I was horrified to stumble upon something which was called "A Reading Ladder." The books in it were carefully sorted into "Books for children less than five," "Between five and nine," "Between nine and thirteen," and "More than thirteen," at which age I suppose the wide horizons might be expected to open. But of course they don't. Even after the reader outgrows his status of having books handed down to him from graduated shelfs he enlists in some new subserviency. Probably he becomes a follower of Mencken and what Mencken says is good becomes good and also necessary to that particular reader. People insist upon getting the best books just as rigidly as they demand the best butter. We have then the spectacle of hundreds of thousands of Americans buying "Main Street" and reading some of it. Now, I happen to think that "Main Street" was a significant achievement, but it was one of the most disliked books published within my time and I can hardly forbear shuddering at the thought of the pain and boredom which it caused among the millions of the devoted and unhappy seekers after good literature.

However, I must change the tack or my attempt at confession will become too nearly an enthusiastic defense of Heywood Broun, the undogmatic. The fact of the matter is that there is no virtue in this lack of positiveness. Here, too, is a weakness. The weasel qualifier, it seems to me, is inserted merely because I don't know whether or not a book is as bad or as fine as I believe it to be. I have never been able to learn the reasons for my enthusiasms. At first I was content not to know. My method upon encountering what seemed to me fine work was to turn a few handsprings and froth a little at the mouth. Perhaps I might have gone on to the end in that way, but the somersaults strained my wrists and I froth less easily than a few years ago.

Accordingly, I have almost abandoned any pretensions to belonging among the critics of literature as an art, or drama either. I belong among the Puritans, for instinctively I judge a book by first asking myself, Is this a story which tends to uphold conduct, which seems to me admirable, or is it not? You see I happen to have very definite standards about shrewd conduct and foolish conduct, and so I find it much easier to function as an ethical than as an artistic arbiter. And America, for the sake of its sins, deserves such a critic, or commentator, or call him what you will. Somebody must do his best to atone in part for William Winter, and that is my effort, although the motivation is largely unconscious. For forty years, for instance, Mr. Winter kept on hammering away at "Camille" because he felt it to be a play which condoned immorality. That was reasonable enough because he was so ethically minded that he couldn't enjoy "Camille." The fact that it was theatrically adroit meant nothing to him. Nor would it mean anything to me. The most perfect piece of work about a good wife and mother is never going to seem anything but a bad play or a bad novel to me, because I don't like good wives and mothers. This sort of criticism is fundamentally wrong-headed, but what can I do about it? Certainly there is no satisfaction in searching for reasons to applaud work which you don't like. There are those who can, without strain, shout "Rah, rah, rah, Technique," but I would choke upon such a cry. Willa Cather's novel "One of Ours" won the Pulitzer Prize, and to me it was a bad novel. It was a bad novel because Miss Cather found the war romantically appealing and I did not. That is just as good a subject to quarrel about as her sentence structure.

After all the establishment of definite critical standards serves to hamper rather than foster literature. No matter how broad you make the rules something will come along which will make it necessary to stretch them to the breaking-point. There are many diets more pleasant than eating your own standards, and the easiest way to avoid that difficulty is to have no standards.

Still, it is false for me to pretend that I have no preconceptions. I have a very definite idea of what is generally wrong with the novel. At any rate it is a fault in twenty out of every twenty-five. The failing which I find is excessive bulk. There are not a handful of writers who know enough to begin at the beginning and stop at the end. Invariably there is a prologue in which the stage-hands come out and set the scene before the characters do anything of interest and importance. Even more common is the practice of hanging on to a situation and squeezing it after all the vitality has been exhausted. There is then a definite platform for which I am willing to stand. I want shorter and more immoral novels.

Mrs. Gladfelter's Revolt

By HELEN R. MARTIN

I

ALTHOUGH Jacob Gladfelter's four robust sons had come out from under the rule of his heavy hand as strong, self-reliant young men, his wife and his only daughter had become, year after year, more and more submissive and cowed. To be sure, Jacob had always been a little more tolerant of self-assertion on the part of males of the household, seeing that they would, in the end, have to be their own masters; but as a woman must always, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch standard of what was "womanly," acquiesce in the dominance of a man, either her father or her "mister," there was not the same reason for relaxing one's sway over them as in the case of the boys.

It had never occurred to Meely, Jacob's wife, to question her man's right to rule his own household. She would have thought him less than a man and would not have respected him if he had not governed her and their children with a firm hand. From that night when, meeting her for the first time at a barn dance, he had boldly snatched her from her partner, carried her bodily to his own sleigh and driven away with her under the very eyes of her dumfounded and indignant escort, she had been his abject slave.

Her sons loved and petted their little mother and their comely young sister Weezy—and walked over them roughshod. In this they only followed the example of their father. Although Jacob Gladfelter, prosperous proprietor of the only general store in Virginsville, had always been, according to his lights, a kind, indulgent husband and father, he was first and foremost a man of strict conscientious scruples and he would have considered himself just as sadly lacking in his duty if he had ever let his women folks get out of hand as if he had failed to be a "good purvider" or had neglected to engage the best procurable midwife for his wife's many confinements, keeping her on the job for as much as two weeks—which in Virginsville was almost going to the ragged edge of sentimentality. Jacob's contempt for the few men of his acquaintance who were so weak as to "leave the women boss" was unutterable. Besides this, in spite of his reputedly amiable disposition, there was a streak of obstinacy in his character that, once he had taken a stand, would not let him yield.

So jealously did Jacob guard his prerogative to decide all household matters that for his wife and daughter to make a suggestion was only to invite a sure denial of what they wanted. If he indulged them it must be in his own way, at his own convenience, and in what he considered pleasant for them. Was a new carpet to be bought, Mr. Gladfelter selected it. He would see no point in consulting his wife's taste in the matter because if she did not share his decided preferences as to carpets her preference would, of course, have to be sacrificed; and if she did share them, no use to consult her. Did the kitchen range wear out, it was Jacob who said whether it should be replaced by a gas-cooking stove. And on such questions as the higher schooling of the children Jacob simply announced to her what he intended to do.

When suffrage was given to women the four Gladfelter boys were hilarious at the idea of "Mom's wotin'." Jacob, considering the Amendment unscriptural and subversive of a stable social order, laid down the law for his family: "I won't give you the dare to wote, Mom! As fur Weesy, till she's at the wotin' age, I guess she'll be married and it'll be fur her mister to say dare she wote or not."

"It wonders me how a man ever knows who to wote fur," said Mrs. Gladfelter. "The candidates all seems all right till they're in oncet—and then—"

"Yes, and then! You said it!" blustered her son Elmer. "And then it's hell! Ain't?"

"Yes, ain't!" responded all the men.

When Weezy reached the age for "settin' up Sa'rdays and keepin' comp'ny with a Steady-Regular," her father magnanimously told her one evening at supper that he would now get a new suite of furniture for the parlor. He had expected this news to be received with gratitude and pleasure by Weezy and her mother, and he was surprised at the awkward silence that answered him. The truth was Meely and Weezy had come to dread Jacob's taste in household furnishings.

"Please, Pop," Weezy ventured, "don't get yellow!"

Mrs. Gladfelter looked anxiously across the supper table to note the effect upon her husband of such boldness. Jacob, eating sausage and fried potatoes, did not reply.

"Yellow kreistles me!" Weezy shuddered.

No reply from Jacob.

"I like red better or such dark blue."

Jacob noisily sipped his coffee.

"Sooner'n have yellow, I'd let the parlor."

"So would I!" Mrs. Gladfelter, unexpectedly though timidly, spoke in. "It's going on twenty years that I lived with our parlor furniture and I'm used to it a little. I'd sooner let it be than get new."

"You always were so much for yellow, Pop!" pleaded Weezy. "I wouldn't like to keep comp'ny with a fellow with yellow furniture!"

"And it's Weezy would use the room, not us," Mrs. Gladfelter reasoned, taking refuge in addressing her son Albert rather than her husband. "If Weezy don't favor yellow, I think it's a pity to get yel——"

"Be peaceable, Mom!" Jacob quietly ordered her, with that look of deadly obstinacy on his face which she and Weezy knew to be the stone wall to any further advancement of their side of a question. But something in her daughter's wistful, worried eyes made her, this evening, strangely persistent.

"Us we might as well get what Weezy would like and yellow ain't just to say so tasty in parlor furniture—it's not so bad in wallpaper or carpet, though I'd sooner purfur red or blue, like Weezy says, but yellow furniture, yet——"

"Be peaceable, Mom!"

"But Weezy's gettin' full-growed now, and if she don't take to yellow, it's her has to set in the parlor, we never do, and it's her——"

"Mom! Be peaceable!"

And Mrs. Gladfelter, with a long sigh, subsided.

Mr. Gladfelter felt it to be his clear duty, in view of this incipient insubordination of his wife and daughter, to establish his rightful authority by getting a parlor suite of the yellowest yellow plush he could find.

It was when her father announced, upon Weezy's having finished the village school course, that she was now "done school," and must henceforth stop at home and help with the housework and the general store, that Mrs. Gladfelter, for the first time in her married life, was jolted into a real protest.

"Weezy not go to Millersville Normal!" she almost gasped, "like all our boys have went! But Pop! Me I always conceited you'd leave Weezy have schoolage, too, like our boys!"

Jacob did not think it necessary to offer any explanation of his decision.

"But Weezy she was always smarter'n any of our boys, Pop—her teachers all sayed she was smart! And she's always counted on goin' to Millersville Normal. She's planned all her life to be a school teacher!"

Jacob paid less attention to her plaints than he would have paid to a fly's buzzing.

"I always missed it so myself, not having no schoolage, Pop, I did think now my dotter was to have it! Why, look, Pop, how much better she could marry, too, if she got good educated!"

Weezy, during this monologue of her mother's, was silently weeping over her untasted supper.

Jacob, rising from the table, took a clothes-brush from a shelf, brushed first his clothes, then his hair with the same brush, and then, still without replying, turned away and walked into his store in the front of the house.

Mrs. Gladfelter regarded her weeping daughter in an agony of sympathy. That Weezy, so very much "smarter at the books" than her big brothers, should be denied an education for no other reason than that she was not a boy—for the first time in her life the bald unreasonableness and injustice of such a philosophy cut deep into her soul. She loved this daughter, her only girl, with a passionate devotion such as her rowdy, unmanageable boys had not called forth from her. Weezy, always so tender and thoughtful for her, was the poetry and romance of her life. It seemed to her that she could not calmly submit to this ruthless destruction of her child's dearest hopes. She suddenly rose, went to Weezy and put her arms about her. "Never you mind, Weezy, I've always counted on your getting' a good education and you're a-goin' to get it! Don't cry! You're not stoppin' your schoolage!"

Weezy dried her eyes and looked at her mother incredulously. "But, Mom, what can we do if Pop says no? The more we coax, the more stubborn-headed he'll get!"

"I know that. We won't coax. But you're a-goin' to get your nice education all the same!"

"But how, Mom? How will you get round Pop?"

"You know I got my interest money?"

"But Pop never gives it to you."

"I've never ast it off of him. But it comes in sich little pieces of paper called cupons. Pop keeps 'em in the safe. They give six hundred dollars a year. They're mine. My pop inherited 'em to me. That'll be enough to keep you at school."

"But, Mom, what would Pop say if you took them cupons?"

"I don't mind what he says compared to how I mind your not goin' to school. I got to just choose between them two things—Pop bein' cross at me or you losin' your schoolin.' "

"I never saw Pop really cross at you, Mom!"

"I have never gave him no reason to be. He can't rightly have cross at me fur takin' what's my own. Your Pop's a awful honest man, Weezy. Why, here this morning, Sally Bergstresser come in our store to buy a spool of thread off of Pop, and Pop he reminded her she owed him a cent on the last spool she got—her not having knew thread had went up a cent and having only five cents along that time. Pop tol' her, 'It ain't that I want that cent, Sally, but there's my income tax, you see. I got to be wery honest about that, you understand.' Sally she laughed till I thought she'd bust! She sayed 'Now, Jake Gladfelter, if that ain't like you! Takin' the trouble to get your income tax right to the penny!—where some wouldn't bother none if they was off a dollar or more!' Yes, Weezy, your Pop is that pertikkler that folks laughs at him yet! So I can't see that he could get cross at me fur takin' my own."

"Does he think it is yours, Mom, when you're married to him?"

"Well, the law calls it mine."

"The law gives you dare to wote, too, and Pop won't leave you."

"It makes me nothing, Weezy, if Pop is cross, so long as I can get you a good education."

Weezy shook her head hopelessly. "I'm under age. Pop could fetch me home from Normal."

Her mother's eyes gleamed with an adventurous daring that made her look to Weezy like a stranger. "Could he? Then I'll put you to a school that he won't know where you're at!"

"Why, Mom, you don't sound like yourself!" Weezy softly exclaimed, almost alarmed.

"Where could I find out about another school, Weezy?"

"Uriah Bergstresser mebby could tell you, Mom."

"Yi Bergstresser! Him!" Her mother was skeptical. "Why, him he was that dumb at Millersville Normal that they shed him at the end of the term!"

"I know, but he's traveled 'round a good bit."

"Yes, that's so, too. I mind that time he was to New York over, with his Pop. You mind how he tol' us New York's so big they couldn't find the end of it!"

"You mind, Mom, how he told us about the nice things they're got in that Metropolitan Mu-zeem in New York? Och, me, I'd like now to see that Mu-zeem! Ain't, Mom? You mind Yi said that as far as he could see, they didn't seem to use that great big building for a thing 'ceptin' to store all them things!"

"If you think, Weezy, Yi could tell us the name of another school than Millersville Normal, I'll ast him right aways."

"All right, Mom."

II

On Sunday morning early in September, when Weezy and her mother started out as usual for church, the girl surprised her father by kissing him goodby. Demonstrations of family affection being rare among the Pennsylvania Dutch, kissing being scarcely ever indulged in even when parting for a long time, Jake was puzzled—and pleased. He was very fond of little Weezy.

"Ain't you some early startin'?" he asked.

"It gives such a nice day, we thought we'd walk a piece-ways," answered his wife.

When the mother and daughter reached the church, they did not go in, but walked on to the Square where you took the trolley to the near-by city of Lancaster. From Lancaster, Mrs. Gladfelter sent a telegram to her husband: "Taking Weezy to Normal School. Be home Wednesday."

They stopped in Lancaster with Mrs. Gladfelter's brother Sam, who had recently moved there from Columbia unknown to Jacob. On Monday Sam helped his sister procure money on her bond and Mrs. Sam went with her and Weezy to outfit the girl for school. For the first time in her life Weezy was permitted to choose her own clothes, never having presumed to object to wear whatever her father had seen fit to buy for her.

Not even to her brother and his wife would Mrs. Gladfelter trust her secret—the name of the Normal School to which she was taking her daughter. "Millersville Normal," the only one they had ever heard of, being just four miles from Lancaster, she knew that they (and her husband too) would assume that that was where Weezy was going.

"It wonders me, Meely, that Jake leaves you tend to all this business for Weezy—the money and buyin' and all! It ain't like him! Is he sick or whatever, and how's your Monday washin' gettin' done?" asked her sister-in-law.

"Fur oncet I'm just lettin' the washin', Mame! I'm lettin' everything! Fur oncet I don't care! I feel that lightheaded and indiff'runt, I don't har'ly know what's over me!"

"Mebby you better see a doctor—not? What does Jake say at your bein' so light-headed and indiff'runt?"

"It makes me nothing what he says!" laughed Meely.

"My souls, Meely, you better see a doctor—it must be some serious!"

But Meely only laughed.

She doubted not that Jacob, immediately upon receiving her telegram on Sunday, had gone to "Millersville Normal" to force her and Weezy to come home. She marveled at her own unruffled calmness in contemplating his amazement at not finding them there.

"Do you think, Mom, you can keep it from Pop where I'm at?" Weezy wondered.

"Weezy, your Pop will never get it out of me!"

When the time came to part with her daughter and return home, Mrs. Gladfelter's high spirits suddenly dropped.

"Och, Mom, I hate for you to go back home and face Pop!" Weezy mourned.

"It ain't facin' your Pop, I mind. It's—it's the thought of what home will be without you, Weezy."

Weezy clasped her close. "Mom! I love you so!"

But on her homeward trip, Mrs. Gladfelter's sadness at leaving her daughter lifted somewhat and the unconquerable buoyancy that had possessed her ever since her flight was again in the ascendancy. This first and only adventure of her whole life, this first taste of freedom, had seemed to re-create her into a new being—she was almost a stranger to herself.

When at four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon she walked blithely through the general store where her husband and two of her sons were at the moment waiting on customers, she greeted them gaily as she passed on out to the sitting-room back of the store. "Well, Jake! Well, boys!"

The boys stared at her, too bewildered to reply. But her husband did not look up. Not until she called them all to supper did Jake deign to come near her, and even then he did not speak to her or even look at her as he sat down and at once began to help himself to fried "ponhaus" and "smear case." Meely suddenly realized that however strong she might be to meet reproaches, his holding himself silently and icily aloof from her would be more than she could live with! If this was to be the weapon with which he would try to wrest her secret from her and regain his dominance——

"I was talkin' to such a lady educator here the other day," she smilingly told them as she poured their coffee, "and she explained me the arguments how it's my dooty now to use the wote. So at the next election, Pop, I'm wotin'," she cheerfully stated.

Her husband made no sign. But the boys who, affected by their father's grim mood, had been discreetly silent, sent up a shout of laughter at the huge joke of their timid little mother's going to the polls to vote.

"Here's the new woman!"

"Have a cig-arette, Mom?"

"It wonders me you didn't have your hair so bobbed while you was to Lancaster over!"

After supper Jake at once went back into the store, still without speaking to her. She had expected him to demand, the moment she appeared at home, what she had done with Weezy; and she had been fully prepared to resist his insisting upon knowing. But when that night he went to sleep at her side without having spoken to her, she saw that until she voluntarily offered him the explanations and apologies he considered due him, he meant to hold himself thus aloof. She knew how stubbornly he could hold out in a course like this. She could not live with him in such alienation. It would kill her in a month! They had never quarreled before in all the twenty years of their married life.

The next morning she stopped him as he was about to go into the store. "Please, Pop, leave Al tend store till I speak somethin' to you."

Jake, directing Albert with a backward motion of his thumb to go into the store, stood still and waited for his wife to speak.

"I've made up my mind, Jake, fur our Weezy to have a nice education like you gev our boys—and, Jake, you better know right aways that if I have to die fur it, I'm a-goin' to see that she gets it!"

"Where's she at?"

"I'll tell you when you pass me your promise you won't go and fetch her home."

"Where's she at?" he repeated, bringing his knuckles down upon the table with a shock that rattled the dishes.

Meely's answer was to meet his cold eyes with such unflinching determination in her own that in his utter astonishment at its unfamiliarity, he relaxed, his jaw dropped, and he stared at her in confusion.

"Jake, I want fur my dotter to be somepin' more'n I alway was—a cabbage-head. Our Weezy's a-goin' to have her chanct to get more out of livin' than I ever had a'ready."

Jake stared at her stupidly, incredulously. "I don't favor females bein' book-learnt! It's agin Nature!"

"An awful lot of females is goin' agin Nature then, fur there's a thousand girls at that there Normal School Weezy's at. If I'd been a little book-learnt myself, I guess I wouldn't o' waited this long till I took my own mind fur somepin' oncet!"

"Where is that Normal School where Weezy's at?"

"Do you pass your promise like I sayed?"

"Answer to me Meely!"

"When you pass your promise!"

Again their eyes met and Jake, with a strange pang of fear in his heart, saw, in the straight, fearless gaze of the little woman whom, up to this hour, he had always regarded with a queer mingling of affection and contempt, that for once in his life he had encountered his match in obstinacy. Deep down in his soul he knew that he was beaten.

Count Albert Apponyi

By OSCAR JASZI

(The author of this article is a noted Hungarian scholar, editor, and statesman. During the Karolyi regime in 1918 he acted as Minister of National Minorities. The coming to power of the Bolsheviki forced Dr. Jaszi to take refuge in Vienna, and the subsequent years of the White Terror have kept him there. He has published a newspaper devoted to the cause of freedom in Hungary and of reconciliation between Hungary and the neighboring countries. He is now in the United States, having arrived shortly before Count Apponyi, who is at present lecturing under the auspices of the Institute of International Education.)

COUNT APPONYI is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable statesmen of Hungary. For half a century he has been a leading figure in the public life of his country. Even those who fought him and his policies bitterly admit that he is a man of whom any parliament in the world would be proud because of his intellectual gifts as well as for his oratorical ability and moral qualities.

There can be no doubt that Count Apponyi is a man of extraordinary brilliance and culture. He is a powerful speaker; not only in his mother tongue but in five or six foreign languages he can stir an audience to tears. But the eminence of this man is perhaps greater in the moral sphere. He has been clean and disinterested in a political milieu where corruption and graft, business greed and nepotism play a very important role. In his private life, too, Count Apponyi has been an example of civic virtue; he has lived a modest, even ascetic, life in surroundings of splendor and luxury. Though a fanatical devotee of his Jesuit teachers, his religion, in spite of its dogmatism, is not without kindness, benevolence, and a spirit of helpfulness for his fellow-men. The nobility and independence of his personality was especially evident when, in the worst months of the "white bolshevism" of Horthy and his gang, Count Apponyi was the only man of the Hungarian aristocracy who made a sincere, audacious, and sometimes very dangerous fight against the murders and robberies of the armed bands. He not only took a lofty spiritual standpoint but he busied himself day and night in the interest of wretched Jews and other victims of white militarism.

In spite of these extraordinary qualities his public activity did not benefit the country which he adored, but on the contrary, his spirit and influence were in a high degree responsible for the catastrophe which dismembered and destroyed Hungary, economically as well as morally. This may seem paradoxical. I must give a little more detailed analysis of the factors and forces which have counterbalanced Count Apponyi's high moral qualities.

Count Apponyi's political and economic milieu was not the democratic arena of Western civilization but a country which remained, and is still, entirely feudal in structure and spirit. The political and economic preponderance of the large estates, of the feudal lords, and the Roman Catholic high clergy is almost exclusive. There was, and still is, no country in the world where the distribution of landed property was as unjust and unfortunate as in Hungary. Some thousand noblemen and capitalists retained about one-third of the entire arable land, and the great majority of the Hungarian population was deprived of landed property at all, or its property was so small that a farmer's family could not live on it. This disastrous distribution of landed property was accentuated by the post-war revolution, so that Hungary has now the largest landless peasant proletariat in the world. This unwholesome agricultural structure was responsible for the failure of Hungarian industry and commerce to develop. It explains why no bourgeoisie worthy of the name ever arose, why the democratic forces—both in the cities and in the rural districts—were extremely feeble, why the whole intelligentsia was at the service of the big feudal landowners. (I say feudal intentionally because the landed property was used only to exploit an exceedingly uncultivated landless proletariat.) Really productive forces cannot develop where press, legislature, the civil administration, and the courts are at the exclusive service of the big feudal magnates and of their intellectual and political servants. A restricted and corrupted franchise (the whole country was, and still is, a single "rotten borough") did the rest. In Hungary there never was a real "public opinion." The landed aristocracy—allied with the largely Jewish haute finance and the intellectual upper class—controlled all manifestations of so-called public opinion. No wonder if in such an atmosphere Count Apponyi failed to discriminate between real public opinion and the political whims of the aristocracy.

The danger of this situation was augmented by the fact that Count Apponyi represents an intellectual type which is in contrast with the present-day public mind. Count Apponyi is an abstract idealist; he has never understood the driving forces of social evolution. He has been a kind of a noble political Don Quixote who often saw in the windmills of his historical imagination veritable giants. The Hungarian orator is the greatest contrast imaginable to the intellectual type of our day which blindly swears to the exclusive domination of economic factors and sees all history and politics as an economic class struggle. Both types —the pure idealist and the pure materialist—are incapable of grasping political and social realities, but the danger is greater for the Apponyi type, which, fighting in a vacuum, sees only the phosphorescence of its own favorite ideas.

Count Apponyi, like a very fine political seismometer, registers with a real impressionist intuition the rapidly changing currents of the political atmosphere. He becomes rapidly intoxicated with each new idealistic movement which stirs public opinion, but he seldom seizes upon the real social and economic significance of these ideas. In consequence he frequently abandoned or subconsciously falsified the ideas which he advocated. The subconscious—in its broader Freudian meaning—plays a fundamental role in his public activity. His conscious self is liberal, democratic, pacifist; his subconscious self is the soul of his feudal ancestors, attached to the Roman church and the Hapsburg dynasty.

His entire political career demonstrates the correctness of this psychological hypothesis. He abandoned his first political platform—that of the dual constitution for Austria and Hungary—and joined the Party of Independence, based on the deeply democratic and social ideas of Louis Kossuth, which later found ardent and noble leaders in Julius Justh and Count Michael Karolyi. (It is characteristic of Hungarian public life that its leaders have almost always been members of the great landowning class.) Apponyi made brilliant speeches for the Independent Party, but he soon transformed its real democratic and revolutionary spirit into a rhetorical fight for formulas, titles, military emblems which, he thought, would demonstrate the national independence of Hungary. Whole decades were wasted in this chivalrous but useless fight with the windmills of a formal and verbal constitutionalism; Count Apponyi never understood the real teachings of Louis Kossuth, which were so powerfully developed by Iranyi, Mocsary, and later by Justh and Karolyi. These men insisted that Hungarian independence could not be the fruit of constitutional formulas but must grow out of complete democratization of the Hungarian state, with universal suffrage and expropriation of the large estates.

I will not say that Count Apponyi was an adversary on principle of universal suffrage. He always sympathized with this fundamental reform and he delivered excellent speeches in its favor. But when the time came for its realization, Count Apponyi dropped back, approaching the conservatives under the leadership of Count Julius Andrassy, thus postponing the struggle for universal suffrage for other things which he thought more important. Similar was his attitude toward the greatest problem of modern Hungary, the agrarian question. Here, too, he held liberal views and advocated peasant proprietorship for the landless, but when times became serious and the great propaganda of Karolyi for land reform began, Apponyi withdrew and contented himself with platonic declarations.

Hungarian independence endangered the interests of the Hapsburgs, and their dethronement by Louis Kossuth was an inevitable consequence of his policy. Until Apponyi's turn to the Independent Party it was in its spirit a rather Calvinist group which rallied the masses of the small peasantry and the small bourgeoisie. But with Count Apponyi a feudal jeunesse dorée brought into the ancient party of the Kuruc peasants (this was the name of the anti-Hapsburg battalions) a marked Catholic, conservative, and Hapsburg tendency.

There is a similar contrast in his international policy and in his attitude toward the non-Magyar races of Hungary. The classical independent doctrine was this: The dualistic state, with its artificial and unnatural hegemony of the Germans in Austria and the Magyars in Hungary, could only be upheld by the force of German imperialism. To guarantee this predominance of the two races, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy became a vassal state following Bismarck's policy. To create an independent Hungary separated from Austria, two things were necessary: to dissolve the German treaty and substitute for the German a French and Slav orientation. Such a policy could not be realized as long as Hungary was surrounded by hostile Czech, Rumanian, and Serb states. These states were hostile, partly because of the tariff policy of the monarchy, which impeded agricultural importation from the smaller states, partly because of the policy of Germanization in Austria and Magyarization in Hungary.

The greatest creative thought of Louis Kossuth in his years of exile was his scheme of the so-called Danube-Confederation. In this vast structure independent Hungary was to become the intimate ally of the Czech, the Rumanian, and the Serb states on a basis of free trade and with a common international policy. Such a scheme was impossible as long as Hungary refused complete national autonomy to the kindred races of the neighboring states living within the boundaries of Hungary.

During the war, when the shipwreck of the dualistic scheme was evident, Count Karolyi openly propagated and developed Kossuth's plan with a rare logical force and moral courage, but Count Apponyi, because of his subconscious moral motivation, understood it not at all and saw in it only an aberration of Kossuth's during the sad years of his exile. Count Apponyi, therefore, remained the staunchest champion of the Hapsburgs and of German imperialism because his subconscious self felt that the sovereignty of the Kaiser was the only possible way to maintain the political and racial supremacy of the so-called "historical classes" of Hungary over the non-Magyar races, the Magyar landless peasantry, and the city proletariat.

This explains Count Apponyi's role before and during the war. While his conscious self was ardently pacifist, he never remarked that the policy of his class—high agrarian customs duties, the German alliance, oppression of the other nationalities—was one of the chief causes which operated in Europe to prepare the World War.

And when the bomb of Sarajevo exploded as a consequence of the brutal economic and racial system of Austro-Hungarian feudalism this strange pacifist forgot his pacifist orations and greeted in parliament the hazardous decision of the Vienna camarilla for war with an emphatic enfin! which remained historic.

This standpoint he maintained from the beginning to the end of the war. While Count Karolyi and the other real Independents, risking their lives, were denouncing the war and German imperialism, and pleading for a separate peace (seeing the inevitable catastrophe which the World War meant for Hungary) Count Apponyi urged continuance of the war "to the last man."

The October revolution of 1918 closed for a time the public career of Count Apponyi. He loyally abstained from counter-revolutionary propaganda. But the blindness and cruelty of the Entente, the intrigues of the Hapsburg aristocracy, and the tremendous Russian propaganda overthrew the democratic and republican regime and thrust the unfortunate country into bolshevism.

In those days it was only the personal courage and sacrifice of Count Karolyi—himself a refugee—which saved the life of his great political adversary. During the hectic nights of the Soviet regime, when Count Karolyi was living in a suburb of Budapest under the closest bolshevik supervision, guarded day and night by Red detectives, Count Apponyi one evening knocked at his window, seeking refuge, his life being in danger. Karolyi let him come in and kept him hidden for days, subsequently assisting him to escape over the border. Yet Apponyi has never uttered a word in defense of Karolyi's immaculate character—this although the Horthy regime has confiscated not only Karolyi's but even his children's property, and has beggared him and his family in exile.

Apart from this, the culmination of the career of this remarkable man was his role as leader of the Hungarian Peace Delegation in Paris, when he represented the cause of our unfortunate and humiliated nation with the thrilling pathos of his unrivaled eloquence. Even his most embittered political enemies dipped their flags before him for his brilliant fight for a lost cause.

Inside a Cooperative Colony

An American Experiment with Wageless Work

By ERNEST S. WOOSTER

"WHY don't you Socialists get off somewhere by yourselves and try out your theories if they are so good?"

Probably every Socialist has been met by this question at least once in his career. Most Socialists have either evaded it or attempted to explain it away. Job Harriman considered it seriously, and decided it was a fair question to ask people who were trying to change the world's methods of doing business.

In 1914 Job Harriman founded the Llano Cooperative Colony in the parched soil of the Antelope Valley in southern California. Because of the aridity of the region and the lack of a dependable source of irrigation not menaced by interminable lawsuits, the colony and its inhabitants were moved in December, 1917, to the abandoned lumber town of Stables, near Leesville, in western Louisiana. This village had been but recently vacated, and when the colony acquired it, many large sheds and buildings, a store, hotel, and possibly 100 houses were available for immediate use.

The colony was established in 1914 with one family, a team, wagon, cow, and a few implements, and with $5 paid down on the land. Its plans were ambitious, its hopes high. In the nine years of its existence it has not amassed amazing wealth, but it has demonstrated indisputably certain things about social sciences and human beings. An enterprise so novel in its general scheme, so rich in its apparent possibilities, and so unhampered by traditions drew more than its fair share of impractical visionaries, loquacious theorists, and social experimenters, with some true idealists and practical men and women. A few were obviously desirous of becoming parasites.

The Llano Cooperative Colony accepted the fundamental theory that we are chiefly animated by selfish desires. This is the essence of the economic determinist philosophy. Necessarily it attracted those who espouse this belief.

First of the social institutions was the General Assembly. It met twice a month. On the face of it, this seemed to be a genuine democracy. In practice it soon degenerated into a cruel mass dictatorship, without conscience or even a very high degree of intelligence as a group. It was a monstrous invention which compelled attendance at its meetings because none knew when he might be ferociously attacked and forced to make a defense. It was a sinister organization that became a veritable Frankenstein, an irresponsible, fickle body ideally constituted for the purpose of scheming politicians, hired spies, volunteer trouble-makers, and too voluble though well-intentioned visionaries. It permitted the widest range of free speech, which omitted nothing of a personal nature and spared none. It was a prolific legislative body, but lacked respect for its own laws.

But this intense democracy did not satisfy all. A commission was formed which died of malnutrition when the novelty had worn off. It, too, produced laws in quantity to which nobody paid the least attention. A constitution was drafted, a perfect gem of an instrument which provided for almost anything and everything, but which soon became a confusing network of inharmonious patches, with more patches ready to be put on. It absorbed so much attention that finally it was abolished by unanimous vote in order to permit the transaction of other business in the General Assembly.

But pure democracy was so unable to do anything efficiently, or even make up its own public mind, that an industrial government composed of heads of departments began meeting in the interests of efficiency and order. Gradually this body usurped power because it got results and got them quickly. Interested chiefly in facts and results, it passed little legislation.

Lastly there was the legal board of directors of the corporation and the general manager or superintendent. The board of directors was far from inactive, and was the court of last resort.

These various systems of government ran concurrently, a plethora of government which has possibly never been equaled. Llano Colony as an experiment station in government can honestly claim to have carried on the most thorough and complete series of experiments ever conducted by an interested, intelligent, and voluntary group.

The present system is a board of directors roughly representative of the industries. It is elected politically, but is in effect industrial. Represented on it are the woodworking, clerical, farming, merchandising, live-stock, legal, and miscellaneous departments. The general manager has full control, as in any corporation, subject to the board of directors. But always there is the right of recall, and stronger than that public opinion, which acting quickly and efficiently and without form or formality is a greater protection than any mere law or regulation. It is probable that the industrial representation will become more perfect, with organized groups back of each industrial representative. This will come with the closer organization, stabilization, and growth of the industries. It is the logical system in a community where all are workers and where professional politicians can have no place. Llano has discarded democratic management, but retains complete democratic control.

Creating a self-contained community is not a simple thing when there are handicaps of insufficient capital, the lure of high wages on the outside, privations incident to pioneering, and no successful and tested recipes, but on the contrary many glittering formulas largely untried and likely to be disappointing. This becomes further complicated when those engaged in the demonstration are not equipped by years of managerial experience or commercial training, and when there are no traditions of procedure established. Many a meal has consisted almost solely of beans, nutritious probably but not appetizing after a few days. Ideals which can survive such conditions and handicaps are surely well anchored. Many who responded to the call for volunteers to carry on the demonstration did not have the required powers of endurance. Some were temperamentally or otherwise unfitted.

The overcoming of employee-and-employer psychology is one of the tasks which has confronted the colony. It has led to a more intensive study of psychology than is common in most communities. The psychological problem is the most serious that the colony must deal with. Those who have, most of their lives, worked under orders sometimes react strangely when the restraint is removed. The colony plan is that all who are able to work must do so. When this rule is applied to the women it sometimes causes friction, for the average American woman (and foreign women seem to be no exception to this rule) is reared to expect to marry a man who will provide for her. She does not expect to work. This, however, is only occasionally a serious problem.

"What'll you do with the lazy under Socialism?"

This is another of the stock questions which the Socialist propagandist is called on to answer. In the colony it is a practical problem. Yet it has been found that many of the so-called lazy are only those who have been forced to labor at wholly distasteful tasks. By changing them from one job to another they usually find places into which they fit. The colony has had a few misfits. When industry after industry has tried them and has failed to work a reform, they must finally be eliminated. Public opinion usually attends to this, though the board of directors may be called on to back the general manager on occasion. Rarely, though, has official action been necessary.

There was one man whose pretext of illness seemed to be merely an excuse for idleness. Public opinion became quite outspoken. This was enough to put him to work again. Another member who seemed almost worthless finally found his niche in the hardest job on the ranch and remained with it month after month, earning the respect of all. Some are specialists with but little versatility, and if their specialty can not absorb them they drift away. Others—and the colony has many such—are extremely versatile.

Promoting workers is not always attended with the happiest results. One man, a farmer and timber-worker, was elevated to the position of solicitor for a colony industry, and provided by the colony with clothing suitable to wear when meeting the public. Few would have considered this much of a promotion, but it was the first job he had ever had which permitted him to wear a white collar while at work. He became insufferably vain and egotistical, and finally earned the downfall which usually comes to those who become puffed with self-importance. But others have been removed from positions of authority and have stayed on and worked willingly in other capacities. They have the spirit of the colony.

The chief concern of many persons who term themselves radicals has been with wages. This was true in the colony, for it drew its membership largely if not wholly from among those calling themselves radicals. The colony began business with an erroneous conception which almost proved fatal. It offered $4 a day wages. Back in 1914 this was pretty alluring bait. It was this comparatively high wage promise which attracted many who had little conception of principle not visualized in wages.

But it was soon demonstrated that to offer wages was a mistake, and the elimination of this error began at once. The wage system was not immediately wiped out. But it was gradually modified until it finally vanished entirely, and today the members of the colony are employed by it in much the same way that members of a family operate a farm. Their housing, food, clothing, entertainment, instruction, and other desires and needs are provided by cooperative group effort, just as the farm family, working cooperatively as a group, provides the living for the family but does not do it by the head of the family guaranteeing set wages to the sons and daughters.

This parallel of the farm family is a good one. It illustrates the social and essentially human side of colony life. Only those who believe thoroughly and unreservedly in the principles of genuine Christianity (without worship, form, ceremony, church, priest, or prayer) and are willing to live their beliefs will participate in this practical application of brotherhood. The eliminating of wages is more than the wiping out of a symbol: it means the changing of thought currents.

The colony is more than a demonstration of cooperation; it is a demonstration of brotherhood. Rent, interest, and profit will separate the members of a family; the tokens of rent, interest, and profit have a like tendency, though attenuated. Rent, interest, and profit, according to the belief of the colonists, thrive upon underpaid labor, for only the margin withheld can make such unearned increment possible. Therefore wages are suggestive if not emblematic of withheld earnings of labor. To abolish them, therefore, is to abolish even the taint; and to make still more easy the complete enthronement of brotherhood.

The practical application of this is not so difficult as it might seem. Every dwelling is owned by the community. The entire community is owned and controlled by its citizens. No rents are charged for these, which in the last analysis would merely be book accounts. To charge for food or clothing would be to open further useless accounts. To pay wages and then make charges and collect from the wages would be—and was—to compel a system of accounting really unnecessary. The colony owns its commissary, and this is stocked at colony expense. It is true that limits are at present placed on what each family or individual may draw from the common store, but here again the resemblance to the family life is seen. Many a father and mother have to restrain a son or daughter from depriving other sons or daughters of what is equitably due them.

Firewood is furnished by the colony. So are laundry service, meals at the hotel, lumber, brooms, bread, and shoes. These are colony products. The colony, operated on the family system, must provide its members with the necessities of life, and will provide such luxuries as become possible with increasing prosperity. Many colonists have their own gardens and prepare part of their meals at home. There is little necessity for the use of money, for elaborate accounting, or for more than a mere checking of expenses. Even at the hotel no records are kept with individuals.

Let us return for a moment to the solicitor with the white collar. The colony clothes its members as workers. The solicitor had to be suitably dressed, and he was. The suit made for him was a part of his equipment, just as was the automobile he used. Had he remained on the farm or in the colony timber, he would have been provided with overalls as his daily costume. The colony provides "good" clothes to be worn on its many festive occasions—its theatricals, dances, picnics, parties, outings, etc.

One of the greatest problems has of course been the economic, second only in importance to the psychological one. Anyone who has watched the development of a homestead will understand without much explanation. Land must be cleared and brought to productiveness; houses must be built, other buildings erected. Trees must be cut, hauled, sawed into lumber, the lumber seasoned. It means a vast amount of preparatory work, immense labor in getting ready to begin really productive operations. The colony problem is the homesteader's problem of accomplishing all of these and many other things when handicapped by insufficient capital. It is estimated that 50 per cent of individual homesteaders fail when within sight of their goal, their resources more than exhausted, their credit strained to the limit. Only a small percentage ever reap the rewards of their long, hard fight.

The colony must develop industries and is doing so. It is selling some lumber, bricks, and agricultural products and services. It sells sweet potatoes, rice, peanut butter, sugar-cane syrup. It has a blacksmith-shop and machine-shop, and a woodworking department, all of which do a good local business with neighbors. It manufactures sweet-potato shipping crates. Gradually it is becoming self-supporting by its own efforts. The elimination of many profits within the group tremendously reduces costs. Meals cost less than ten cents each, for instance. Electric lights are a part of the colony service to the individual without charge being made. When water is piped from the springs west of the colony, this service will also be free. The timber products will be converted into finished products, probably furniture. The exploitation of the soil resources is under way, and this year an effort is to be made to develop large Northern markets. The pioneering work has reached the point where profitable production becomes possible.

Let it not be misunderstood, this matter of the daily living. It is not a luxurious one. While there are no acute discomforts, yet such semi-luxuries as butter, ice cream, imported fruits, and similar articles are not on the daily menu, nor are they in evidence even on important occasions. But with the development of pasture lands and forage crops to permit a larger dairy, butter and cheese and ice cream will be manufactured for the use of colonists. Meanwhile, the colonists must live largely on what they can produce, which is what the pioneering homesteader does. When the colony can develop its recently acquired citrus lands in Cuba, and operate its own boat—it has one—it can supply its residents with citrus fruits in abundance.

But this enforced frugality has its advantages. It is stamping itself on the characters of the colonists, and thrift and economy are ingrained in every enterprise and undertaking.

The Llano Cooperative Colony is a community of demonstration and experimentation where American workers are engaged in creating new ideals and reducing them to a practical working basis, where the most complete form of cooperation is being organized to function without friction, and where theory is discarded as soon as it is found impractical. The Llano ideals as practiced by the colonists constitute a religion, a genuine one, though without priest or preacher, pulpit or church, sermon or prayer, form or ceremony, worship or protestation. It is a religion which the early Christians could easily understand, for it closely follows the teachings of Christ. Llano Colony without a church is also without a saloon, bootlegger, immoral section, jail, or peace officer. Its churchless religion is universally observed by its citizens.

Coolidge's Country

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

WE come to the shore of Lake Champlain. We are on the New York side. We come, and we stop, and we await a ferry. We think we see it approaching across the water from the Vermont side. Ahead of us there is a car with a Vermont license on it. We pull up beside this car and look at its occupant. He is manifestly a countryside person. We address him. We say: "Are you waiting for a ferry?" We gaze at him companionably. He gazes at us with no apparent hostility, with no apparent cordiality, and with no apparent curiosity. He opens his lips. He says "Yes." He closes his lips and ceases from further garrulousness. "Have you been waiting long?" "No."

We climb a very long hill and turn into a valley which stretches before us for several miles with appealing alternations of wild woods and soft meadows. To our left there rises a considerable mountain. Pastures have been pushed up its side almost to its top at certain places and only to a short distance from its base at other places. It is in part a wilderness and in part a habitation. It, for some reason which we do not know and never have known, has what so many Vermont mountains have—a magical mingling of harshness and of aching eeriness. It says something very poignant, and it is mute. . . .

We climb an extraordinarily high and steep hill and descend into a valley all of stillness and come to a country store and across the road from it see the Coolidge house. Many cars are standing in front of it. They bear license tags from Vermont, from New York, from Illinois, from other States. One of them, with a New York tag, is a very large car. A large and luxurious woman gets out of it, stands on the edge of the road, looks at the Coolidge house, and says: "To think that the family of the President would live in a house like that!" . . .

It is a better house than some families in some Vermont villages have. It is a worse house than some other families have. The village is charming. Almost all the villages that we have seen on our way are neat and sweet and charming. This one has more charm than some of them. It has less charm than some others of them. If all the villages that we have seen, and if all the houses that we have seen in them, were minced and lumped, and if then a slice was taken off them, it would be this village and this house. . . .

The clerk in the large hotel in the little near-by metropolis had said:

"Yes, Coolidge often came in here. He would walk up to the desk and sign the register. Then he would walk into the dining-room. He never looked around the lobby. He would walk into the dining-room and sit down and eat his dinner. Then he would get up and walk out of the dining-room and come to the desk and pay his bill. Then he would walk out into the street and go away. He never looked around. He never tried to pick up any votes in the lobby. He ate his dinner and never said anything and went away. I know him well." . . .

In a road-side farmhouse where tourists were accommodated we had mentioned a statesman who had declared for Coolidge for President in 1924. Our host said:

"We noticed him declaring himself that way so soon.

What do you think he wants? And if he doesn't want anything, why does he talk so much?"

"Are you for Coolidge?" said we.

"Coolidge is a good man," said he.

"Are you for him?" said we.

"Well, everybody here knows Calvin," said he. . . .

The elder Coolidge stands in his little low-ceilinged parlor and greets the pilgrims to the scene of his son's boyhood. A woman pilgrim seats herself at a table and lifts a girl child to her lap and guides the child's hand in tracing her name in the Coolidge guest-book. This book was destined by its manufacturers to be a school notebook. Since so many pilgrims would like to sign their names, it is now a guest-book. The elder Coolidge chats with the child while the child's hand is moved along in its unsteady scrawl. He turns to chat with a pilgrim who has just come in. He turns to chat with a third arrival, and then with a fourth, a fifth, a sixth, endlessly. His manner is oddly like that of President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia. There is the same deliberateness, the same imperturbability, the same engaging gentleness, and the same disengaged, essentially unapproachable inward aloofness. One is at ease with him. One cannot be familiar with him. He has in simple truth the same democracy that the Pyrrhic ambassadors saw at Rome when they reported that in Rome there were no kings and everybody was regal. . . .

A few miles to the southward we come upon Park Pollard, Calvin Coolidge's first cousin, Democratic candidate for United States Senator; and he remarks: "No, there is no farm bloc here. Our farmers are not asking the Federal Government for anything. They have been having a hard time making a living for two hundred years, let alone twenty months." . . .

We cross the Connecticut River and arrive in New Hampshire and meet an old friend who knows everything about everything in the public life of New Hampshire and who tells us about New Hampshire's new Governor Fred Brown.

"Brown is a Yankee," says he. "He is very Yankee. Of course he is not quite so Yankee as Coolidge." . . .

We begin to pass increasing numbers of fruit stores and restaurants manned by Greeks and mills peopled heavily by French Canadians. We leave them behind and pass into the town of Sharon. Here are clearings that are ceasing to be clearings and becoming wild woods once more. Here are houses that once were habitations and are now histories. Yankee life once filled these roads—these twisting, interlacing roads—with busy exchanges of Yankee trade. Now few are the wheels that these roads know except from afar; and now to the speech and to the manner which so few years since were this town's commonplace the admiring tourist exclaims as in a museum: "How Yankee!"

We come to a great city and we hold converse with a statesman of a race not Yankee and he remarks: "It has been brought about that here in this New England community it is a virtual disbarment from local office to be a Yankee." . . .

We talk to a statesman of Yankee descent. He says: "Coolidge does not simply come from New England. He represents and is New England." . . .

For Coolidge's country, says the roving reporter, it is as if in imperial Rome, amid Gauls and Spaniards and encroaching Illyrians, and amid un-Roman Romans, the city had suddenly seen on the throne of the Emperor a Cato the Censor.

Pennsylvania Justice

(The text below is the greater part of a report submitted to Governor Pinchot regarding the arrests in McKeesport, Pennsylvania, of speakers representing the Workers Party and of Robert W. Dunn of the Civil Liberties Union. In the name of the Governor the Attorney General of Pennsylvania urged the defendants to appeal the case. A petition for appeal has already been filed.)

THE McKeesport meeting of Sunday evening, September 9, had been advertised in advance by the use of cards which were passed around among the workers. Slovak Hall, a moderate-sized building on White Street, had been secured by a citizen of McKeesport, a barber and a member of the Workers Party. He had paid $5 in advance to the director of the hall, and had applied for it in the name of the Workers Party. Sunday evening J. Lovestone, Fred Merrick, Tom Meyerscough, Attorney Shaffer of Pittsburgh, Robert Dunn, and a number of others went to McKeesport and to the hall. There they found the director of the hall standing in the doorway and refusing to let them come in. They were informed that the hall could not be obtained because no permit had been secured from the mayor. The director of the hall said that it was a part of the by-laws of his association that a permit must first be secured. Attorney Shaffer and the others challenged the statement and asked him to produce the by-laws, which he refused to do. Then Police Captain Mermelheim appeared and instructed the speakers that "no meetin' would be held," and that they would have to have a permit from the mayor. He enforced his statement by locking the door of the hall, after the speakers had withdrawn from the steps.

The speakers then conferred and decided to tell the crowd to follow them to a private lot at Walnut and 13th Streets, some three-quarters of a mile away, which had been rented for this very emergency, full price being paid and the receipt being made out to the Workers Party. Representatives circulated quietly among the crowd and told the people to follow them to the lot. The crowd followed in an orderly manner, walking on the sidewalk in twos and threes. The motor-cycle police began rushing up and down the street as though preparing for war. The speakers proceeded to the lot which is surrounded by a wooden fence with a gate at the side. Walking to the middle of the grass plot, Thomas Meyerscough, secretary of the Progressive Miners' Organization, introduced Fred Merrick. As the police had not yet arrived in any numbers, Meyerscough was not arrested, and Merrick began his speech. He stopped after about two minutes to tell the crowd not to push against the fence but to come inside, which they did. A considerable number remained standing on the sidewalk outside. Merrick had spoken probably a minute more when he saw the police captain and his force pushing through the crowd from the back. He asked the crowd to make way without resistance, which it immediately did, the police pushing in, and the captain shouting "I told you you couldn't meet without a permit," and placing Merrick under arrest.

Dunn then opened his mouth and raised his arm, declaring "I am here to speak about the Constitution," whereupon the officers released Merrick and went for him. He was arrested, and Lovestone repeated substantially the same remark and was also arrested. William Makadis, a barber, was arrested for holding an American flag behind the speakers, and Patrick Toohey, Jr., was taken in custody for having a bundle of literature in his possession which he had not yet distributed or attempted to sell. Lieutenant H. Fred Kreilings was active in helping Captain Mermelheim during the arrests.

The five were taken to the police station, locked up, and thoroughly searched. The charge of disorderly conduct and desecrating the Sabbath was placed and bail set at $25 each. Attorney Shaffer, who had been on the grounds at the time of the arrests, asked one of the policemen why he too had not been given a free ride to the station, and was informed that if he had addressed the audience or even said "My fellow-citizens" he would have been taken in with the others.

Next morning, ours was the first case called before Magistrate Langsdorf. Captain Mermelheim told the story of the arrests, stating, among other things, that a crowd of over a thousand persons had gathered on the street outside the lot and had obstructed traffic. He gave an exaggerated figure of the number of persons who had followed us from the hall to the lot. Attorney Shaffer asked for the charge, and the magistrate informed us it was not only for disorderly conduct and desecrating the Sabbath, but also for holding a meeting without a permit.

When the lieutenant was asked why Makadis had been taken, he said he had been holding an American flag and had been talking in Greek. Makadis declared that he had said nothing until after they had arrested him. Patrick Toohey was taken, not for speaking, but for having in his possession the bundle of literature. The policeman who arrested him admitted he had not seen Toohey selling or distributing any of the pamphlets. Another policeman, when asked what Dunn had said, replied "He got as far as the Constitution, and I stopped him."

The contents of the pamphlet seemed to have got under the skin of the magistrate, for holding it in his hand he exclaimed "What right have you fellows got to come in here and say a thing like this?" referring to a paragraph in the pamphlet containing the statement that Mayor Lysle was reported to own stock in the McKeesport Tin Plate Company. The magistrate vigorously affirmed that the statement was not true, whereupon Attorney Shaffer inquired what the truth or falseness of this statement had to do with the charges against the five.

Attorney Shaffer then inquired if there was an ordinance prohibiting political meetings on Sunday. He was informed by the magistrate that there was. He asked to see the ordinance, but was told that they didn't have it there but that he could see it later. Shaffer then pointed out that he had been reliably informed that almost at the same hour that the arrests were made Mayor Lysle, together with J. Denny O'Neil, candidate for county commissioner, had been addressing a meeting at the Hungarian Club three doors away from the police station. The magistrate replied that this was on private property of the club. Shaffer retorted that the Workers Party meeting was held on private property, rented and paid for by the party. One of the associate justices broke in to say: "Aw, that was only a social affair at the club." The handbills announcing the meeting, however, said nothing about a social affair but advertised it as a meeting at which Republican candidates would be heard.

After a series of arguments Attorney Shaffer said he had nothing more to say and the magistrate fined each of the defendants $25 and costs ($2.50 each). After a conference in one of the cells, it was agreed to pay the fine under protest and appeal the case.

Later in the morning Shaffer, Lovestone, and Dunn called on the mayor to get a copy of the ordinance which the police officials informed them was in the mayor's office. Mayor Lysle curtly informed us that there was no such ordinance, that permits were granted by him on his own authority, and that the arrests had been made on his order. He claimed that the local police regulations gave him discretion to "regulate meetings." He was asked: "When the meetings are held on private property?" He replied: "I'm not going to discuss this with you. If you want to carry the matter any farther, get a transcript and appeal." When asked why the men had been fined under an ordinance which he admitted did not exist, he rejoined gruffly: "I refuse to talk about it with you men."

It was also discovered that no ordinance existed covering Sabbath desecration, but that the charges had been brought under some ancient blue law of Pennsylvania.

It is interesting to note that the same speakers who were arrested at McKeesport addressed a free-speech rally in Pittsburgh on the same afternoon. They intended to deliver the same addresses at McKeesport, and Mr. Lovestone had presented a copy of his to Governor Pinchot and to Senator Pepper. The meeting in Pittsburgh was held without any interference, and police protection was given by Mayor Magee.

In the Driftway

ONE of the Drifter's young friends has become the owner of a farm in the Berkshires, and recently the Drifter was prevailed upon to visit him. He duly admired the brook and the spring; he gasped over the view from the back windows; and the fine, simple proportions of a house built the year George Washington died were not lost upon him. This purchase of the soil of the Puritans, he decided, had many things to recommend it. To be sure, a farm, in any location, was something of a responsibility. What, he was moved to wonder, would the young man do with the fields that lay in front and alongside the house; they were clean and short-grassed; cows grazed in them quietly. Would a gentleman from the city, who planned to spend summers and some week-ends at his farm, be able to milk his cows by telephone, or would he be content to let the weeds and thistles crowd out the pasture?

* * * * *

NOT his friend but a neighbor who was likewise a city importation explained the difficulty. "Oh, well," she said, "we tried at first to keep them down, but it was too much work. We are planting our fields in pines now and they are no more trouble at all." The Drifter said nothing, but in his mind's eye he saw many things: a band of intrepid souls progressing along the Connecticut River, over the banks of which the primeval forest leaned darkly; a small stockade settlement named Hartford from which the forest had retreated only a little and that painfully; clearings in the timber made with immeasurable sweat and sore muscles and dulled ax blades; fields made fit to plow by countless backs lame from lifting stones and possibly not a few bent crowbars when a big rock was too much for them; and, finally, the hills that rose around him as he turned wore a different aspect: to their very tops, even of that sharp, high, cone-shaped one yonder, the tillers had gone relentlessly, and the young corn sprang from the hillsides, nearer the sky than it had ever been.

* * * * *

THE Drifter sighed. Times had changed indeed. Now these very fields were being planted in pines so that they would no longer give trouble. Well, they had given trouble enough. It was the end of a cycle, and the forest was to have its chance again. The Drifter wondered if the time would come when it would again have to be conquered with sweat and with blood. He was recalled from his musings by the neighbor's voice: "Are you not tempted, too?" she asked. "Would not your driftings end pleasantly at a little farm up in these hills?" Even a drifter realizes that he must give up his job sometime, but it took the Drifter almost five minutes to explain why, in such an event, it would be quite impossible for him to become the owner of any property. "Think, madam," he said, "what would happen: Imagine that I have signed and sealed a contract never to drift any more. I follow your advice about not letting the fields give me any trouble; I am engaged in planting a pine in the northwest corner of my farthest field; to all appearances my life is at last orderly and full of labor; and suddenly a blackbird on the bough of a pine which I, unfortunately, did not arrive early enough to plant, addresses a remark to me which I cannot but think impertinent and then with a flirt of his tail flies out of my sight. Do you think, madam, that any self-respecting drifter would hesitate a single second? Such a challenge could not be ignored. Does that blackbird have to spend his days in planting pines? Does he consider himself bound by any petty hundred and fifty acres of responsibility to remain in one spot? No, no. He can drift where he will and the last person to deprive himself of a like privilege would be

THE DRIFTER"

The Etiquette of Big Business

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I did not chance to be among the fortunate who saw the late unpleasantness between Messrs. Dempsey and Firpo, so, as befits a good American, I hastened to repair the loss at the nearest moving-picture emporium.

It is the middle of the first round. The Wild Bull of the Pampas is on his back uncertain whether it is today or the week after next. Mr. Dempsey crosses his prostrate body and takes up a nonchalant position in the corner of the ring, leaning against the post with arms flung along the ropes. Nonchalant enough, but, as we shall presently see, not without a certain element of watchful waiting. The Wild Bull throws out an arm, turns over, and slowly struggles to his feet as the count creeps up. He rises, still dreaming, hands harmless at his sides, head forward, like a child who stumbles from his nap. Mr. Dempsey becomes anything but nonchalant. He steps forward like a spring unbent, and slams that inquiring head a quite dreadful right, fair on the kisser. Why it was not the end of Mr. Firpo only an inscrutable Providence knows. As Dempsey struck, the audience almost to a man hissed and groaned its disapproval, and it is probable that many in the Polo Ground audience did the same.

The ethical aspects of that wallop detain us. A friend who was with me declared hotly that Dempsey was entirely in the right, and that, to put it baldly, the protestants were boobs. My friend said that it was a fight for the heavyweight championship of the world. It was a serious affair. Everything that either man could do, provided it lay within the rules, was not only his right but his duty. Firpo was on his feet. Firpo was a dangerous man as subsequent history disclosed. When you drive a man out of position in a tennis championship, do you return his weak lob where he can make a recovery? You do not; you kill it, and properly so. Dempsey, as a good sportsman, had no other choice but to take this fair chance to end the fight and defend his championship. For the crowd to howl him down was sentimental nonsense.

All this I granted, except the premise—the premise being that this was a sporting event. It seemed to me, after giving consideration to all the facts involved, that it was not so much a sport we had witnessed as a business enterprise, and thus it fell under the sanction not of athletic rules but of commercial etiquette. The affair, I argued, was on all fours with a major industry. Its legal contracts, percentages, capitalization, advertising methods, balance sheets, profit-and-loss accounts, utilization of by-products (its moving-picture rights, radio rights, training-camp rights, serial and story rights would shame the Chicago packers) placed it in a category of which even Mr. Veblen himself could afford to take notice. And granting that the enterprise was a duly qualified industry and not a sporting event, it followed inevitably that the consumer had a certain place in the premises. Not, God knows, because industry has ever cast a sympathetic eye in his direction, but simply and solely because of the unfortunate law of diminishing returns. Adulterate all that you can get away with, but do not adulterate your market out of existence. Is there anything in modern business more cardinal than this axiom? Good. If Mr. Dempsey wallops a helpless Mr. Firpo a right to the kisser within seventy seconds of the opening gong, thereby removing him a few light-years from space and time, what has a ringside consumer got for his $21.75? A torn collar and a grouch. Consumers have their place, modest though it may be. The sum of money which had been saved against a new winter overcoat is, after all, essential to the continuation of a sound business policy and reasonable levels of profit in this particular industry. Mr. Dempsey as a sporting champion had a right and a duty to paste the dreaming Mr. Firpo, but as a business man, mindful of his market, rights and duties lay elsewhere. It is therefore difficult to compose too great a stricture upon Mr. Dempsey's breach of faith with his customers, and with all the sturdy canons of American pep, salesmanship, and business enterprise. In an unforgivable moment he jeopardized an industry with all its balance sheets, marred capital and by-products combined, and we did well—excellently well—to hiss and groan as the Wild Bull steered for Paradiso.

What, sir, is your mature judgment as to the merits of this controversy?

Hugo Stinnes Denies It

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We received a copy of The Nation of August 29, in which Mr. Jerome Lachenbruch claims that Herr Stinnes controls from 40 to 90 per cent of the press of Germany.

As manager of the newspaper owned by Herr Stinnes I am in a position to assure you that he owns but the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung (published in Berlin and Frankfurt am Main), the Industrie- und Handelszeitung, and the Frankfurter Nachrichten.

Herr Stinnes neither owns nor controls any other daily newspaper.

On Criticizing the President

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: . . . May I say how thoroughly I approve the editorial in The Nation of August 29, On Exalting the President. Whenever we reach the point where the President or any other public official cannot be criticized, democratic institutions will be in jeopardy. Criticism of public officials is essential to the preservation of our form of government. When it degenerates into calumny and slander it is quite a different thing, but we have laws to reach that. The remedy is not suppression of criticism nor suppression of free speech nor suppression or censorship of the press. William G. McAdoo

The Spectator and Mr. Massingham

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It may seem ungrateful and niggardly to complain of a detail in connection with so charming a compliment as you paid the Spectator in an editorial note in your issue of August 1, but since you are so ardent a crusader for the truth, perhaps you will pardon me. In praising the editor of the Spectator for his broadmindedness in publishing articles by Mr. Massingham on "The Other Side," you say, "There is also, of course, the chance, not mentioned by Mr. Strachey, that the enlistment of so brilliant a writer among the Spectator's regular staff may attract new readers." And yet you yourself quoted just above that, Mr. Strachey's introductory remarks to Mr. Massingham's first article where he said: "This is not virtue on our part, but common sense and good business." What else in the newspaper world does "good business" mean if not more readers? Your implication was, I am afraid, slightly typical and certainly unnecessary, as Mr. Strachey would always be the first to admit any mercenary motives. And in fact, he was!

Student Government Grows Up

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The readers of The Nation will undoubtedly be interested to learn of the new and significant role that the students of the New School for Social Research—an institution for adult education—have assumed in the work of education. With the sanction of the board of directors and the faculty they have arranged through their organization, the Students' Cooperative Association, for a course in Nineteenth Century Thought to be given by Morris Cohen, Professor of Philosophy in C. C. N. Y. at the New School this fall. In every respect the giving of this course represents purely a students' activity. The whole responsibility—arranging the course, choosing the instructor, securing the students, and paying the costs—is theirs. This students' course will be supplementary to the regular schedule offered by the school itself.

The students' movement at the New School has arisen out of the idea held by the students and faculty alike that if education is to be a living and creative force in the lives of men and women it must first become the common business and vital concern of both student and instructor.

The first step in giving this idea embodiment was, obviously, the formation of a student organization. This was accomplished several months ago with the definite purpose in view of bringing the students into intimate contact with their subject, instructor, and school activity and also of giving them a voice in the management of their own affairs, or in other words, in their education.

How far such a work will advance depends entirely on our ability to extend the membership of the school among such men and women as are alert to the advantages of the opportunity afforded by the New School. Given a sufficient number of students well organized, their activity can be constantly enlarged until it at last assumes the entire management of the whole business of education. This surely is a high and remote aim. But one closer to hand and hence more important is the recruiting of other students in sympathy with the work that the Students' Cooperative Association of the New School has begun. Therefore, any reader of The Nation who is interested is asked to send his name to the secretary of the Students' Cooperative Association of the New School, 465 West 23rd Street, who will mail him the necessary literature.

New York, September 10 Gustav Peck,
Chairman of the Students' Cooperative Ass'n

Against Gorki

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: To Gorki's testimony on the cruelty of the Russian peasant and your editorial welcoming the truth as a counter-irritant to the "sugar-coated romanticism" to which we have been treated, I wish to add a word.

When the priest Butchkavich was executed in Moscow last spring, the correspondent of a New York paper who had been refused the renewal of his visa, wrote from beyond the border a story of torture preceding the execution which the papers in America copied with avidity. There was, of course, no foundation for the story. But it was many weeks before the real story—the fact that the prisoner was treated with every consideration—was published at all in America.

In Moscow last June I met an American woman who had been at some pains to ascertain the exact facts about the execution. She is the wife of an engineer; together they had spent a year and a half in remote sections of Siberia, traveling by sledge and living for the whole of that time in peasants' houses. Her comment on the false newspaper story comes back to me as I read Gorki's article. She said: "In the first place, it was stupid. One cannot have lived as I have close to these people and believe that it is in their nature to inflict gratuitous cruelties. They are the gentlest people in the world."

She has but two years of residence and observation to offer against Gorki's lifetime. Yet I cannot think her testimony is negligible, especially as it coincides exactly with my own impressions gathered in two brief weeks. I shall not readily forget the way our train was delayed and searched by conductor, brakeman, and customs officials, all evidently peasant boys, not for liquor, guns, or counter-revolutionary literature but for our children who were safe in Paris. Their pictures were on the passport, which was enough, even in view of the parents' composure, to upset the schedule until a bilingual passenger made everything clear. I wondered what chance a Russian immigrant would have had of the same consideration in America.

I cannot feel that Gorki's article has added material light where light is badly needed.

About Art

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Perhaps you will accord an occasional contributor to your columns the privilege of replying in them to what seem to be misconceptions in your editorial of August 22 entitled Confession and Photography. Permit me to confine myself to four points which seem to me to represent the confusion of the editorial in question. You say (1) that "detached observation in the scientific sense" is "a thing impossible in the life of art"; (2) that "the most delicately made photograph gives the quantitative equivalent of that upon which the lens is turned"; (3) that "neither the lens of the camera nor of the eye can omit some things and give the essence of others"; (4) that "art" is "confession and abbreviation," a statement which is followed by the no less dogmatic ones that "all art is symbolic" and that "realistic art symbolizes by essences."

1. Observation is itself detached, unless you mean that the artist's observation is directed toward the particular in an effort to attain to some phase of the object's "whatness," and that the scientist's observation is motivated by the desire to discover laws—also ultimately directed toward the object's "whatness"—your distinction is without meaning. On the ground of relative detachedness, no distinction is to be made between artist and scientist.

2. I don't know what that sentence about the "quantitative equivalent" means, and challenge your writer to show that it means anything.

3. Both the lenses, of the eye and of the camera, can omit some things by the simple expedient of choosing what they shall look at. Or rather, the man with eyes selects what he shall include in his camera's field of vision. This is a very old process, which used to be known by the name of composition—one used by all intelligent photographers, as you could have discovered by inquiring. As for "giving the essence" of things, you make the old mistake of preferring one medium to another. A work gives the essence of a thing, according as the craftsman has intensity and mastery. But, taking you on your own ground, it is unquestionable that the camera can instantaneously record greater detail in a briefer space of time than the hand of any draftsman who ever lived. So if the master photographer comes along, as I believe he has in the person of Mr. Alfred Stieglitz, he can give at least as much of the "essence of things" in his work as a worker in any other plastic medium.

4. As against your statement that art is confession and abbreviation, I have the word of Mr. Gaston Lachaise that art begins with "amplification" (see Manuscripts, No. 4). I don't pretend to judge between your writer and Mr. Lachaise who, I suppose, you will concede is an artist. As to the rest of the muddle about what art is and is not, that may be amusing, if not enlightening, for people who have never looked at a painting or listened to music.

The United States of Europe

By FRIDTJOF TOKSVIG

THE dull air of the conference was tense for a moment. The delegates had ceased their subdued conversation and were now crowded about a speaker: Theodore E. Burton from the United States. He leaned loosely against the speaker's stand and turned his gray face toward a tall, thin man who might have been a clergyman or a school teacher. He began to speak in a characteristic American voice, with marked accent and unexpected volume. If the honorable gentleman from Sweden had wished to embarrass the United States he could hardly have chosen a better method. But perhaps the gentleman from Sweden would withdraw his motion? The tall thin man came forward slowly. The conversation rose again. M. Lindhagen of Stockholm had moved that the conference request the United States to join the League of Nations and aid in the reconstruction of Europe.

It was a significant challenge; would Europe risk a break with America, would the delegate from Sweden withdraw his motion? Someone raised a point of order. The chairman conferred with the secretary general. Then all eyes were turned to the rostrum again. M. Lindhagen was speaking, not in his own melodious Swedish but in the harsher language of Germany, more suited to the obstinate set of his mouth. M. Lindhagen refused to withdraw his motion; the conference was trying to compromise; it was a matter of great principles; you could not compromise on great principles. The distinguished chairman said that the motion could not be placed on the agenda without first being accepted by the Council. How many were in favor of bringing it before the Council? M. Lindhagen raised his hand; a few others followed his example. Six in all. Against? A sea of hands. The American delegation relaxed in their seats, and Mr. Burton caressed his gold watch chain.

Another conference! Genoa, Cannes, Lausanne, and now in August, 1923—Copenhagen. But this was not a conference of Premiers, with the United States as an enigmatic factor. It was the twenty-first Interparliamentary Conference, and all the countries of Europe except Russia and Greece were represented. The United States, Germany, and France met on an equal footing. And two new groups, Esthonia and Ireland, were represented for the first time.

The League of Nations has not made the Interparliamentary Union superfluous, at least not for the time being. The old Union was formed during the World Exhibition in Paris in 1889, and when it was reconstructed after the war the question of its relation to the League was discussed, first at a Council meeting in Geneva in 1919 and later at the first post-war conference in Stockholm in 1921. It was found that there were practical political reasons for maintaining the Union. The Interparliamentary Union includes countries which are not members of the League; it gives a fuller expression of public opinion than the government representatives at Geneva; it has a strong influence on the work of the League; and finally, it furnishes a free and neutral meeting place for the parliamentarians of the world. Even Italy was represented.

The actual proceedings were uninteresting. As the Danish chairman, Dr. Moltesen, made the opening speech an observer from the press gallery could have looked down on a gathering of over seven hundred European, Asiatic, and American delegates. He would have seen the professorial face of Dembinski, the leader of the Polish group; La Fontaine from Belgium, with his great white walrus mustache and bald head like yellow ivory; the bearded face of Albert Thomas from the International Labor Office; Lord Treowen of the English delegation, tall, spare, hook-nosed—a pillar of the Empire; Count Apponyi, a Continental edition of Bernard Shaw without the Shavian insouciance; the expressive features of Senator Douglas from Ireland. Then he would have seen the members of the conference rise to their feet as the chairman mentioned the names of the members who had died, and would have heard him continue in his clear, fluent French:

> Most people shake their heads at statesmen with high ideals . . . but despite the shaking of heads and ironical remarks, idealism shows its power in that both parliamentarians and diplomats must bow before it to get the peoples to follow them. Despite all treason against it, it lives on from generation to generation and is that which ennobles our work. . . . And as I close with the old wish "pax in terra et in hominibus bona voluntas" I declare the twenty-first conference open.

But peace on earth and good-will are often jeopardized when such resolutions as parliamentary control of foreign policy, the treatment of colonial mandates, the question of disarmament, and the position of national minorities are on the agenda. And the conference had not been sitting long before the deadlock in the Ruhr reechoed in a clash between German and French delegates. It was during the discussion of a disarmament resolution proposed by Munch of Denmark that Dr. Berzeviczy of Austria arose and with an arresting cast of his hand declared: "The Allied Powers are arming, but against whom? Surely not against the nations who were beaten in the last war. No, they fear one another!" The stream of feeling rose. The French were not very fully represented at the conference. Indeed, the French and Belgian ambassadors in Copenhagen had refused to take part in the opening festivities. They had feared a clash with the numerous German delegation. But fear of a clash was not enough to prevent it; now the clash came.

Hitherto the members had listened more or less casually and had carried on conversations with each other. But suddenly there was a dead silence, and that mysterious something which in parliaments tells members in the corridors that "something is going on" had collected the delegates in an expectant mass about the speaker's stand. A German member flung the first brand into the assembly. Dr. Ludwig Quidde, author of the anti-Kaiser book "Caligula" and a delegate from Germany, was given the floor. He began in a slow, even voice; an old man with a high bald head and a thin neck inclosed by a three-inch collar. But his voice soon trembled with passion.

> The occupation of the Ruhr is a misfortune for Germany, a misfortune for Europe, a misfortune for the world. I entreat the world to guard against this danger. The League of Nations should be the great fire-engine for extinguishing the danger of fire and violence. Now the house is blazing but the firemen cannot agree sufficiently to put out the fire. There are no warlike tendencies in Germany. Even if Ludendorff and Hindenburg regained power, they would not think of war. Every German would regard such a thought as madness.

> If a strong French delegation had been here today, Germans and Frenchmen could have discussed the questions which lie between them. But there are only two representatives for France and their words can bind no one. I am opposed to German sabotage and German violence in the Ruhr, but believe me, even more frightful things will happen in the Ruhr if France continues her present policy.

The conference was in dignified uproar. Only Lord Treowen and the wooden-faced Japanese seemed unaffected. It was long since the Danish parliament-hall had experienced such commotion; this was more vital than the fall of the price of butter on the English market. A score of different languages blended and rose to meet the ears of the listeners in the galleries. The chairman seemed to have forgotten his "pax in terra et in hominibus bona voluntas" as he tapped the gavel and announced that Senator Merlin had the floor.

This Frenchman flamed in his eloquence. He spoke in a way foreign to a German, a Scandinavian, or an Anglo-Saxon. The smooth French syllables rose to heights of tense excitement, slid down to persuasive entreaty, rolled in threatening sentences. Senator Merlin did not mention the Ruhr. He talked of the policy of France.

> No country in the world loves peace more than France. We have shown that time and time again. I shall name two examples. When the war broke out in 1914, the French army remained ten miles back of its own frontier, and it was not France that entered German territory, but Germany which attacked France. And in 1918 France agreed to make peace with a beaten foe at a time when the French army could have entered the enemy's territory without difficulty. . . .

The goal to strive for was a United States of Europe on the Swiss or the American model by means of mutual treaties of an economic and political nature. M. Merlin ended his speech with a passionate appeal:

> France must have reparations. Over two millions of the flower of French youth have died on the battlefield or as a result of the war. That loss can never be replaced. But when the Germans were driven out of northern France, it was a completely devastated country. Everything above ground was razed and only dust remained. That loss can be replaced. All treaties must be kept and that of Versailles also.

Senator Merlin's speech met with even more applause than the words of Dr. Quidde. And after a few conciliatory remarks by another member, he was answered by Herr Wilhelm Heile. Heile would have delighted the Allied cartoonists during the war. There is a straight line from the back of his head to his shoulders; he is short and stocky and close-cropped. He did not gesture but there was much directness about him. His voice, like the whir of a projectile, compelled silence. He turned toward Senator Merlin:

> The federative idea has long been carried into practice in Germany. German organization bears within itself the fundamental idea of the United States of Europe, and it is this fundamental idea in Germany which is threatened with destruction. Yes, we signed the Treaty of Versailles, but we signed it because we had to, we signed under protest.

And with that instinct for the dramatic ending which like hunger is international, he closed by saying:

> When the French have withdrawn from German soil, we Germans will be the first to extend to them the hand of friendship.

But little by little as the conference went on, the seeming confusion cleared and lines of national policy stood out sharply. And though often only one man spoke from a group his voice was the voice of a nation. The spokesman for the American group said not "I" but "the people of the United States." Some of the nations made no spectacular contribution to the proceedings, though their work in the committee rooms and in the corridors was perhaps none the less effective for that. Such was the English delegation, calm, cool, and reticent. During the Ruhr episode, Lord Treowen was busily occupied in looking for his glasses under a chair. The Japanese said nothing at all during the sittings, but listened very carefully and made many notes. The attitude of three other great Powers could, however, not be mistaken.

Germany has many demands. She wants her minorities in other countries placed on an equal footing with the national population. Said Loebe, President of the German Reichstag:

> Germany is willing to pay. The German people not only want to pay because they have signed the Treaty of Versailles, but because they consider it a moral obligation to pay. However, Germany can only pay within the limit of the possible, and where is that limit? I am in favor of Germany joining the League of Nations. And it is my hope that this conference may help to lift the murk of hate which hangs over the reparations question, and that the day is not far distant when the German people can take the hands of the French people in friendship.

France, said Senator Merlin, stands by the Treaty of Versailles.

> The war is over. In 1871 we paid the five milliards we owed before the expiration of the time stated. Now it is the other way round, and France is in financial straits. There is no talk of wanting to punish Germany but we need reparations, we cannot do without them. Therefore, we have to demand that the Treaty of Versailles be held to.

He regretted that America's attitude was such as it was, but hoped that an arrangement of the American debt would be arrived at. That which France owed she must pay. He appealed once more to America to help Europe.

The United States does not wish to be involved in the difficulties of Europe. Said Mr. Burton:

> There must be a differentiation between debt and reparations for damage. Reparations is a punishment laid upon a beaten enemy, while debt is a voluntary obligation which must be carried out. The United States wishes to help Europe, but cannot as long as these two questions are viewed from the same angle.

The conference closed with a banquet given by the Danish Government. There was no visible international misunderstanding. Wine, good food, and many new friends. Difficulties which are hidden away fester and rot; talking it over is like hanging them out in the air. And the international machinery is becoming stronger. Copenhagen had, for a moment, felt the breath of both the old and the new Europe. It bade the conference farewell with reluctance, and the next morning awoke to greet a new one. Andrew J. Volstead and five hundred anti-alcoholists had come to town.

Revolution in Bulgaria

THE following discussion of the Bulgarian situation, printed in the International Press Correspondence of August 30, reveals some of the circumstances which lie back of the present revolutionary upheavals in that country.

The Government which seized power by the coup of June 9, and the irresponsible factors acting in its service, have flung themselves, with all the forces at the disposal of white terror and reaction, upon the Communist Party, and especially upon those workers and poor peasants forced to defend themselves on the day of the coup d'etat. It is an established fact that the Government places outside the law the working masses of town and country who support the Communist Party, calculating that in this manner it will be able to keep power in its hand. For it is only too well aware that it has not come into power at the wish and with the confidence of the masses of the working people, but has seized power solely by means of a Putsch.

Thus the first step taken by this new government of "law," "order," and "liberty" was to introduce the prohibitive press censorship in the face of the express terms of the constitution of the state, to abolish the right of holding meetings, to throw workers and poor peasants arbitrarily into prison, to torture them there with all the instruments of the inquisition, to murder them with the aid of all the unconstitutional exceptional laws created by Stambuliisky's government for the destruction of the Communist Party. One of these laws is the so-called Robbery law, which permits any man declared a robber to be outlawed, when anyone may kill him and go unpunished. The legal proceedings against anyone accused of "robbery" do not differ in any way from those of the most brutal military "justice."

In Tirnovo over one hundred Communists, workers, and peasants were arrested, and are imprisoned on remand on indictments of insurrection and robbery. In order to extort statements desired by the authorities, the prisoners are bestially ill treated and tortured. At the same time a large number of the leading active party comrades were arrested without any reason, mercilessly beaten in the barracks by the enraged soldiery, and then released at night, so that nobody might see the frightful condition in which they left the barrack yard.

In the village of Kilifarevo about 150 Communist workers and peasants were arrested and shared the same fate.

In the industrial town of Gabrovo over 100 Communist workers were also arrested and ill treated; thirty-six of these have been taken to the town of Sevlievo, in order to be sentenced there for alleged insurrection and robbery.

The Communist Workers' Homes, as well as the stores owned by the workers' cooperative society of Osvobojdenje in that town and other places, have been closed by the police and then looted by the mob under police protection.

On the day of the putsch five Communist leaders were murdered; among these were two local party leaders: Trifon Saralieff, former parliamentary deputy, and Banaiot Zwikeff.

In the town of Garlovo 126 Communist workers and peasants were arrested, and are also still imprisoned on remand for "robbery and insurrection." The imprisoned comrades are incarcerated in rooms absolutely murderous to the health, and they are not permitted to go out during the day for a breath of fresh air. They are cruelly ill treated, and many of them, as for instance Comrade P. Dvorianoff, a former member of Parliament, have been exposed to open insult, being harnessed like beasts of burden to carts and driven through the town.

Sixty-two Communists were arrested in the town of Kazanlik, and have been taken to Stara Zagora. Over 100 poor peasants were arrested in Orchanje, in the village of Moldava twenty-three, and in many other small places all over the country comrades have been arrested, and all share the same unhappy fate.

But it is in Plevna that the white terror holds most brutal sway. There even the most criminal sadism is surpassed. In the town alone as many as 400 Communist working men and women, many of them young comrades, were arrested. In order to extort from them admissions desired by the court of inquiry, they have been subjected for weeks to the most inhuman torture. One of them, Comrade Assen Halatscheff, was done to death by these means. In order to conceal this murder, a clumsy report was officially issued to the effect that the Communists had abducted Halatscheff from the prison during the night, and that he had vanished without leaving a trace! Many of the comrades arrested at Plevna have been so frightfully ill treated that they will be cripples for the rest of their lives, and will never recover their health.

Among the arrested was M. W. Schelpugin, a collaborator in the Red Cross mission in Bulgaria. One morning his dead body was found in a vineyard outside the town, covered with more than twenty wounds.

On July 23, the first trial of the accused took place. Ninety-five Communists had to answer the indictment of "robbery" and "insurrection." The accusation of robbery is entirely without foundation, and was obviously made for the sole purpose of enabling the accused to be condemned under Stambuliisky's exceptional laws. The public prosecutor demanded capital punishment for five of the accused and many years' imprisonment for the others. The comrade murdered in so dastardly a manner by the authorities, Assen Halatscheff, has also been included among the accused, and is to be sentenced for "escaping."

The depth of the class hate and class vengeance of the bourgeoisie may be judged from the fact that the barristers' council at Plevna—including the social democrats—passed a resolution denying the accused legal defense during their trial, and not permitting such defense in any circumstances whatever. Supported by the authorities and the reaction, they demanded that this decision be carried out at all costs, and be made valid for the whole country. An organization was formed by which counsel defending the accused were to be prevented from fulfilling their duty; this organization was joined by the prefect of the Plevna district, Colonel Narezoff, by the public prosecutor Popoff, who participated, revolver in hand, in the coup of June 9, by the social-democratic lawyer, G. Markoff, and by others.

On July 21, a part of the counsel for the defense of the accused consisting of eight Communist lawyers, succeeded in reaching Plevna. They were, however, at once confronted by a delegation of the Plevna barristers' council, headed by the social democrat, G. Markoff, who declared that they must renounce all idea of defending the accused, and threatened to employ force in the event of their insisting. The defending counsel indignantly refused to listen to this impudent piece of presumption on the part of this revengeful band of lawyers. But the attempt to influence them enabled them to inform the president of the court and the public prosecutor in Plevna of this unheard-of impudence, and to protest against it. They demanded the protection of their liberty and of their right to fulfil their legal obligations at the trial. The public prosecutor took no steps in this direction, but the president of the court promised to permit them to plead "freely" at the trial.

But immediately after this, while counsel for the defense were consulting together upon the trial, a police captain forced his way into their room revolver in hand, and, with the aid of a troop of police, arrested them, and took them on foot to the station, whence they were sent under a powerful police escort to Mezdra. Here they were kept shut up in a shed for a day and a night, and then taken to Sofia by a strong escort, to be delivered over to the security police. The arrested counsel for the defense, carrying their own trunks and surrounded by armed policemen, were conducted on foot through the busiest streets of Sofia.

This unexampled scandal called forth great indignation, even among many of the adherents of the Government. The Government found itself obliged to release the lawyers; apologies were even offered for what had taken place, and they were promised that their return to Plevna would be facilitated, as well as the exercise of their right to participate in the trial as counsel for the defense.

The trial at Plevna began on July 23, the whole of the defending counsel being absent. For not only had the eight lawyers in Plevna been arrested, but several other Communist barristers on their way to Plevna had been stopped, locked up, and sent back. Under these circumstances the accused made an oral request, and their counsel a telegraphic one, on July 23, that the trial be postponed until it was possible for counsel for the defense to be present. The court declined to accede to this, and continued proceedings in the absence of the defense! It was not until two days later that counsel for the defense, after being released, were able to return to Plevna and undertake the defense of the accused.

About 400 witnesses have been called up for this trial, 150 of these being subpoenaed by the public prosecutor. The proceedings are likely to last several weeks. This is the first trial in connection with the putsch of June 9; several others will follow.

It is clear to the whole world that in Plevna the proceedings of the court are completely dominated by the class justice of an enraged bourgeoisie, which is preparing the brutal murder of a number of Communists, and severe terms of imprisonment for many other brave men. The verdict of the Plevna court will serve as a precedent for the verdicts to follow in many other towns of Bulgaria against the victims of June 9.

The working class and the working peasants of the whole world must raise a mighty protest, and prevent raging Fascist justice from giving barbarous sentences of murder and imprisonment to the accused workers and peasants in Plevna and all over Bulgaria, and from executing such barbarous sentences. Powerful expressions of protest and indignation must be directed, from all civilized countries in the world, against the executioners of the accused workers and peasants, in order that these executioners and those inspiring them may be forced to desist from their premeditated crime, and restore their innocent victims to liberty.

Secretary: B. LENKOFF

Germany's Capital

IN another column of this issue we publish a review by the noted German economist and statistician, Dr. Kuczynski, of the book on "Germany's Capacity to Pay" by H. G. Moulton and C. E. McGuire. In this connection it is interesting to study Dr. Kuczynski's own proposals for a reform of German finance as outlined in the Manchester Guardian of July 14.

Dr. Stresemann's advocacy of a "seizure of real values" in Germany—that is, in fact, a capital levy—for the purpose of paying reparations shows how German opinion even on the right is at last coming round to the solution proposed more than a year ago by the eminent German statistician and economist Dr. R. Kuczynski. At a meeting held in Paris last year Dr. Kuczynski suggested that he should meet some French economists to formulate proposals in common on these lines. The suggestion was adopted and the conference took place in Paris last November, the Frenchmen present being the well-known economists Professors Charles Gide, Gèze, and Roger Picard, MM. Léon Blum and Renaudel, of the French Socialist party, and MM. Ferdinand Buisson and Gernut, representing the Ligue des Droits de l'Homme. Unanimous agreement was arrived at on a scheme for the payment of reparations by a capital levy on German real and personal property, initiated by Dr. Kuczynski.

Details of the scheme were given by Dr. Kuczynski in his Finanzpolitische Korrespondenz of December 12, but it then passed almost unnoticed, and even the Socialist Party did not take it up or seriously discuss it. Now that the necessity of a capital levy is beginning to be generally recognized, it would seem opportune to call attention to a scheme which, in addition to its intrinsic merits, has the advantage of having been accepted by three of the leading French economists and by representatives of the French political parties of the left.

Its main lines are as follows. The German Government would with the smallest possible delay impose a capital levy to the extent of one-half of all German private fortunes. The levy would be made on all bank-notes, whether issued by the Reichsbank or by the banks of the federated states, government stock, and exchequer bills, by exchanging them for new issues of half their value. The stock of loans issued by the federated states, municipalities, and private enterprises in the interior of Germany would be stamped to the extent of half their value, which would thus be appropriated by the Reich. For every existing share in a company a new share would be issued in favor of the Reich. Half of all deposits in savings banks and other banks would be expropriated, as would half of all mortgages and rent charges. A new rent charge in favor of the Reich would be levied on all real property to the half of its value. Half the proceeds of the levy would be retained by the German Government for the stabilization of the mark and for putting the national finances on a sound basis. The other half would be handed over to the Allies. Since, however, it was considered by those present at the conference in November that German paper money and government stock would be of little value to the Allies, they suggested that reparations in kind should be substituted for these categories of the levy.

Dr. Kuczynski has explained why it is not proposed to graduate the levy. The first and most important reason is that the system of taking half of every fortune, however small, would greatly facilitate collection, make it possible to realize the levy very rapidly, and not give time for people to transfer capital to other countries. For the levy would thus be impersonal; it would be imposed, not on individuals, but on the various categories of property, and no individual declarations or similar formalities would be necessary. Dr. Kuczynski's opinion is that small fortunes in Germany are now of such trivial value that it makes very little difference in practice to their owners whether the state takes half or less. For instance, a fortune of a million marks (£50,000) was not a small fortune before the war, but now nobody could possibly live on the interest of it, or even on an income of a million marks a year.* . . . Most of the former owners of small fortunes have spent their capital long ago and are now earning their living or existing on charity. Moreover, the persons subjected to the capital levy will ultimately lose nothing, but are rather likely to gain, for when the reparations question is settled, the mark is stabilized, and normal conditions are restored the half of their property that is left to them will be worth much more than the whole is worth at present.

Foreigners owning property in Germany . . . would of course be subjected to the levy, since their exclusion would cause tiresome complications. The conference held in Paris in November reluctantly came to the conclusion that there is no practical means of making the levy on property owned by Germans abroad. It is impossible, for example, to compel foreign banks to disclose the amount of the deposits of their German customers.

The sum that could be immediately realized by the levy would not be very large—certainly not large enough to satisfy even a minimum claim for reparations—for the gold value of German property has been enormously diminished. A recent inquiry made by Dr. Kuczynski into the present gold value of the shares in the German limited liability companies has led to the conclusion that it is on an average about one-tenth of their pre-war value. The value of house property has been still more diminished in consequence of the rent restriction law, which has reduced the gold value of rents to less than 1 per cent of the pre-war rates. . . . Agricultural land and houses not let to tenants are, however, more valuable than tenanted house property, and the value of house property in general has not been diminished so much as the rents, because everybody recognizes that it will eventually recover its value, and house property is being bought up by speculators at rates that make it immediately unproductive. Mr. Stinnes, for instance, has acquired a large amount of house property in Berlin, which at present yields no return worth speaking of.

* A million marks is now worth about 6 cents.

As a future asset, however, this charge of 25 per cent on German property would be of great value, and it would be an ample guaranty for an international loan, which would give the Allies immediate cash. Meanwhile they could hold the various shares and securities until the stabilization of the mark and the return of normal conditions had restored them to their pre-war value, as would inevitably happen. The value of real property, in particular, which is artificially kept down, would rapidly recover when the stabilization of the mark had made the repeal of the rent-restriction law possible. As for the mines, they are still worth as much as before the war, and the fourth share in them would be an immediately valuable asset.

The great advantages of this scheme are in the first place that it would ultimately cost the German people nothing, since they, like the Allies, would benefit by the increased value of property that would result from it, and in the second place that it would give the Allies an interest in German prosperity. As Professor Roger Picard has said, it would produce, instead of the present conflict of interests between Germany and the Allies, "an economic and financial solidarity between them which would be the strongest guaranty of good understanding and peace."

¶ Ashes of Vengeance
by H. B. Somerville

A glorious romance of old France, of the age-old feud between the houses of Vrieac and La Roche, and how, out of bondage, arose a great friendship and a greater love.
The screen version of this story, in which Norma Talmadge is starring, is now enthralling audiences throughout the country. Here in its original form, it will open the door of romance to every one who delights in the books of Sabatini, Farnol and the great writers of romance of the past. $2.00 net. Postage extra.

Your New Evening Paper

THE
NEW YORK LEADER

Three hundred thousand organized workers of New York City have embarked upon a glorious adventure.

Just as they have gone into the business of banking and succeeded, just as they have gone into large-scale co-operative and educational enterprises, so now they enter the evening newspaper field in New York with a daily of their own.

They have named their paper THE NEW YORK LEADER and they look upon it as the first step towards a free press in a city notorious for its special-privilege press.

THE NEW YORK LEADER takes over the property and organization of THE CALL and the good will of the former owners of THE CALL as well.

It is the hope of the new management that THE LEADER will be a complete paper, an interesting paper and most important of all an honest paper, faithful to no interests other than the interest of its worker owners in a free press, spokesman for no dogmatic ism but always the resolute champion of labor's struggle for spiritual and economic freedom.

We believe that there will be found a public for such a paper, a public tired of the fiction that passes for news, of the trivialities that fill the old-line papers. If you want a daily paper that attempts to present the significant news of the day in a manner that is neither dull nor frivolous; if you want a paper that is neither cynical nor hopeless but still believes in the capacity of mankind to shape a better world, you will want THE NEW YORK LEADER —every evening.

Will you come with us toward a free press?

NORMAN THOMAS, editor-in-chief.

Multiplying Man-power

To the man with pick and shovel the digging of holes for telephone poles is a slow and arduous task. Under favorable soil conditions three to five holes are for him an average day's work. Under adverse conditions perhaps he can account for only one. When the hole is dug, eight or ten men are required to raise the pole with pikes.

But the hole-borer with derrick attached, operated by only three men, can erect as many as eighty poles in a day—releasing for other telephone work upwards of forty men.

Hundreds of devices to quicken telephone construction, to increase its safety to the employee, and to effect economies are being utilized in the Bell System. Experiments are constantly being made to find the better and shorter way to do a given job. Each tool invented for the industry must be developed to perfection.

In the aggregate these devices to multiply man-power mean an enormous yearly saving of time, labor and money throughout the whole Bell System. Without them telephone service would be rendered neither as promptly, as efficiently nor as economically as it is to-day.

Bare Almond Trees

Wet almond trees, in the rain
Like iron sticking grimly out of earth;
Black almond trunks, in the rain
Like iron implements twisted, hideous, out of the earth,
Out of the deep, soft fledge of Sicilian winter-green
Earth-grass uneatable,
Almond trunks curving blackly, iron-dark, climbing the slopes.

Almond tree, beneath the terrace rail,
Black, rusted, iron trunk
You have welded your thin stems finer,
Like steel, like sensitive steel in the air;
Gray, lavender, sensitive steel, curving thinly and brittly up in a parabola.

What are you doing in the December rain?
Have you a strange electric sensitiveness in your steel tips?
Do you feel the air for electric influences
Like some strange magnetic apparatus?

Do you take in messages, in some strange code,
From heaven's wolfish, wandering electricity, that prowls so constantly round Etna?
Do you take the whisper of sulphur from the air?
Do you hear the chemical accents of the sun?
Do you telephone the roar of the waters-over-the-earth?
And from all this, do you make calculations?

Sicily, December's Sicily in a mass of rain
With iron branching blackly, rusted like old, twisted implements
And brandishing and stooping over earth's wintry fledge, climbing the slopes
Of uneatable soft green!

Tropic

Sun, dark sun
Sun of black void heat
Sun of the torrid mid-day's horrific darkness

Behold my hair twisting and going black.
Behold my eyes turn tawny yellow
Negroid;
See the milk of northern spume
Coagulating and going black in my veins
Aromatic as frankincense.

Columns dark and soft
Sunblack men
Soft shafts, sunbreathing mouths
Eyes of yellow, golden sand
As frictional as perilous, explosive brimstone.

Rock, waves of dark heat;
Waves of dark heat, rock, sway upwards
Waver perpendicular.
What is the horizontal rolling of water
Compared to the flood of black heat that rolls upward past my eyes?

Humming-Bird

I can imagine, in some other world
Primeval-dumb, far back
In that most awful stillness, that only gasped and hummed,
Humming-birds raced down the avenues.

Before anything had a soul,
While life was a heave of Matter, half inanimate,
This little bit chipped off in brilliance
And went whizzing through the slow, vast, succulent stems.

I believe there were no flowers, then,
In the world where the humming-bird flashed ahead of creation.
I believe he pierced the slow vegetable veins with his long beak.

Probably he was big
As mosses, and little lizards, they say were once big.
Probably he was a jabbing, terrifying monster.

We look at him through the wrong end of the long telescope of Time,
Luckily for us.

Peace

Peace is written on the doorstep
In lava.

Peace, black peace congealed.
My heart will know no peace
Till the hill bursts.

Brilliant, intolerable lava
Brilliant as a powerful burning-glass
Walking like a royal snake down the mountain towards the sea.

Forests, cities, bridges
Gone again in the bright trail of lava.
Naxos thousands of feet below the olive-roots,
And now the olive leaves thousands of feet below the lava fire.

Peace congealed in black lava on the doorstep.
Within, white-hot lava, never at peace
Till it burst forth blinding, withering the earth;
To set again into rock
Gray-black rock.

Call it Peace?

Francis Parkman

By CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

SOME twenty years ago Arthur G. Doughty, the new archivist of the Dominion of Canada, and I, the new entrant into the field of Western history, were talking of the doleful condition of history studies in our respective territories. Doughty declared that no real study of Canadian history had been done since Parkman's death, and that the new works appearing were only a rehash of his books. Dejectedly and dishearteningly I admitted that the same was true in the schools of the great American West.

Of course both knew of exceptions to our generalization, but on the whole the study of the history of the vast area watered by the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi was, and had been, apparently in a parlous condition. The genius of one man had raised the shadow of forgetfulness from the past and then darkness seemed to have settled over the subject forever. The general opinion was that further study would yield only diminishing returns. John Fiske voiced the opinion of historians in declaring that Parkman had performed a work which would never need to be done over. So firmly established had the tradition of Parkman's perfections become, that in writing a eulogy in honor of his centenary, thirty years after his death, I find it difficult to emancipate my own mind from the stereotyped opinion and view objectively this man of genius. Time has, however, passed, and it is now possible to obtain a truer perspective than had his contemporaries.

Francis Parkman, by the dates of his birth and death, 1823-1893, belongs in what is known as the "Middle Group of American historians," which occupied the stage from after the War of 1812 to about 1884 when the new critical spirit in historical studies, largely a product of the German seminars and nurtured by our graduate schools, seized the leadership in the field of historical research. In the year 1884 this new spirit, gathering up what was worth preserving of the older school, expressed itself through the formation of the American Historical Association, soon to be controlled by the professional historians of our universities. Professor John Bassett, who has written learnedly and interestingly of the middle group, prefers to assign Parkman to this new school, because, "while he wrote with that fine appreciation of style which was characteristic of Bancroft and the literary historians, his industry, his research among documents, and especially his detachment seem to place him among the men of today."

This opinion of Professor Bassett is a weighty one and should not be lightly disregarded, yet with some mental reservations it seems better to place Parkman squarely within the period wherein he passed his life and explain any superiority over his contemporaries he may have possessed as emanations from his genius and not as anticipations of a period to which he did not belong and within which he would have found himself very uncomfortable.

In the year that Parkman died, 1893, there was published in the Report of the American Historical Association an article by Frederick J. Turner on the Significance of the Frontier in American History. That article was the trumpet call of the new recruits to the army of American historians. A new era had begun. Turner was the chosen prophet to announce its advent. The full force of the new movement required many years to unfold; not even yet has the power of it reached its apogee.

To locate the metes and bounds of the field plowed and planted by Parkman, it is necessary to survey the tracks cleared by these later comers. They are pugnacious of their rights, these Westerners, and are not ready to admit any claim that Parkman, in spite of the Western character of his subject, discovered their particular territory. That territory is the Western interpretation of American history. So overpowering has been the influence of the westward push of population, they claim, that it should form the central theme of our national history. Events such as the French and Indian War, the American Revolution, the War between the States are but mere episodes in the history of the conquest of a continent by men of English speech.

In this new viewpoint the economic forces underlying the historical events are stressed as they never were by members of the Middle Group of historians. At times the Westerners are almost economic determinists.

A third line of development in historical studies is a product of the new viewpoint. The wider interpretation of history has given importance to many classes of source material. Furthermore a public interest in the collecting and preservation of historical documents has been awakened. Instead of placing the onus of the work upon private individuals, public institutions in the United States and Canada, supported by State appropriations, have undertaken comprehensive searching for historical material.

Viewed under the light of modern research with its greater understanding of the fundamental forces of society, its wider field of interpretation, and its more comprehensive search for information Parkman's histories seem very sketchy, his understanding of past events very superficial. Before him as he worked lay hundreds of problems which he never even saw and other hundreds of which he touched only the fringes. A few years ago my own investigations forced me to read all his volumes in rapid succession, on an average one every two days. It was, I acknowledge, a severe test and therefore my immediate reaction was not trustworthy. Still I give it for what it is worth. After the test was completed, my thought was: "This is not history, this is romance, pageantry, story writing."

What was it in Parkman's writing which produced this result? First of all the events which interested him no longer play so important a part in the historical viewpoint of the present day. After reading Monro's "Seignorial System in Canada," it is difficult to understand the contemporary enthusiasm over Parkman's "Ancient Regime." It is really surprising how relatively few pages of the volume are devoted to an analysis of Canadian society under the French. Or, consider how few of the subjects discussed in Beer's "British Colonial Policy, 1754-1765," are to be found even mentioned in Parkman's "Montcalm and Wolfe." Parkman devotes many pages to Sir William Johnson as general and leader of the Indians in war, but only a line in two places to remind the reader that this same Johnson held the more important newly created imperial office of superintendent of Indians in the northern department. Parkman quotes two letters from Governor

Dinwiddie of Virginia to his friend the financier Hanbury of London, but fails to picture in high light the land speculations of these two worthies and their associates which were the immediate occasion of the French and Indian War. George Washington in his first romantic mission to the West to protest against the French occupation of the Upper Ohio Valley is not so much the representative of imperial Britain as the voice of the land speculators of the Old Dominion. Parkman's detailed description of that journey does not leave such an impression on the mind of the reader.

The enthusiastic study of Western American history of late years has revealed many gaps in the narrative of the discovery and occupation of the Mississippi Valley as related by Parkman; yet the discovery of new documents and the more careful examination of known ones do not explain satisfactorily the spotted thinness of his story. This must be attributed in part to his New Englandism, a disease not easily cured even by absence for many years, even generations, from the charmed territory. To Parkman as to the many other New England historians the happenings in their home land, so well known, so carefully studied, loom large on their horizon hiding a view of more distant scenes. The massacre of Deerfield becomes for Parkman an event of such stupendous importance that all the gory details even to the tomahawking and scalping of Tom, Dick, and Harry, and the daily sufferings of Susan on her forced excursion to Canada must be narrated at the expense of curtailing the story of more important but distant events.

The truth of the matter is that Parkman knew intimately only two short periods of Western history, that of the explorations and business enterprise of La Salle and that of the Conspiracy of Pontiac, the Alpha and Omega of his whole work. Of what falls between these his knowledge was not intensive or comprehensive. Of Louisiana he knew relatively little outside of its romantic beginnings; he never understood the importance, and his successors have also missed it, to the southern English colonies that their traders had cemented friendly relations with the Indians of the Old Southwest before the French, thus preventing a control by the latter in this region.

There is one further limitation to Parkman's historical interpretation which should be mentioned. He did his research in the generation which created the religion of Anglo-Saxonism, whose high priest, Edward A. Freeman, traced the apostolic succession of the Anglo-Saxon institutions from their German origin—God save the mark! for the doctrine was a Hun atrocity and was "made in Germany"—down through the ages of English history. It was these same Teutonic institutions that were brought to America and laid the foundations of glorious freedom. Compared with the states founded upon this solid rock of the Anglo-Saxon faith, all other states are like unto Sodom and Gomorrah.

This Anglo-Saxon superiority complex forms the warp and woof of Parkman's thought, and also that of his readers of that time, whose hearts beat responsively to these words of Parkman's announcement of his purpose to write a series of histories devoted to "the attempt of Feudalism, Monarchy, and Rome to master a continent, where at this hour (1865) half a million bayonets are vindicating the ascendancy of a regulated freedom." Many modern American historians may still cling to the belief thus voiced by Parkman fifty years ago, but no one of them would dare be so candidly chauvinistic. Parkman has been universally praised by Protestants, frequently but not universally by Catholics, for his impartial treatment of an alien race with an alien religion; and I think from the religious viewpoint the praise is merited. Being a consistent and conscientious agnostic he strove to be impartial in his attitude toward both Catholic and Puritan; but from the beginning to the end of his career as an historian he clung to his faith in the Anglo-Saxon cult, and thus impaired his own achievement.

But enough of this negative discussion. In celebration of his centenary we want to know what Francis Parkman did accomplish which called from Henry Adams, a much more profound historian than I, the following encomium: "Your book ("Montcalm and Wolfe") is a model of thorough and impartial study and clear statement. Of its style and narrative the highest praise is that they are on a level with its thoroughness of study. Taken as a whole, your works are now dignified by proportions and completeness which can be hardly paralleled by the literary baggage of any older historical writer in the language known to me today."

The development of the American school of history which is called the "Middle Group" would appear inexplicable in consideration of the barrenness of research in kindred fields, were it not that a similar phenomenon was taking place in Europe. It was the natural consequence there as here of the literary and artistic movement known as Romanticism. The same idealistic view of the past which produced Scott's novels inspired Cooper in America. The same forces underlying the work of Von Ranke, Thierry, and Freeman moved the literary and scientific circles in America and drove to their labors Bancroft, Irving, Prescott, Ticknor and was still effective in the lives of their younger friends, Motley and Parkman.

The romantic school, whether German, English, or American, visualized its subject as did the contemporary sculptors or painters; it must be grand in character, a particular event of stupendous import in the history of humanity, wherein were displayed all the complex forces of human nature working themselves out to a dramatic denouement. Thus the inherent artistic possibilities of the subject to be chosen were a matter of deep consideration. Prescott in his conquests of Mexico and Peru, Motley in the struggle of the Dutch against the tyranny of Spain had made happy choices. All the elements of historical drama suited to literary treatment lay in their subjects.

The genius of Parkman consisted in perceiving when still in college that the same qualities existed in the struggle between England and France for the North American continent. And the still greater genius of perseverance was exhibited in continuing his work under the severest handicaps of ill health until it was completed in his sixty-ninth year.

Never has subject been so well fitted to the genius of an historian. Parkman was one of those happy artists chosen by Nature to perform a particular piece of work. He does it as naturally as his garden produced its roses, as a bird sings, or a Raphael paints a Madonna. This naturalness, this production without evidence of effort, is one of the signs of a supreme artist and Parkman was certainly that. He may be happily compared to the ideal Greek who looked out upon his environment, uncontaminated by the thought or products of older artists or philosophers, and joyfully attacked with the freshness of youth the knotty problems of life. The freshness of youth remained with Parkman until the end and gives to all his books charm.

In boyhood he loved the woods and field; to him the Middlesex Fells contained mystery and charm, and the love of nature therein awakened never ceased to be a strong impulse. While he was at Harvard the great outdoors still exercised its attraction over him, and when in his sophomore year the idea of writing a history of the French and Indian War occurred to him, he directed this love of nature in directions to serve his life's work. Following the old trails of New England became his vacation sport. In 1846, when twenty-three years old, he went West to study life on the frontier and in Indian camps along the Oregon and Santa Fe trail. His five months' experience in the Far West he embodied in his first book, "The Oregon Trail," which appeared in the Knickerbocker Magazine in 1847 and two years later in book form.

At this time began the tragedy of his life. His health broke down and never again was he to enjoy a day free from pain. At times he could not use his eyes, at times he could not even use his mind for study. He started the composition of his first history, "The Conspiracy of Pontiac," when five minutes was the maximum of concentration. Under such conditions composition proceeded at the rate of five or six lines a day. Most of his study throughout life was done with the eyes of others; the endless search for documentary material, for which he is so deservedly noted, was frequently carried out by others. All his later books were dictated.

Cut off at an early age from active life Parkman lived in the memories of his youth, and I believe this fact explains the freshness, the youthful exuberance of even the latest work. His ill health made it possible for him to concentrate his mind upon his great subject. He could not afford, nor did he afford, time for diversified reading.

"The Conspiracy of Pontiac" appeared in 1851, and then ill health forbade historical composition for half a generation during which time Parkman found a vent for his ceaseless energy in raising roses and lilies. The Lillium Parkmanni is a monument to the earnestness with which he followed his new calling. His "Book of Roses," which appeared in 1866, is still worthy to be read by the lover of flowers.

From 1865 began the steady flow from the press of those histories which remain even today the greatest achievement of any American historian. First came "The Pioneers of France," then "The Jesuits in America," followed by the other volumes at a rapid rate until his task was completed in 1892. The story of the French occupation of Canada and the Mississippi Valley, the conception of which took place in his college days, was completed after fifty years.

What a picture they present! How they grip the imagination! You may acknowledge, as you must, that there is too much of the fife and the drum, of the tomahawk and the scalping knife, too little of other human activities; you may concede that there is no organic connection between the beautiful scenes he depicts and the participants in the battle: concede all this and still the artistry of it remains; his books have all the force of a Grecian drama. The story is told, and the means he employs are fitted to the end he has in view. It is great literature and within its limits it is great history.

The Promise of Irish Letters

By PADRAIC COLUM

THE great discovery for the last generation of Irish writers was drama; the great discovery for the generation previous was the personal lyric. It seems to me that the discovery for the present generation is the novel and the short story, and that the Irish writers will begin to reveal Ireland in the narrative.

It has been said that a tradition passes with the acceptance of the Free State—the tradition of Kathleen ni Houlihan—and that until another tradition arises there will be a silence in Ireland. This I do not believe. The prestige of the literary movement recruited a great number of young men to literature. For the one who wanted to come to Dublin and write twenty years ago there are three now. They have learned the technique of play-writing, verse-writing, story-writing. They will not go into silence because a Free State has been set up. They will go on writing. And I venture to think that when their writings come to be examined it will be found that they have been perpetuating another Irish tradition, even though the tradition of Kathleen ni Houlihan has lapsed.

I think they will express themselves mainly in the novel and the short story. Novel and short story will come to them as fresh forms, as the drama came to the writers of the previous generation, as the personal lyric came to the writers of the generation before. The reason why the novel in the form it is assuming is new in Ireland can be explained only by a reference to Irish literary history.

The Irish novel had its start in the inauspicious year 1800—the year of the Union. It had its start with the publication of Maria Edgeworth's "Castle Rackrent." In this masterpiece, in which genius of all sorts is shown, a fine start was made. Had Maria Edgeworth herself, had the Irish writers who followed her, been free to exploit this form, Irish literary history, as regards the novel, would not be—as it is—a record of unsuccess.

Walter Scott came along. He wanted, as he declared in the general introduction to the Waverley Novels, to do for another country what Maria Edgeworth had done for Ireland. But he did for the Irish novelists what the elephant in the Indian story did for the nest of partridge that he had come upon. "Poor little motherless things," said he, "I will mother you." And the elephant lay down upon them. Walter Scott created the novel for Europe. It was a novel removed from the raciness and the compactness of "Castle Rackrent"—it was a novel of description, exposition, extended form. The Irish writers immediately came under its influence. They too, going against the racial genius that is for compactness and brilliancy, wrote extended novels full of description and exposition. They had to fall in with the Scott method to get published at all. Carleton did this after the publication of his most original and his only abiding work, the "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," written under the influence of "Gil Blas"; the Banims and Gerald Griffin used Walter Scott's form, too, but in the case of the Banims there was a French influence—the young Victor Hugo, the Balzac of the fantasies, and perhaps Eugene Sue—these influences are shown in the memorable trains of beggars and wanderers that are in the Banim books. And so "Castle Rackrent," which might have stood in Irish literary history as "Dead Souls" stands in Russian literary history, missed having an influence. It was discovered abroad by Turgenev. He once said in an interview that his "Sportsman's Sketches" were written with Maria Edgeworth's Irish stories in mind.

I suppose I should include George Moore's Irish novels like "A Drama in Muslin" and the Irish stories in "The Untilled Field" as among the influences on the Irish novel and the Irish short story in the form it is now assuming. I cannot bring myself to do so: I find in these novels and stories, fine as they are, a curiously alien mind. They were written in a tradition that was passing, and I do not think they had an influence on the Irish who were preparing themselves for the business of writing.

The first Irish novel, as I think, whose form is in harmony with the racial genius is James Stephens's "Mary Mary." With something that seems like the spontaneous invention of the folk-tale James Stephens wrote the first story of Dublin life; then there came "The Crock of Gold," in which he wove together a fresh humor and a fresh poetry, making a story as extravagant as the heart of any story-teller might desire. Then came James Joyce with "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man"—a book that is the equivalent of one of Synge's dramas, with the stories in "Dubliners" that are equivalent to Synge's short plays, and now with "Ulysses" that is no less than a portent. In the meantime James Stephens publishes a book that has a misnomer for title—"Irish Fairy Tales"—in which, in an astonishing way, he recovers the tradition of tenth-century Irish story-telling.

Other writers have arisen who use a form that is in harmony with the racial genius—Brinsley MacNamara, Seumas O'Kelly, Daniel Corkery. Brinsley MacNamara has blown sky-high the tradition of the lovable Irish peasant; he shows you the men and women of the fields and villages in all the harshness and craftiness of men and women who have to wring a living from the soil. Seumas O'Kelly, whose early death is to be deplored, also discovered a distinctive form, and in his books "The Golden Barque" and "Hillsiders" he gives us types opposite to those of Brinsley MacNamara—the quaint lovableness of isolated old men, the quaint charm of forgotten places. His description of Cloon-na-morav in "The Weaver's Grave" and of the two old men who go grave-searching is among the very best pieces of Irish writing. Daniel Corkery, too, has a distinctive form. In his work there is a tendency toward over-writing—not the extravagant heaping-up that there is in James Stephens's work, but deliberate effects. He has written the novel of Irish Catholic mysticism in "The Threshold of Quiet," he has written a book of fine short stories in "A Munster Twilight," and he has written the stories of the war of independence in "The Hounds of Banba."

It seems to me that there will be a new movement in Irish literature—a beginning all over again. The founders are still with us, Yeats and "Æ" and Douglas Hyde. But I think the new writers—novelists, as I hold, most of them will be—will produce work on another plane from theirs.

The Free State will affect literature, most directly, through the protection it will give to Gaelic. A great deal of writing will be done in Gaelic from this time forward. Gaelic has really come back, and the Free State will insure that it stays and spreads through instruction in the schools and through many sorts of state patronage. An Irish government will now take up what societies like the Irish Texts Society have been doing—the publication of poetry, history, and romance from unedited manuscripts. Perhaps we will soon have the anthology of Gaelic poetry that Padraic Pearse projected and in part completed. Such a publication would be a real literary event, and it would have an effect both on the Gaelic and the Anglo-Irish poetry that is being written.

But will there be a modern literature in Gaelic? I am sure there will be. The other day I read in a New York newspaper that the new journal that supports the republican idea in Ireland appears with a watchword in Gaelic. It gave the translation "Rouse up your courage, O Ireland." The watchword came back to me in Gaelic, and I wondered what spell there is in the language that makes the words so different from any literal translation—"Muscail do mhisneach, A Bhanba!" He who cannot hear Geoffrey Keating's line, if he is an Irishman, has missed a great part in the Irish heritage. And so much of the heritage is contained in the very syllables of Gaelic ("Celtic syllables like the rattling of war chariots" as Flaubert noted in "Salammbô") that free Ireland cannot but love and labor in that language.

We may expect the publication of a deal of work in Gaelic. Perhaps among a great deal that will be turgid and naive there will be a little sheaf of verse like Padraic Pearse's "Suantraidhe agus Goltraidhe." We may even have at this moment a notable writer in Gaelic. However, I think that the writer who will produce great work in Gaelic will have to remake the language; he will have to fuse the Munster and the Connacht idioms; he will have to accept and use boldly the "Beurlachas"—the Englishisms—that have come in; he will have to draw from Middle Irish and perhaps from Scots Gaelic. Such a writer might be able to give us what has never been given to us in Anglo-Irish literature—the strange and tragical Irish landscape, the spiritual history of the man whom an unknown sculptor once revealed as The Dying Gaul or The Dying Gael. Only in the book the man with the face on which hard winds have blown, with the eyes that have followed the herds while his hand held the sword—this man, whether in ancient or in modern surroundings, will be shown standing upright.

Poetaster

By BASIL THOMPSON

Born out of time he blundered down the years,
  A laugher in a world of solemn folk
  He thought it all some monstrous bitter joke
And scorned a fool's abandonment to tears.
The chorus of the singing of the spheres,
  The rhythms that the deities evoke
  From winds and waters, mountains, moons, and smoke
Sang in his heart and rang, rang in his ears.

He gathered up these nothings they put by
  And fashioned them to somethings of his own,
His symbols were the symbols of the sky,
  His cadences the fugues the waves intone.
He plumbed the riddle of eternity
  And braved an old impertinence alone.

Short for Buncombe

Bunk. By W. E. Woodward. Harper and Brothers. $2.

BUNCOMBE was the seed from which bunk has grown. Once it may have been a mere gesture of the politician, talking for his constituents in language which would appeal to them whether it meant anything much or not. Now, however, bunk has gone beyond that. It includes the nonsense that mothers tell their children because it is easier to tell than the truth; it includes the windy periods in prayer, the bland pretences of secretaries of state, the hoary platitudes of moralists and educators, the customary assumptions of all the learned trades; it includes, particularly, the claims of advertisers and publicity men and the ideas which they pour into the long ears open to them. What rumor was to the ancients, bunk is to the modern world. It runs like fire among the people, waving the torch of propaganda. When it has ceased to be active, it settles down to a powerful inertia, to the faith that keeps mountains from moving.

Sooner or later, bunk was bound to have its special satirist, and it now has him in the person of W. E. Woodward. His training has been the happiest possible. Immune from birth to the infection of bunk, he has moved habitually among its disciples. He is a business man who can promote a company or charm a Rotary Club. He turns to authorship only after he has got out of an industrial society what he wanted from it: the financial sinews to sustain him while he laughs in public, as he has always laughed in private. "Bunk," his first book, initiates a career which it will be well to watch. There is now a new novelist for intelligent persons to keep up with.

Mr. Woodward is by no means a solemn fellow who has reformed and is smugly advising others to be careful. He is almost as high-spirited as, say, Sinclair Lewis, with a merrier fancy. When he decided to write a novel, he says, he first invented his principal character, Michael Webb, and then turned him loose to gather experience. Michael, after drifting round the globe, becomes a de-bunking expert, a pricker of bubbles, a devastating intellect among contented morons. He writes "The Importance of Being Second-Rate," a philosophical treatise which leads to the organization of Second-Rate clubs all over the country, sees Timothy Bray, who has suppressed "Jurgen," elected Chief Second-Rater of the United States, and is himself expelled from the organization for being no better than first-rate himself. Thereafter Michael has such adventures as a man of his mental girth could have in and about New York, only in the end to get married and thus to get out of the story.

It may be inexperience which has kept Mr. Woodward from telling as straight a story as he might have told. More probably it is his universal curiosity about ideas. Not much concerned with "plot" in any ordinary sense of the term, he has his fling in any direction in which his curiosity takes him. His flings are his strength. How acutely he reasons that William J. Burns is only a character of fiction! How convincingly he reports the dreadful battle in which the Boston Evening Transcript exterminates bolshevism by using the word psittacism! How neatly he sets up his minor characters and then tumbles them over by bringing ideas into play! Indeed, he has nearly as sure a touch with characters as with ideas. No captain of industry in American fiction has been drawn with more insight than here goes into the making of Richard Ellerman. Most magnates in novels are either magnified Babbitts or else stuffed giants. Ellerman has credible dimensions. Around him, at Dobbs Ferry, most of the action of "Bunk" takes place. There he has gathered a diverse group to amuse him while men sweat in his Illinois factories to make him rich. There he extinguishes poor Thomas Houghton Hunter, who has come on with a plan to make Ellerman richer. There he sees through almost everything except himself. Mr. Woodward sees through that.

Mr. Woodward sees, it seems, through everything. Yet he is not merely brash, not merely knowing. He understands pity; he feels beauty. "Bunk" is satire seasoned with wisdom. It is, in its robust way, mellow and learned. And it comes at a happy moment, when bunk, long eminent, is being suspected as it has hardly been for a century. Perhaps not many people will find themselves at home in this novel. It mocks too many idols for that, and it wanders through too many by-paths. But for all those who look twice and think three times before believing, "Bunk" will be a delight.

CARL VAN DOREN

The American Spirit

Studies in Classic American Literature. By D. H. Lawrence. Thomas Seltzer. $3.

A Son at the Front. By Edith Wharton. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

MR. LAWRENCE announces himself as the daughter of Pharaoh who is to rescue the Moses of American literature from the bulrushes of ignorance and neglect. He strips the swaddling clouts from eight American writers and in the process he exposes himself in a most penetrating fashion. His book is honest, independent, and eccentric, a thousand miles, or a million light-days, away from most books of critical essays. Mr. Lawrence's philosophy contains strange and apparently unrelated things, though to him the connections are profound and self-evident. His central theme seems to be an attempt to discover in a few American books and American history some characteristics peculiar to the inhabitants of These States. It is an inquiry which has been undertaken by many investigators, foreign and domestic. The result is almost always the same, that is, no final result at all, no conclusion; and the only value of the quest is the interesting observation here and there on the way. America is not homogeneous enough, and was not in the good old days, for any generalization to hold true. And if a generalization holds good for American character, is it anything but a sweeping idea which is more or less true of the whole human race? I am puzzled by the assertions found on almost every page that "this is American," "especially in America," "the essential American soul," "the best Americans," "as in all Americans," "so typically American," "real American logic," in most cases the characteristic in question being more or less universally human. One is tempted to fall back on Mark Twain's dictum that the only distinctively American peculiarity is a liking for ice-water.

Mr. Lawrence despises democracy as it is manifested in America, and many of us who have lived and suffered under it will bitterly agree that our democracy is not liberty. But there seems to be no liberty anywhere from Ireland to China; our bondage differs in no important respect, not an ounce in the weight of the chains, from the bondage of the rest of the world. And Mr. Lawrence's conclusion, his interpretation of Whitman's democracy, "of souls in the Open Road, full of glad recognition, full of fierce readiness, full of the joy of worship, when one soul sees a greater soul," is a rhetorical climax to which the rest of the book does not clearly conduce.

The core of the book is its tinglingly vital challenge not only to America but to all manner of human quackery and puffery. Because it will offend the patriotic and baffle the stupid, I am inclined to insist on its merits, on its essential wisdom, on its insolent courage, and to leave to others the many quarrels which it provokes. But because I feel its strength I feel all the more keenly its weaknesses, many of which the puniest reviewer can light upon and ridicule, or simply misunderstand, as I do. I do not understand the Laurentian physics and anatomy. What in the world is a "polarized circuit" or a "polarized flow" as applied to a storm in the skies or to a storm in the brain? In what other physiology than Mr. Lawrence's is it written that "the poles of the will are the great ganglia of the voluntary nerve system, located beside the spinal column in the back," or that love is the "prime cause of tuberculosis"? Mr. Lawrence's history is shaky. The motives of migration are complicated and may include a spiritual revulsion against political or religious authority and even some mysterious IT (Mr. Lawrence's mystical capitals outdo Whitman or a Hearst editorial). But the main motive for colonization is economic, the desire to get a better living, to exploit new lands, when life is hard in the old ones. It is that desire which has sent races and individuals across continents and seas. The economic motive is the cause also of revolutions. When the colonies rebelled against the mother country they did indulge in oratory and pamphlets, some of them, including Thomas Paine (not "Tom Payne"), eloquent and idealistic. But the motive was simply practical: to kick out a foreign landlord and tax-collector. Let us alone to manage and exploit this country ourselves. To say that Franklin at the court of France was "contriving the first steps of the overthrow of all Europe, France included," that he was "making a small but very dangerous hole in the side of England, through which Europe has by now almost bled to death," is to rewrite history beyond the legitimate limits of individual interpretation. Mr. Lawrence is not more successful with the earlier history of Europe. "Mastery, kingship, fatherhood had their power destroyed at the time of the Renaissance." Nothing like that happened in Europe. In France, for example, the power of kingship was at its height long after the Renaissance. Mr. Lawrence's modern history is equally whimsical. "The pattern American, this dry, moral utilitarian little democrat has done more to ruin the old Europe than any Russian nihilist." Which is true only in the sense that the Russian nihilist has done exactly nothing to ruin the old Europe.

But Mr. Lawrence is a literary man, not an historian, and his observations on writers and books are exhilarating. His subversions of the highly moral maxims of Benjamin Franklin would have delighted A. Ward, an American writer of the old American stock. The remarks on Cooper are illuminating and wise, especially the paragraphs about Natty Bumppo as myth. Dana and Melville Mr. Lawrence heartily appreciates. Poe he but dimly understands, and he wraps that already vexed soul in more confusion and mystery. If Poe "told us plainly how it was, so that we should know," why muddle his story with baseless conjecture? "Love killed him." So? That is a purely original contribution on Mr. Lawrence's part to Poe's biography. The two studies of Hawthorne are subtle and mainly just, though marred by irritating trivialities: why should Hawthorne, whose gray eyes were so deeply shadowed that several of his contemporaries called them black, appear in Mr. Lawrence's portrait as "a blue-eyed darling"? The essay on Whitman is least satisfactory, and begins with the strangest of Mr. Lawrence's perversities, that Whitman's effects are "post mortem," like the rest of American literature since 1851 when "Moby Dick" was published, and "the Great White Whale sank the ship of the Great White Soul." Whitman is the poet of "the soul's last shout and shriek, on the confines of death." Let who can make sense of that.

Mr. Lawrence deals only with American classics, with the "old people," and does not mention the living by name, except Sherwood Anderson, "who is so Russian"! But it would be interesting, if we could, to turn upon an important living American writer one or two reflections from Mr. Lawrence's glancing and erratic lights. Mrs. Edith Wharton was born in New York. Her father's name was Jones and her mother's name was Rhinelander. She is as authentically American as anybody can be. Like some other Americans she is cosmopolitan in her experience. The knowledge of eighteenth-century Italy which she shows in "The Valley of Decision" is somewhat deeper than that of the American tourists who arouse Mr. Lawrence's wrath, who "have done more to kill the sacredness of old European beauty and aspiration than multitudes of bombs." She is sufficiently familiar with French literature and American history to recognize the irrelevance of this from Mr. Lawrence: "America was not taught by France—by Baudelaire, for example. Baudelaire learned his lesson from America." Why pick out Baudelaire for an example, the most untranslatable poet, who did not learn "his lesson" from America, but did find a kindred spirit in Poe? Mrs. Wharton has studied American people intimately, presumably white people, the moderately aristocratic society of New York, with its tragedies, as in the story of Lily Bart, and in "Ethan Frome," the tragedy of the little New Englander of our time, a tragedy as terrible as that of Hester Prynne.

Mrs. Wharton's latest book, "A Son at the Front," is not her best. It is the story of an American painter in Paris whose French-born son is killed in the war. The boy's mother is divorced from the father and is married to an American banker. Lawrence would love the banker as an occasion to swear about American gold. But what difference is there between American gold and other gold, between a French banker and an American banker? Between a French painter and an American painter? Is the American boy who must have had an "essential American soul" "hard, isolate, stoic, and a killer"—in a time when all Europe was bent on the business of killing? Is not the period after the war, when the whole world went into a bigger and hotter melting-pot than America, precisely the time for philosophers like Mr. Lawrence to distrust generalizations about national characteristics, or at least keep them safely in the past—as for the most part he does—and not extend them into the doubtful indicative present?

There is one phrase of Mr. Lawrence's which applies to Mrs. Wharton's book in a way quite different from anything he intended. Her story is out of date. She evidently began it five years ago and laid it aside until last year. It need never have been finished. The war story with little love intrigues and personal sorrows plotted against that disaster is dead. Perhaps many years from now one greater than Hardy or Tolstoi will make an epic of it. For the present the love story with "news from the front" is staler than the Kaiser's memoirs. And that is why, much as I admire Mrs. Wharton's skill in character-drawing and her impeccable style, I find in her book, as probably Mr. Lawrence would: "Post-mortem effects. Ghosts."

Georg Brandes

Main Currents of Nineteenth Century Literature. By Georg Brandes. Six volumes. Boni and Liveright. $18.

Creative Spirits of the Nineteenth Century. By Georg Brandes. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.

Hellas Einst und Jetzt. Von Georg Brandes. Berlin: Elena Gottschalk Verlag.

GEORG BRANDES is one of the great humanists of the age. Born in a small country, his mind embraced the world. Stern and yet warm, incorruptible by friendship or favor, that mind has watched the varying and tragic fortunes of Europe with a profound understanding, a high and saddened benignity. Brandes has always been a good European. In 1870 he watched with Renan the inevitable downfall of the Third Empire; in 1914 he stood not loosely but critically above the battles; today, in his extreme old age, he proclaims with strong but tempered indignation the sordid machinations by which a group of Powers plunged Greece into disaster and stood by in brutal inaction while Smyrna became crimson with blood and flame.

Yet this man has been neither politician nor even publicist. He has been a critic and an historian of literature. But his art or craft or science has not meant to him the exploitation of technical scholarship, vast and accurate as his learning is, nor has it been an exercise in aesthetic appreciation despite his sensitiveness to the color of prose, the magic of landscape, the cadence of verse. Long before the days of the Croceans he declared all art to be expression, significant and concentrated expression of the entire inner process of civilization. Hence to him the history of literature has been the history, first of fiery and articulate souls, then of the dumb but feeling masses for whom the poets spoke, and so the essential history of mankind itself. His work, then, it is clear, differs wholly from that of the Saintsburys to whom literature consists of a loose series of delightful exercises in mere writing; nor, on the other hand, has Brandes, like Taine or Villemain or even Scherer, permitted himself to be ensnared by a theory, whether pseudo-scientific or nationalistic, that is antecedent to the literary and human fact. The very function of criticism has seemed to him indeed incompatible with such or any prejudgment. "For it is criticism," he declares, "which removes mountains—the mountains of belief in authority, of prejudice, of thoughtless power and dead tradition."

It is well to give his theory of the writing of literary history in his own words. The libraries and universities of the world are crowded with men ambitious to add to the history of literature and quite forgetful of the fact that their labors produce no more than the raw material from which the true historian will some day weave the texture of his work. "I shall endeavor, on the one hand," Brandes wrote long ago, "to treat the history of literature as humanly as possible, to go as deep down as I can, to seize upon the remotest, innermost psychological movements which prepared for and produced the various literary phenomena; and, on the other hand, I shall try to present the result in as plastic and tangible a form as possible. . . . First and foremost, therefore, I shall trace everywhere the connection between literature and life. . . . I go down to the foundations of real life and show how the emotions which find their expression in literature arise in the human heart." He has not, I must add, deceived himself as to the scientific or objective accuracy of the result. He knows with Anatole France that history and criticism, like poetry and music, are but a part of that visionary pageantry by which man makes human and beautiful the naked and unhuman world. Thus at the end of his chief work Brandes makes the crucial admission: "The power which has grouped, contrasted, thrown into relief or suppressed, lengthened or shortened, placed in full light, in half light, or in shadow, is none other than that never entirely conscious power to which we usually give the name of art."

No better time than this could have been chosen to reissue the famous "Main Currents of Nineteenth Century Literature." The work is fresh and strong; it burns with its own fire and light. It does more than that. It illuminates the troubled present. Revolution and devastating war have come over Europe once more. And we find there once more many of the psychological and so literary phenomena that Brandes chronicles of an earlier period. Once more we have the psychology of the émigré, once more the rhetoric of reaction, as in Papini, once more the flight from reality, once called romanticism, now expressionism, once more as in Shelley or the later writers of the Young Germany group, valiant fighters in humanity's long war of liberation.

But I must not give the impression, long as this book has been famous, that Brandes is exclusively kulturgeschichtlich or neglects the vital matter of beauty which is eternal and transcends both the squabbles and the disasters of history. He knows that "nothing formless or only half-formed endures." And he does not hesitate to apply this criterion to so massive a figure as that of Balzac. No English-speaking critic, on the other hand, could show himself more profoundly thrilled by the music of Shelley. And with this blending of sagacity and sensitiveness he produces passage after passage which exemplify the fact which he restates in the preface to his latest collection of essays: "Criticism is an art, though it is not usually mentioned as one of the fine arts." Among such passages in the "Main Currents" it is worth while pointing out the exquisite description of Thorwaldsen's Night and its alienation from the gloom and splendor of the Greek vision, the direct appeal to experience in the analysis of the romantic attitude to nature, the brief but stirring parallel between Shelley and Novalis, the serene appreciation of Landor's Attic prose, the human warmth, sympathy, insight of the account of George Sand, the lucid and unfaltering discrimination between what is meretricious and what is for all time in the poetry of Heine.

It must be remembered finally that the works of this humanist and critic come to us under the heaviest of all literary disadvantages. From the point of view of vision and wisdom, of tolerance and breadth, it has, no doubt, been of the highest service to him to be a Jew and a Dane. But who, as he once asked not without a touch of bitterness, reads Danish? The English translations are accurate enough, but both slack and pedestrian. There can be little doubt but that, in their original tongue, his books display in style and structure a measure of that creative beauty which he has seen so clearly in the works of others, with which, in the books of so many poets in so many lands he has lived so closely and so long. ## Poets and Wits

Harmonium. By Wallace Stevens. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.
Less Lonely. By Alfred Kreymborg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.
Whipperginny. By Robert Graves. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

MR. STEVENS'S most famous poem, Peter Quince at the Clavier, appeared in "Others" as long as seven years ago, and he has continued ever since to dance like a tantalizing star through magazines and anthologies. But there was no volume until now. While some of his admirers called for one rather loudly, the rest were content that Mr. Stevens should exist in bright fragments, being afraid, perhaps, that he might not glitter in the bulk. "Harmonium" will dissolve their doubt, for it places its author high among those wits of today who are also poets—T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, Maxwell Bodenheim, Alfred Kreymborg, William Carlos Williams, Aldous Huxley, Sacheverell Sitwell, and Robert Graves.

His wit, of course, has nothing of the Augustan about it. It is not clear; it is not the expression of common sense. It is tentative, perverse, and superfine; and it will never be popular. What public will care for a poet who strains every nerve every moment to be unlike anyone else who ever wrote; who writes a remarkable spiritual biography no line of which is transparent and calls it The Comedian as the Letter C; who writes not about a blackbird but about Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird; who gives his pieces such titles as Le Monocle de Mon Oncle, Hibiscus on the Sleeping Shores, Homunculus et la Belle Etoile, The Emperor of Ice-Cream, Exposition of the Contents of a Cab; and who offers this under Bantams in Pine-Woods?

> Chieftain Iffucan of Azcan in caftan
> Of tan with henna hackles, halt!
> Damned universal cock, as if the sun
> Was blackamoor to bear your blazing tail.
> Fat! Fat! Fat! Fat! I am the personal.
> Your world is you. I am my world.
> You ten-foot poet among inchlings. Fat!
> Begone! An inchling bristles in these pines,
> Bristles, and points their Appalachian tangs,
> And fears not portly Azcan nor his hoos.

Mr. Stevens will never be much read. But some day there will be a monograph on him and his twentieth-century kin who ranged their restless faculties over all the deserts and hill-tops of the world to inaugurate a new era of what Dryden once called "wit-writing"—an era which may be short and may be long.

That monograph will pay particular tribute to the pure phrasing of Mr. Stevens, to his delicately enunciated melody, his economy, his clipped cleanliness of line, his gentle excellence. And it will not be wrong if it finds him more durable, even with all his obscurity, than much of the perfect sense and the perfect rhyme that passed for poetry in his day; if it represents his work as drifting permanently, like frozen chords, through certain memories—the overtone of our droll, creedless time.

It was Mr. Kreymborg who introduced Mr. Stevens into "Others," and the two names are often mentioned together. But Mr. Kreymborg is not the poet that Mr. Stevens is, whatever else he may genuinely be. Both men write nonsense, but the pages of Mr. Kreymborg lack tension and vibrancy, and so cannot appeal to the ear. Nothing shapes itself in the memory; we do not recall one line. Mr. Kreymborg is naive and charming, and he is an agreeable satirist in prose. In the first and fourth poems here he has recognized some pretty identities between fish and men, between needles and rain. But he develops them with a drawl that has nothing to do with poetry, however characteristic of himself it may be. The new sonnets from Italy have a modicum of melody inescapable in the form; they are not otherwise distinguished.

"Whipperginny" is the fourth volume of Mr. Graves's warm and witty verse to appear in America, and it is one of the best. It represents no marked advance in ability, perhaps; yet it convinces us that Mr. Graves is continuing to experiment and therefore to grow. He does not intend to die like the Unfortunate Artist for whom he writes an epitaph:

He found a formula for drawing comic rabbits:
  This formula for drawing comic rabbits paid,
So in the end he could not change the tragic habits
  This formula for drawing comic rabbits made.

He meant what he said in his recent book, "On English Poetry"; he will never publish a poem which has not grown from some psychological experience, which in a way does not write itself out of some twist in his own mind. His mind has many twists. It is a curious mind. And the possessor of it knows how to write. Not a few poems in "Whipperginny" are very bad, but not one of them is dull. Mr. Graves is best at quatrains, which he keeps piquant and surprising because he keeps them full of ideas. "The General Elliott" will be familiar to those who read the analysis of it in "On English Poetry." The Technique of Perfection is a complete commentary on the Christian ideal in thirteen quaintly ironic quatrains. And there is a funny epigram on one of the poet's ancestors, not to speak of half a dozen touching and beautiful love-poems. Mr. Graves is establishing himself.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Great Anti-Imperialist

The Life of Sir William Harcourt. By A. G. Gardiner. George H. Doran Company. $12.

WHAT gives Harcourt's career its special significance today is his attitude to imperialism. British Liberalism is sick—in the opinion of many, sick unto death. Whatever may be the regimen needed to restore it to sound health, there can be no difficulty in the diagnosis. It is clear enough now that the malady began when the party gave hospitality to the imperialist germ. If it had remained faithful to its old motto of "Peace, retrenchment, and reform" it would have been spared the ills of which it has lately been the victim, and the history not only of the party but of the nation itself would have been very different. In the light of what has happened since his day Harcourt's career shines with a brighter luster. This biography shows that his failure to attain to the premiership was due not, as frequently alleged, to the difficulty of his temper but to his taking what was at the time the unpopular side on the issue that was rending the Liberal party at its center. At the moment, Rosebery and his followers triumphed, but their success meant the temporary disappearance of the old Liberal traditions and the committal of the party to the disastrous policy of balance of power and continental entanglements. The event has already amply vindicated the wisdom of Harcourt's judgment.

These volumes tell for the first time the full story of the struggle unceasingly waged by Harcourt within the cabinet against the new and fashionable cult. "Ever since the Crimean days," says Mr. Gardiner, Harcourt was "unfaltering in his attachment to the policy of peace as the chief interest of the country. He opposed intervention in continental affairs, except when that intervention was directed toward the attainment of a common European policy, thought that the country already had more colonial responsibilities than was good for it, resisted provocative expenditure on armaments, which he rightly regarded as one of the roots of international distrust, had long ago nailed his colors to the mast of the Blue Water School, and hated jingoism and its 'prancing pro-consuls' in all their manifestations." He belonged to the old school of Cobden and Gladstone, and never succumbed to the fascination of Rosebery's "glittering personality." During his leadership of the House of Commons his chief anxieties arose from the persistent attempts of the Foreign Office to carry out, without even advising him that they were in train, policies of which he heartily disapproved. "The cornerstone of Harcourt's Liberal faith," says his biographer, "was the love of peace. Himself the most gladiatorial of men in the sphere of intellectual combat, he loathed war as the denial of the sanity of human relationships. It offended him both by its unreason and its inhumanity." Though hampered by advancing years and failing health, he did what he could to avert the Boer War, and in his last days in Parliament he offered a strenuous resistance to what he regarded as "the great back-wash of post-war reaction."

Closely allied to his anti-imperialism was his devotion to the cause of sound finance. Few chancellors of the exchequer have deserved as well of their country. His death duties budget opened a new era in financial reform. He exercised the wholesome tradition of Treasury control over the spending departments with merciless and masterful insistence, and conducted his controversies with their chiefs with consummate skill and unwearied industry. His last great speech in the House of Commons, a fitting epilogue to his career, was an exposition of his favorite text that "a spendthrift nation means a miserable people."

If only for the light it casts on these two great questions—imperialism and public finance—this biography might easily claim to make a valuable contribution to the history of the period. But what makes this biography most attractive is its picture of the man himself. The big, burly, commanding figure so familiar to his contemporaries lives again in its pages. We are reminded that Harcourt's earliest reputation was gained not as a politician but as an expert in constitutional and international law. He came first into national prominence through the powerful series of letters he wrote to the Times, over the pseudonym of "Historicus," on the various delicate juristic questions arising out of the American Civil War, from the recognition of the belligerency of the South to the launching and equipment of the Alabama. One rises from a study of the chapters on this subject with a conviction that Harcourt's services to a good Anglo-American understanding have not yet received adequate recognition on either side of the Atlantic. While, however, his eminence as a jurist impressed the members of his chosen profession—it was attested not only by his successes at the Parliamentary Bar but by his appointment as the first Whewell Professor of International Law at Cambridge—it was as a parliamentary debater and leader and a speaker on the public platform that Harcourt became most widely known to his fellow-countrymen. Before everything else he was "a House of Commons man," and his devotion to that House was largely responsible for his refusal of an offer of a peerage on the occasion of King Edward's coronation. It was as a great House of Commons man—"one of the greatest parliamentary figures we have known in our experience"—that his memory was especially honored by Lord Balfour. After exalting his great powers in debate, his unequaled knowledge of parliamentary procedure, and his rare intellectual gifts, this distinguished leader of the opposite party declared that he possessed also in a supereminent degree the quality which can only be described as "personality." "Whether Sir William spoke or was silent," said Balfour, "no one could forget for a moment that he was present."

"His vigor and vitality were extraordinary," testifies Sir Laurence Guillemard, who was for ten years Harcourt's private secretary at the Treasury. "They were to scale with his enormous frame. When he was in the vein, his talk was burgundy to other people's claret; when he was well, he made other people seem feeble and anemic; when he was ill, he was ill with all his might, and resorted to Gargantuan remedies." Indeed, if one wished to describe Harcourt concisely, one would need only to say of him that in every sense he was a big man. "The vast contours of his personality," says his biographer, "did not fit themselves easily into the small conventions of things. He needed a free air and ample room for his large movements. He bulged over enormously into the world of considered etiquette. He was himself, Harcourt, large, arrogant, joyous, ebullient as a gale from the West, and as hard to confine within the narrow limits of artificial decorums." It was characteristic of him that he smoked only fat cigars, and that he consumed them in vast quantities.

Mr. Gardiner successfully meets the common charge that Harcourt was consumed with ambition and jealousy. If so, he would not have exerted himself, as he did in 1886, to keep within the ranks of the Liberal party his most dangerous rival to the succession, nor would it have been possible to say of him that "he was never more industrious in his parliamentary labors, or more tireless in service for the causes to which he was devoted, than when, grown old and with heavy private burdens suddenly thrust upon him, he had no reward to look for except the satisfaction of his sense of what was due from him to his country."

English Liberals have had good reason to lament the ill fate which recently removed Mr. Gardiner from the editorship of the London Daily News, where for so many years he had given such brilliant evidence of his journalistic ability. It is some compensation that the leisure he has thus acquired has given him the opportunity of writing this admirable memoir—a book which easily stands in the front rank of the biographies of the year.

Can Germany Pay?

Germany's Capacity to Pay. By H. G. Moulton and C. E. McGuire, with the aid of the Council and Staff of the Institute of Economics. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $2.50.

IN establishing the Institute of Economics, the Carnegie Corporation declared that "in committing to the trustees the administration of the endowment of the Institute of Economics, over which the corporation will have no control whatsoever, it has in mind a single purpose—namely, that the institute shall be conducted with the sole object of ascertaining the facts about current economic problems and of interpreting these facts for the people of the United States in the most simple and understandable form."

In preparing the first volume of the institute's publications, Moulton and McGuire have perfectly lived up to the standard proclaimed by the Carnegie Corporation. Their sole object evidently was to ascertain the facts and after having done so they wrote the first thorough study on the reparation problem, in the most simple and understandable form.

What has Germany paid? Allied and German estimates or calculations of the reparation payments already made are widely divergent. The Reparation Commission acknowledged receipts to the amount of 8 billion gold marks while the German Government contends that it should be credited with 44 billion gold marks. Moulton and McGuire, after an impartial analysis of the available data, arrive at the conclusion that the tangible values surrendered by Germany to the Reparation Commission aggregate between 25 and 26 billion gold marks. In making this estimate they do not credit to Germany, for instance, the 11.6 billion gold marks which Germany claims to have "paid" to the Reparation Commission by ceding, on the request of the Allies, the loans she had made to her war-time associates, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. Moulton and McGuire do not credit these securities to Germany because they are not tangible values, but they think that, while these securities are not much worth at present, "they ought in fairness to be recorded now at a nominal value of at least 1 gold mark, subject to such ultimate revision as the future may warrant." Another big item which Germany includes and the Reparation Commission excludes consists of 11.7 billion gold marks of property of German citizens in foreign countries which has been seized and liquidated by the Allied governments. In this case, Moulton and McGuire share the viewpoint of Germany, since at the time of its seizure this property was yielding interest and profits to German citizens and its loss undeniably means a net reduction in the income of the German people. As, however, there is a possibility that Germany will get credit for as much as 1.5 billion gold marks for property returned by the Alien Property Custodian of the United States, they conclude that Germany's ultimate loss in this connection will be about 10 billion gold marks and therefore credit Germany with this sum. They also approach the German viewpoint as to the principles of valuation which should be used for the deliveries in kind. In general, it appears that the Allies have taken, as the value of a commodity, the lowest estimate of its worth from the point of view of immediate marketability—that is, the price at which it could be liquidated at forced sale. The German principle, on the other hand, appears to be one which considers each piece of property as part of a going concern, with a value much in excess of what could be realized at auction. Moulton and McGuire say that the German principle is obviously more nearly in accordance with accepted fiscal, commercial, and legal practice. The British and French governments valued the ships destroyed by Germany at a figure representing their actual worth in the carrying trade; and they computed the values at war-time prices. It is not consistent, therefore, to contend at the time of the shipping depression of 1920-21, when the Reparation Commission made its valuation, "that ships delivered during the boom period of 1919 were not worth much." Germany had estimated the value of the merchant marine surrendered by her at 5¾ billion gold marks; the Reparation Commission had credited her with only ¾ billion gold marks. Moulton and McGuire consider "3.5 billions as the very least value to Germany which these ships could have had at the time of delivery."

How has Germany paid? A nation cannot pay foreign obligations unless that nation is able to muster an excess of exports of goods and services over imports of goods and services. Germany, however, had at no time since the war an exportable surplus available for reparations, but instead a cumulative deficit of approximately 10 billion gold marks. She could temporarily make reparation payments in spite of this huge deficit in her international trade and financial account (1) by the sale of the remnants of German foreign investments; (2) by the sale of paper marks to speculators in foreign countries; and (3) by the sale to foreigners of shares of stock and property in Germany. Moulton and McGuire accept the official German estimate according to which 1 billion gold marks have been derived from the liquidation of foreign investments still held at the end of the war; they accept the estimate of Keynes that paper marks to the extent of 8 billion gold marks have been sold to foreigners since the war, but they reject his erroneous estimate that only 1 billion gold marks have been realized from the sale to foreigners of domestic property within Germany and show that these investments amounted in reality to at least 8 billion gold marks—one-half of which may have been paid with paper marks.

What can Germany pay? The liquidation of former German investments abroad is practically complete; the sale of paper marks to foreign speculators and of German securities and German property to foreign investors does not yield any more essential returns; in the future, Germany could meet reparation payments only by an excess of exports of goods and services over imports. Moulton and McGuire are pessimistic as to the possibilities of such an excess, because, according to their estimate, Germany's imports must amount (at present prices) to not less than 14 billion gold marks, if the present German population is to be permitted to survive and to work at pre-war efficiency, if Germany is to regain her export trade.

Moulton and McGuire are certainly right. Germany can in the long run pay reparations only by exporting more than she imports and she will not export more than she imports—if every farmer, every manufacturer, every merchant continues to carry on his business as he pleases, just as he did in pre-war times and ever since. But the productive efficiency of the German people and the surplus of exportable goods might be greatly increased by replacing anarchic through regulated production. This possibility, which has not been considered by Moulton and McGuire, would, it is true, not have very much effect as long as the export markets for German goods are curtailed by the general impoverishment of Europe, and still more so by the erection everywhere of tariff barriers.

"One can find no more striking illustration of human fatuity than the demand on the part of the Allied countries that Germany must make vast reparation payments and the simultaneous erection of tariff barriers, the result of which is to make such payments impossible. The tragedy is that even yet few people realize that any inconsistency is involved."

It is to be hoped that the courageous book of Moulton and McGuire will have the result that the statesmen of the Allied countries at last will realize this inconsistency. The World War has not yet been followed by a World Peace. There can be no World Peace without a fair solution of the reparation problem. There can be no fair solution of the reparation problem unless German goods are welcome on all the markets of the world.

Giovanni Verga

Mastro-Don Gesualdo. By Giovanni Verga. Translated by D. H. Lawrence. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

WHEN Giovanni Verga died in 1922, aged eighty-two years, he was the most famous and least-read novelist in Italy. Indeed, it is probable that he had more admirers and fewer readers than any famous writer of his time. His career was unique, for in the first ten years, from 1866 to 1876, he was a successful and popular author of novels in the manner of Octave Feuillet, which, to this day, far exceed in sales the later and important works on which his permanent fame must rest. Then he published the volume of short stories containing "Cavalleria Rusticana," and had the sardonic pleasure of seeing that work become known all over the world as the more or less anonymous libretto of Mascagni's opera. The following year his masterpiece appeared, "I Malavoglia," and seven years later, in 1888, came "Mastro-Don Gesualdo." These were announced as the first two volumes of a pentalogy with the general title of "The Defeated," but the third was never finished, and the fourth and fifth volumes, so far as is known, were never written. Verga's literary life may be said to have ceased thirty-four years before his death. During that time his youthful novels were in every bookstore and railway newsstand, but the two greatest works of fiction in Italian literature since Manzoni lay neglected, except for the praise of the critics, beginning with Croce, who recognized what their predecessors in the eighties had been too blind to see.

Verga's fame abroad has followed very much the same course. In spite of the efforts of Edouard Rod, who translated "I Malavoglia," the book had no success in France. In America the novel appeared in 1890, under the title of "The House by the Medlar Tree," with an introduction by Howells. This English version is far from satisfactory, but according to Verga it sold well enough to induce an English publisher to make an agreement for "Mastro-Don Gesualdo." I can find no record of that translation, so it seems the honors go to Mr. D. H. Lawrence for introducing this novel to the English-speaking public—thirty-five years after its first publication! Yet, in those mid-Victorian (metaphorically speaking) American eighteen-nineties, "I Malavoglia" was available in English nine years after its appearance in Italy. Some day, when we have recovered from our delight in our own progressiveness, someone will point out all that was done in that benighted era to bring the literature of continental Europe within the reach of the American public. Meanwhile it is interesting to note the parallel between the fate of Verga's work in his own country and in this. One thing, however, must be said at the outset: the translation of "Mastro-Don Gesualdo" is far superior to that of "I Malavoglia." Verga is an exceedingly difficult author to "get" in another language. His use of Sicilian dialect is discreet and effective, but he adapted Italian to the rhythms of Sicilian, its turns of speech, very much in the way Synge gave English the flavor and tang of Irish. Nothing of this was in "The House by the Medlar Tree," which was also prettified and bowdlerized; there is a great deal of it in this version of "Mastro-Don Gesualdo," which is one of the best translations I have seen for some time. We have too many translations by translators and not enough by men of letters.

The second volume of "The Defeated," like the first, is a vast picture of Sicilian life, but now it is not the ruin of a peasant family, as in "The Malavoglia," but the disintegration of the middle class that Verga has studied, destroyed, when it emerges as wealthy peasantry, by contact with the ruined nobility. Gesualdo Motta is a self-made man who has accumulated his fortune slowly and painfully, with all the pertinacity of those who are close to the soil and who struggle with the forces of nature. The time has come for him to move definitely out of the sphere which has been his for generations, so he marries the daughter of a penniless family of nobles, who thus acquire his wealth and get rid of the problem presented by a girl who has given herself to a man of her own class but cannot marry him because she has no dowry. The marriage, naturally, is a failure, and the child that is born to this ill-matched couple does not redeem it. Gesualdo concentrates upon Isabella his frustrated hopes, but the more he gives her the less she is his, for he provides the education, the luxuries, the ease, which are the essence of her aristocratic being. She is her mother's child not his. She marries into her own class, moves off to the city, and lives in ducal splendor remote from this rugged old man. Her mother dies and Gesualdo is left alone to witness the crumbling away of his own fortune, and the disruption of the whole social order which had seemed as immutable and eternal as the land and the succession of the seasons.

His own life is bound up with that of the period, which is the middle of the nineteenth century, and the political movements of the time, the revolutions of 1820 and 1848, have their strange repercussions in that remote Sicilian village where the scene is laid. The peasants are in revolt against him; he is old and sick and has no bond of affection with a living soul except Diodata, once his servant and the mother of his children, whom he had to dismiss in order to make his way in the world. Like a wounded animal he bears his sufferings, suspecting those who would help him, filled with atavistic superstitions concerning the wiles of doctors and the peasant's distrust of medicines because of the money they cost. Finally he sets off for Palermo to live with his child. The magnificence of the palace overwhelms him, the extravagance and luxury break his heart, as he thinks of the good land that is being squandered, the insolence and number of the servants terrify him. He takes refuge in an isolated apartment in that great house, watches from his window the frittering away of all that his labors built up, reads in his daughter's eyes a misery comparable to his own, and knows that her marriage and life have been defeats as surely as his.

The final pages in which the death of Mastro-Don Gesualdo is described are among the most powerful in modern literature. Balzac never surpasse dthem in "Père Goriot," and it is arguable that, on the whole, Gesualdo is a finer, a more complete conception of the type than Balzac's. Verga succeeds in conveying the tragedy of this central character with marvelous poignancy, but, at the same time, he never loses sight of the vast social drama of which he is an infinitesimal part. Mastro-Don Gesualdo is the peasant in his relation to the land, man the acquisitive animal in relation to property, and within these two limits Verga shows us the whole gamut of human experience. Verga was born in the same year as Daudet and Zola, his best work was contemporary with that of Maupassant, and with all three he has been compared by the historians of naturalism. He is not dwarfed by the comparison, for his short stories hold their own even with "Boule de Suif," and neither "L'Assommoir" nor "Le Nabab" equal their Italian counterparts, "I Malavoglia" and "Mastro-Don Gesualdo." Ernest Boyd

History of Painting

The Early Northern Painters. Their Art and Times as Illustrated from Examples of Their Work in the National Gallery, London. By Mrs. C. R. Peers. The Medici Society.

A History of Italian Painting. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

As a guidebook for a casual visitor who is not an art student to a particular section of the English National Gallery Mrs. Peers's book is as good a companion as one could wish to have. It is chatty, informing, and pleasantly discursive. It makes no pretense to any critical estimates of the works of the early Flemish, Dutch, and German painters with which it deals, because that was not the intention of the author in writing the book. As with her previous volume on "The Early Italian Painters," Mrs. Peers deals with the Northern primitives for the purpose of using their paintings as illustrating the life and times in which they worked. From the pictures in this gallery by Jan van Eyck, Robert Campion, Roger van der Weyden, Peter Christus, Dirk Bouts, Hans Memling, Gerard David, Joachim Patinis, Quinten Matsys, Jan Gossart de Marbuse, Lucas Cranach, Albrecht Dürer, and Hans Holbein she selects the material for reconstructing the social life of their times and ingeniously suggesting their points of view. At the same time she takes occasion to relate the more important facts in the lives of the artists and the historic events which form the subject matters of their paintings. Of the sitters for the portraits executed by these painters she gives interesting biographical information and anecdotes. The book is a book of facts, not of values. It is a book of information, primarily, and only secondarily of education. As such it is both well written and well illustrated.

Professor Mather's book on Italian painting is of an entirely different character, both in matter and manner. It is a book for the art student and the art connoisseur. It is criticism in the constructive sense of the word, founded on an estimate of personal acquaintance with the works of the artists and a really sane independence of judgment. It is especially to be commended in that it develops the progress of painting in Italy as an expression of its national life and as a flowering of its aspirations. Students who may find the works of Crowe and Cavalcaselle and Berenson somewhat difficult reading will welcome Professor Mather's most helpful and illuminating analyses, which are the ripe fruits of a sympathetic appreciation of the artists as well as of a vital understanding of the times in which they lived and labored. His treatment of Masaccio is as fine an exposition as has been written of this original force in the world of art, which brought about an entire change in the artist's expression of his relation between the world of his imagination and the world of reality.

Professor Mather modestly claims that his book is for the beginner. While it is true that he omits, as he says, whatever might confuse the novice, and avoids controversial problems which might puzzle the reader unacquainted with the originals, he does set down judgments which demand for their acceptance a knowledge which few beginners possess. Had the illustrations in the book been as fulfilling as his descriptions, even the beginner could have followed the reasoning and embraced the conclusions. Unfortunately the reproductions of the paintings described are of so poor a quality both as photographs and printed work that many of them fail to respond to the author's demands on them. The moral may be pointed, but the tale is not adorned. They fail to make good the enthusiasm of his descriptions. Apart from this defect, for which Professor Mather cannot be blamed, the book as a handy guide to the study of Italian painters from Giotto to Domenichino, is indispensable to every student of their art. A valuable feature is the information given in notes as to the best authorities to be consulted for further reading and study. Temple Scott

An Italian Humorist

The Late Mattia Pascal. By Luigi Pirandello. Translated by Arthur Livingston. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

A JOCOSE Italian comic opera, sung by the uproariously drunken inmates of a madhouse. Such is not Mattia Pascal in plot; it is certainly Mattia Pascal in spirit. The fevered Pirandellians never talk—they mutter, they hiss, they scream; they never walk—they bolt, they gallop, they spin. True, the burrowing thief Malagna, the acrid Aunt Scolastica, the frantic mother-in-law Pescatore have their rational intervals. But it is the rationality of the bedlam Epicurus, who loudly protesting that his diet will be only melted pearls, nevertheless ravenously devours his dinner of plebeian pot-roast. In a long preface the author proves, by a series of newspaper clippings, how the human beings of fact sometimes act as do his creatures of fiction. Granted. Yet does that prove them any the less insane? It is superfluous labor. No excuse is needed for madness so droll, so merry, so exhilarating.

Poor haphazard, philosophic Mattia of the cock-eye! Tortured by a mooning wife and a screeching mother-in-law, he reads on a train the fervid story of his own tragic suicide in a mill-flume. The erroneous identification is the key to his freedom. The barber shaves him close, he buys a pair of thick blue glasses; thus simply he buries Mattia Pascal, and a new entity, Adriano Meis, is born. Too soon Adriano finds absolute freedom to exist only in the lying tomes of the scholars. If his money is stolen, he cannot complain to the police: Adriano is not a man legalized by a birth certificate. He cannot buy a plaintive shivering puppy: the philanthropic purchase would necessitate reporting his name and ancestry to the collector of dog taxes. Nor can he fall in love; love would mean confidences and ultimate discovery. Months of misery elapse: the despairing Adriano, automaton born of a newspaper, goes back into nothingness. Out of his hat, cane, and a farewell note left lying on the Margharita Bridge, Mattia Pascal, a waggish phoenix, arises reborn, to return to the white-faced village of his nativity, and reverently lay flowers upon his own grave.

Mattia the Don Quixote, Mattia the Don Juan, Mattia the Unexpected. His code the reader never knows. One hour the trifler, the next the pious knight; one moment beguiling the feminine, the next windmilling its attackers. Always attractive, except when abstruse philosophy dulls his bantering discourse.

Dramatic as any of the Pirandellian plays is this Pirandellian novel. A ribald vigor sweeps through its pages; no chap-

EMERGENCY SOCIETY for GERMAN and AUSTRIAN SCIENCE and ART

NEW YORK, September, 1923.

TO THE READERS OF THE NATION:

It is well known that universities and scientists in Austria and Germany are in dire need. They are suffering not only physically, but also intellectually. Appeals without number reach us, setting forth the distress of scientific institutions and societies whose activities are important for the scientific achievements of the future.

To alleviate this situation, the Emergency Society for German and Austrian Science and Art has been organized. Since 1920 it has contributed to the maintenance of scientific work in Austria and Germany by assisting institutions and by furnishing means for research and publication. The Society is working in close cooperation with the "Notgemeinschaften oesterreichischer und deutscher Wissenschaft" which embrace all Austrian and German universities and scientific institutions of importance.

All funds received by this society are transmitted and distributed without delay and enable scholars and scientists to carry on their studies. The need of such help is acknowledged by the League of Nations whose appeal has been widely published.

We sincerely hope that everyone will help us in our work by joining the Society or by a contribution and by the encouragement which cooperation will give to those in distress in these afflicted countries.

During 1922 about $12,000 was sent abroad by the Committee for this work. Since January, 1923, $11,000 has been sent.

If any member or subscriber desires that his contribution be allotted to a particular branch of science or a particular institution, his wishes will be carried out.

Yours very truly,

ter lacks its impassioned arguments, its blustering combats, its frenzies at the gaming table. Action is everywhere: action gained through a glowing, almost curt dialogue. Perhaps Charles Chaplin is a reader of Italian. Perhaps he chanced to come upon Mattia Pascal published in the original twenty years ago. Assuredly the Rabelaisian climax of the war between the two Amazons, Scolastica and the Widow Pescatore, might well have furnished the inspiration for his early Pie Armageddons.

Every character, momentary though his appearance may be, is invested with droll individuality. Don Eligio, the recondite Boccamazza librarian, who spends an entire forenoon divorcing a pair of books which have embraced each other by the bindings; Guendolina, the gourmand wife with her petulant "I wish the Lord would give you one good cramp like those I have"; the amiable Roman drunkard who beholding Mattia's woebegone face, squats down to look up at him in bewilderment and exclaim optimistically, "Cheer up, brother! Let's see you crack a smile!"

The spirited, sympathetic translator remarks that the volume is the most important novel of the New Italy. It seems rather a pity that the book should be thus damned to the death of a classic. Had he declared it the most merry and the most diverting, he would have been very near the truth.

Books in Brief

The Manuscript of Youth. By Diana Patrick. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

A patience of finer texture than the average is indispensable to a faithful perusal of Miss Patrick's involved paragraphs. Nearly every sentence carries the ballast of three or more thoughts—good thoughts, all of them—but it's rather slow work untangling them from the commas. For the rest, a more or less conventional love story, of English setting.

Deep Channel. By Margaret Prescott Montague. Atlantic Monthly Press. $1.90.

A timid old maid falls in love with an equally timid married man, and by sinking their fears jointly in their emotion they generate sufficient courage to fortify a novelist. There is nothing notably new in this narrative, either in the theme or treatment. At the rate with which books of this type are being produced, it should not be long before all the starved souls of fiction are fed.

Seven for a Secret. By Mary Webb. George H. Doran Company. $2.

This novel by the author of "Gone to Earth" has substantial merits, even though they are of modest proportions. Mrs. Webb demonstrates an ability to get beneath the surface of emotions. Thomas Hardy is her model and to him she dedicates her book. Hitching one's wagon to a star is not forbidden in the traffic regulations of literature, but Mrs. Webb by no means attains the celestial pace. "Seven for a Secret" travels with all four wheels on the ground.

The Back Seat. By G. B. Stern. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Books from the pen of G. B. Stern bear the stamp of a civilized mind. "The Back Seat" is no exception. Interesting human beings are placed in intelligible situations, and the resultant problems worked out with alert sympathy and an ample measure of philosophy. In this story, the situation develops around an actress and a wise husband who realizes the advantages of holding the back seat—a theme with Barriesque implications, done very much in that mood.

Hidden Lives. By Leonora Eyles. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

The author of this novel has expended a great deal of sincere effort, and maintained a good average of workmanship, but the story is such a pile of woe that it outbalances all other factors. Here is a narrative hoist by its own petard—the petard, in this case, being the plot. A compound of social welfare and religious fanaticism is an explosive mixture at best, and Mrs. Eyles appears to lack either the humor or the discretion to keep it within the bounds of plausibility. In ability to absorb disaster, Mrs. Eyles's reader is apt to reach the saturation-point some little time before her heroine does.

Bread. By Charles G. Norris. Dutton and Company. $2.

The monosyllabic economy which prompts Mr. Norris in his selection of titles—"Salt," "Bread," "Brass"—seems to desert him completely when it comes to the actual writing. In his latest work, which runs well beyond 500 compact pages, he cherishes every crumb of detail, every dry crust of incident, and—like a frugal cook—makes today's unconsumed bread the foundation of tomorrow's pudding. Beyond a certain point, this ceases to be a dietetic virtue, and one wishes that the novelist had been willing to discard a little more, retaining only the essentials of his otherwise interesting and well-composed novel, which deals sanely with the problem of the woman in business and its bearing upon marriage.

Striking the Hour

WE who live in New York are so apt to have our conception of general conditions at large biased by those which prevail here that we often lose perspective of a movement. This is especially true of the musical situation in America which, at present, holds a unique place in the annals of our cultural progress. The war which recently ruined half the world enriched us in more ways than one; for it literally dumped the musical wealth of Europe upon our shores, much, it must be added, to our dismay. We were not ready to receive it because, for one reason, the tide had hitherto always flowed toward Europe rather than from it; and, for another, the territory, as a whole, was still too virgin for ready distribution. Even New York, best prepared of all, perhaps, to handle it, grew increasingly helpless and bewildered at this unceasing bombardment of tone. Unexpectedly elevated from a relatively minor position to the foremost musical market in the world, with what seemed all the talent in the world clamoring for recognition, and her musical activities suddenly increased at least 50 per cent, she immediately lost her balance in judgment and taste. She became so jaded with perfection that only the super-normal pleased her; so weary from this impact with ambition that the hundreds of ensuing failures depressed her. What she did not realize was that what seemed to fail in New York was often not so much from lack of inherent worth as from absence of just those qualities which make an abnormal appeal. And that her continuous pessimism was more the result of her own auditory fatigue and actual ignorance of what became of these so-called "failures" than of the truth of conditions as they are.

The situation is, of course, serious, but more so to the American musician than to the foreign. For the former has welcomed the latter with open arms, and the latter has not always reciprocated in kind. Even so impartial an observer as Loudon Charlton admits this. Yet he also claims that sensationalism is not the general creed of the country, and that artistic appreciation everywhere is "on the upward path, not downward." And Mr. Charlton is in a position to know. For twenty-five years he has been a pioneer in managerial fields, and the artists he has guided to success have, for the most part, been more distinguished for fine musical sensibilities than for purely virtuoso gifts. Among other interesting statements of Mr. Charlton, he asserts that this country has already assimilated, since the war, half of the musical influx from abroad. This, he adds, has, of course, necessitated the development of much new territory; and the development itself, with its genuinely high standards devoid of dross, is largely due, he declares, to the women's clubs and educational institutions now sprinkled so liberally throughout the country. To them must be given the real credit of encouraging, not only the finest in musical art, but also the gifted young artist in the straight and rocky path to a career. And so, many a musician flourishes without the approval of New York.

There has been, perhaps, no greater proof of fallow soil and careful sowing than the solid growth of our symphony orchestras. The fact that they are even maintained by our best moving-picture houses is a sure indication of popular taste. That they are fast becoming so integral a part of our life is all the more reason why they should be sympathetic to that life. But as long as native conductors are barred from the baton, and native music is listed under "novelties," conditions in this respect will be far from ideal.

Yet with it all, the only obstacles to our growth that at present seem insurmountable are our two subsidized grand opera companies. In spite of the fact that American money supports them, they remain what they were when founded: Europeanized institutions run for the exploitation of Europeans. If all the artists honored on their rostrums were far superior to any we could muster, then criticism would become chauvinism. But where we can match these artists with our own, then it seems about time to fight for our hearth rights. And that can be done in a very practical, yet dignified way. There are in this country, available, at least thirty or forty singers who, if pre-war conditions prevailed, would be filling the finest opera houses in Europe. Let them band together with native musicians and conductors as their colleagues in England have done. There, the British artists have formed a cooperative organization, which, aided by private subscription from the public itself, has become a sound business as well as artistic enterprise. They give the standard repertory in English, take risks, that have not yet proved disastrous, on their own native composers, and by touring the provinces as well as visiting London twice annually, they not only keep themselves in work most of the year round, but uphold what is a really National Opera. There is no reason why the same thing could not be done here successfully, because Fortuno Gallo has already proved it can be done. Moreover, we have as beautiful native voices and initial talent as ever came from the opera houses of Europe. The same thing is beginning to be done in orchestral circles. And it is only when the American musician himself "gets out and hustles," to use a classic American phrase, that he will be able to hear when his hour begins to strike.

Miscellany

WE are promised great things and are fed on quite trivial ones. We hear that Signora Duse is coming and Max Reinhardt and it is hard to believe. The cheap theatrical theater seems so strong, so almost impregnable. Year after year the same claptrap, the same grimy moral fallacies, the same broken-backed last acts, the same tinsel, almost the same words. These things engulf you. You wonder: Is there a great theater? Does this fog ever end? It almost chokes you. Memory sustains you much more than hope. . . .

I looked forward to "A Lesson in Love" (Thirty-ninth Street Theater) by Rudolf Besier and May Edgington. It proved to be but another of the innumerable progeny of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." The lady does not elope with the gentleman not because she has moral scruples, not because she doubts the quality of his feeling for her or hers for him, but because, because, wherever they go the wives of the resident Anglican clergymen will never, never come to tea. And unless the ladies come to tea life is a blunder and a shame. Thus lady number two, the lady who points the moral, though hers was a great love and she swears she would do it all over again, sobs most heartbreakingly over the memory of the fact that she had to send her gift to the baby of the Anglican clergyman and his wife anonymously. What a shattering misfortune! If she was secure in her righteousness why did she bother? What trivial people! The word is not mine. Somerset Maugham applied it in "The Circle" to people in this precise situation who took precisely this attitude. The fresh air that blows in the British novel of the better kind has not reached the drama. Here all is musty and stale like a house that hasn't been opened and aired for years. The mildew is beginning to creep over things. There are moments of emotional power and truth. You must disallow even these in view of the preposterous ending. Mr. William Faversham is very persuasive; he has both elegance and emotional genuineness, a rare combination. Miss Emily Stevens is enormously resourceful, technically equipped and ready beyond one's dreams, and leaves you icy. Miss Gilda Leary is unaffectedly moving; Mr. Edward Emery gives the best performance thus far of the season. He creates a character; he does so with understanding, with zest, with conviction and inner delight. He communicates that understanding and delight. A really delectable bit of work.

"Chicken Feed" (Little Theater) is the annual offering of John Golden and Winchell Smith, chief purveyors of the pure, sweet, clean, wholesome drama. The play is by Guy Bolton and is false and therefore the reverse of wholesome. But the very astute formula requires the salting of the concoction with a number of observations and incidents that have a superficial veracity. These the audience gulps down with unhesitating delight. How like you and me! Then it floats on upon the dream of successful business, happy married love, and a new car. The happiness in love that it dreams of is a terrible thing. It is based on the fact that a man needs a housekeeper and that women being by nature "bossy" can best exercise that propensity in the "home." This conclusion is felt by the audience to be both elevating and just. The play will run through the season.

Casanova! I thought of Schnitzler and of the glittering and pathetic old rogue himself. What I found at the Empire was a decoration seasoned with a romantic sentiment untrue to the man and to his age. The piece is by Lorenzo de Azertis and is translated by Sidney Howard. The author of "Swords" is evidently tied to the panache made of imitation feathers. As a pantomime "Casanova" is very lovely. How entrancing the eighteenth century is! Its costumes and manners and gestures and interiors are, however rich, of so grave a beauty, so divine an elegance. You see them and think of an air of Händel, an aria of Gluck. You can do so at "Casanova" even while you are listening to the incidental music of Mr. Deems Taylor, who has a delicate and sensitive and almost poetic vein in writing of this kind. The fable of the play is fluff. The acting is mediocre. Mr. Lowell Sherman, escaped from a long stage career of dark and heavy villainy, hasn't a moment of truth or nature; Miss Katherine Conell, that gifted and charming actress, does her best with the little that there is. The introductory ballet, devised by Fokine, is pleasing.

But, after all, you get more ballet and ballet not strikingly inferior to this at the revues. The Greenwich Village Follies (Winter Garden) is not equal to last year's. The spectacle is rather inchoate. There was no harmony, no "composition" at all. I missed all evening the exquisite Marjorie Petersen. The "Music Box Revue," on the other hand, is charming. There is the salt of wit and satire furnished by Robert Benchley and a skit by George Kaufman; there are the quaintly engaging Brox Sisters; there is Florence O'Denishawn and a wonderful little dancer named Dorothy Dilley and Mme Dora Stroeva, a Russian diseuse who projects atmosphere and poetry and a kind of tragic humor, and dances and tableaux that delight the eye. Of the revues of the present season the most beautiful are the Vanities at the Earl Carroll theater and the Music Box Revue.

NEW STEWART KIDD BOOKS

THREE MODERN JAPANESE PLAYS

Translated by Yozan T. Iwasaki and Glenn Hughes

With an introduction by Glenn Hughes

These short plays are the direct result of Western influences and are representative of the new drama movement in Japan, which is not supplanting but very decidedly challenging the No, the Kabuki, and the Doll-play. The plays are: The Razor, one act, by Kichizo Nakamura. The Madman on the Roof, one act, by Kan Kikuchi. Nari-kin, one act, by Yozan T. Iwasaki. Decorated boards, $1.50 net

ONE-ACT PLAYS FROM The YIDDISH

*Translated by Etta Block

Champagne, by Isaac Loeb Perez. Mother and Son, by J. Halpern. The Stranger, by Perez Hirschbein. The Snowstorm, by Perez Hirschbein. When the Dew Falleth, by Perez Hirschbein. The Eternal Song, by Marc Arnstein. These plays are some of the finest examples of the one-act form in Yiddish, and Miss Block, the authorized translator, has lifted them over into English without losing their distinctive Yiddish flavor. $2.00 net

THE SEA-WOMAN'S CLOAK and NOVEMBER EVE

By Amélie Rives (Princess Troubetzkoy)

Amélie Rives is an American. These two 3-act plays are Irish. It has been said of her that she has a genius for all English forms. The Sea Woman's Cloak and November Eve are evidence in part of this statement's truth. They are as Irish as anything of Yeats's, Synge's, Lady Gregory's. As individual. As enchanting. $2.50 net

HUMBLE FOLK, By Bosworth Crocker

Introduction by Ludwig Lewisohn

One-act plays which have been produced by the Washington Square Players and other Little Theatre groups. They are: The Baby Carriage. The Dog. The Last Straw. The First Time. The Cost of a Hat. Alexander Woollcott calls them "sympathetic and lifelike to a degree." $2.00 net

SHAKESPEARE, University Society Edition

Founded on the famous Cambridge text, this edition is complete in eight volumes and includes thirty-seven Plays, The Poems and Sonnets, and a Life of Shakespeare. Each play has a frontispiece and is prefaced with a critical account of the plot, its probable source, etc. The type is large and readable. Price for complete set, $12.00

ONE THOUSAND AND ONE PLAYS FOR THE LITTLE THEATRE

*Selected and compiled by Frank Shay

A handbook of great value to those interested in the reading or producing of plays. The list is arranged alphabetically by authors and organizations and gives the title, nature of the play, number of men and women, and the publisher. Art Boards, $1.00 net

New Editions

Portmanteau and More Portmanteau Plays by Stuart Walker

EDWARD LOOMIS DAVENPORT:
A BIOGRAPHY
By Edwin Francis Edgett

This biography of the famous American actor, Edward Loomis Davenport, is a revised and expanded version of a monograph written by Mr. Edgett and privately printed for the members of The Dunlap Society twenty-two years ago. Profusely illustrated. $5.00
Special Edition, 125 signed and numbered copies, printed on Hand Made Paper. $7.50

BACKROADS: MAINE NARRATIVES — WITH LYRICS
By Winifred Virginia Jackson
With an introduction by William Stanley Braithwaite

The Boston Transcript, in its Annual Survey of American Poetry for the current year 1921, proclaimed Miss Jackson as one of the discoveries of the year. "America has produced," added another critic, "two new poets of great significance in Winifred Virginia Jackson, with her stark disinterested portraits of a spiritually rotting New England, full of sterile tragedy and dusty death, and in Elinor Wylie with her dynamic gospel of Blake in a modern setting." Into this volume Miss Jackson has gathered, in Part I, a group of poems, narrative in substance though often racy and impassioned with the ballad form, the very essence of that isolated tragic life in the backroads of Maine. Part II contains a group of very delicately imaginative and musical lyrical poems. $2.00
Special Edition, 115 signed and numbered copies, printed on Hand Made Paper. $5.00

COLONIAL LIGHTING
By Arthur H. Hayward

The only book published devoted entirely to the development of lighting devices in America from the crude iron "Betty" and "Phœbe" lamps of the Pilgrims to the stately astral lamps and elaborate candelabra of our own grandparents' time. Illustrated with 114 half-tone plates, showing over 400 specimens of lighting devices. $5.00
Special Edition, 110 signed and numbered copies, printed on Arches Cream Antique French Hand Made Paper and bound in Japanese Hand Made Vellum. $25.00

THE PROCESSION OF MASKS
By Herbert S. Gorman

A volume of brilliant essays by one of the younger generation. While distinctly a member of the younger group Mr. Gorman bases his judgments upon a sound knowledge of the great literatures of the past. In THE PROCESSION OF MASKS he considers such figures as Edwin Arlington Robinson, Max Beerbohm, Arthur Symons, Emily Dickinson, William Butler Yeats, Sholom Asch, Fyodor Dostoevski, Thomas Hardy and A. E. Housman. $2.00
Special Edition, 150 signed and numbered copies, printed on Hand Made Paper. $5.00

SIDELIGHTS ON NEGRO SOLDIERS
By Charles H. Williams
With an introduction by Benjamin Brawley

First authentic account of the Negro soldier in the World War. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War in the Wilson Cabinet, wrote to the author: "I am glad your frank narrative has been written, of the record the race has rendered in a great emergency and may be called upon to render again in some future crisis." $3.00
Special Edition, 125 signed and numbered copies, printed on Hand Made Paper. $6.00

1,200,000 Potential Book Buyers

With its circulation of nearly 400,000, The Chicago Daily News is read every day by approximately 1,200,000 people, who include the great majority of cultured, financially competent readers of English in Chicago and its immediate suburbs.

The Wednesday Book Page of The Chicago Daily News has been for almost a decade the outstanding literary guide and book buying directory of this vast army of readers.

Realizing the bookselling effectiveness of this medium, the leading publishers of America consistently place more of their advertising in The Daily News than in any other Chicago newspaper, daily or Sunday.

The official figures* for the first eight months of 1923 are here given:

TOTAL VOLUME OF BOOK ADVERTISING AS DISTRIBUTED AMONG CHICAGO NEWSPAPERS

FROM JANUARY 1 TO AUGUST 31, 1923

A veritable "Tut-ankh-amen" find from the buried treasures of the past. Eighty songs composed by the great melodists of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, hitherto inaccessible in Libraries, and cumbered with archaic harmonies. The editor has written piano parts which are modern in sonority and color and which still retain and enhance the beauty of the original songs. Issued in the famous MUSICIANS LIBRARY.

The book that Poincaré and Stresemann are talking about!

BOTH Premiere Poincaré and Chancellor Stresemann in some of their recent speeches have made extended reference to the report of the INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS on the capacity of Germany to make reparation payments.

This report, which came off the press a few weeks ago, is exciting interest in all parts of the world. It is the first definite answer to one of the leading questions of the day.

Germany's Capacity to Pay

By H. G. Moulton and C. E. McGuire
With the aid of the Council and Staff of the Institute of Economics

384 pages, 5 x 8, $2.50 net, postpaid

THIS book is the first of a series of studies from the INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS, established in October, 1922, and endowed by the Carnegie Foundation, for the purpose of gathering and making available material on economic questions for the guidance of public opinion.

The INSTITUTE has not been content with any superficial gatherings of data and opinion. It has done its work thoroughly and its findings will be found as conclusive and as trustworthy as would be those of any commission especially appointed to the task.

A Complete Diagnosis of Germany's Economic Condition

The aim has been to make as complete a diagnosis as possible of Germany's economic condition and of her ability to continue making reparation payments.

The volume clears away many of the prevalent misconceptions regarding Germany's ability to meet her reparation obligations and answers conclusively most of the questions about which there is so much controversy today.

WE had begun to think that the only stable and permanent agencies of government in the world were the various occupying armies. Cabinets might be hurled from office, kingdoms might crash, but the occupations seemed to go on forever. They had no virtue but that of an enforced stability, but we had grown used to them as a part of the world's landscape. And so it has been a pleasant shock to view, through the columns of the press, the departing backs of the British, French, and Italian troops as they marched to the Constantinople quays and embarked for home. The Allied occupation has ended and for better or worse Constantinople is itself once more. So far the change seems to be for the better, for the Turkish Nationalist Government has announced, perhaps by way of celebrating the departure of Western democracy from the land, that a republic will be established "with a president, a premier, and a responsible cabinet." We have already published articles discussing hopefully the chance of democracy in Turkey, and have been denounced for taking the fair words of the Nationalist leaders for actual deeds. In establishing the new form of their state, free from foreign interference or the threat of war, Turkey has an opportunity to show that those who have watched her progress with hopeful interest were not misled, and that the words of her leaders were not empty ones.

PARTIES and individual ministers have become almost insignificant in Germany; behind them move powerful economic forces. The working class, the raw-material industries, the finishing industries have been the three protagonists in the struggles which have appeared to the public as the fall of the Cuno Government and the reorganization of the Stresemann Government. Stresemann came into office pledged to radical financial reform and to a program of conference with France. His ministers elaborated an economic program, but it got nowhere—it met the opposition of Hugo Stinnes and the raw-material industries. The Minister of Economics, Herr von Raumer, was a member of the same political party as Hugo Stinnes, but he represented the finishing industries. In the interest of those industries and, as he believed, of Germany, he sought to put an end to profiteering in coal and to regulate the price of coal. He had to get out. Rudolph Hilferding, Socialist Minister of Finance, wanted to place taxes on a gold basis, to force the coal owners in particular to pay a tax proportionate to their profits. He had to get out. And so the same Stresemann who came into office with such high hopes and fine promises continues in office, supported by the same parties, with his hopes gone and his promises broken.

POINCARE has expressed his contempt for Stresemann, and the order to abandon passive resistance has produced no rapprochement of the French and German governments. Perhaps there is reason for this contempt for the nominal head of the German Government. Hugo Stinnes, without even consulting Stresemann about it, has gone to the Ruhr with a troop of his fellow-industrialists, and has there consulted with General Degoutte, Poincaré's consul, apparently to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned. What is the result of this new form of secret diplomacy—secret even from the Government to which Stinnes seems to dictate—we do not yet know. We can be certain only that Stinnes and Poincaré will find a first point of agreement in contempt for the German workers, and that whatever treaty of alliance may be signed between the German and French steel interests will be made at the expense of the employees. The eight-hour day and the shop councils, first fruits of the revolution of 1918, seem doomed.

BRITAIN'S Imperial Conference and Imperial Economic Conference open at a low ebb of imperial prestige. Mr. Baldwin's humiliating vacillations have left England for the time an almost negligible factor in Continental policy; the honorable debt settlement with the United States has had little effect on American opinion and has embittered France rather than encouraged her to do likewise; the return of Zaglul to Egypt and the loans to Mr. Cosgrave's Government in Ireland have not solved the problems of those trouble-spots; and unemployment and trade distress continue in the home country. Without German and Russian markets Britain is hard put, and there seems little likelihood of acceptance of any scheme of imperial preference which would substantially increase the colonial market for British goods. India is learning to make her own cotton into cloth; General Smuts, pressed by the Nationalist opposition, would not dream of advocating closer imperial ties and has recently asserted his independence in the Kenya affair; Canada has just insisted that the British Minister at Washington keep his signature off treaties which she makes with the United States. Mr. Bruce of Australia is almost alone at London in asking that his dominion share in framing imperial foreign policy and in offering to share the cost of imperial defense. He wants closer trade relations, but even he is opposed to a preferential tariff, and his political opponents in the antipodes are already denouncing him as an "imperialist."

THE revolution in Bulgaria has crumbled under fire; thousands of rebels are said to have been mowed down by the government troops, Communist and agrarian leaders have been executed, hundreds of men are in jail. And thus, according to present-day methods, "order and tranquillity have been reestablished throughout Bulgaria." We have seen order and tranquillity established by these means before—in Hungary, for instance, and recently in Spain. Sometimes they continue a surprisingly long time—as long as terror is more strongly rooted in the hearts of the people than hate and resentment. But they cannot last forever unless the masses who have been suppressed are ultimately placated. And the present Bulgarian Government by undoing the land reforms of Stambuliiski and wiping out even the symbols of democracy has made it certain that neither peace nor tranquillity will be its permanent share.

JAPAN, as an aftermath of the earthquake, announces that she will cut her military budget for the current year by five million yen (a yen is worth about fifty cents) and for the next year by ten million yen. This gives added point to a letter to the New York Evening Post which, stating that two of Japan's capital ships were lost in the disaster, suggests that President Coolidge might seize the occasion to carry the Harding disarmament program farther still and propose to Great Britain that she and the United States scrap a proportionate share of the naval tonnage left to them by the Washington treaties. The correspondent points out that all the millions of dollars raised in this country for Japanese relief barely equal the cost of a single battleship. What fools we are! We are appalled at an earthquake, and empty our pockets for relief, but we throw away in battleships the cost of many earthquakes.

THERE was little in the annual convention of the Amercan Federation of Labor at Portland, Oregon, to encourage those who would like to see the Gompers machine go down before a more progressive leadership. Mr. Gompers rode all his pet hobbies through the convention without a fall or even a stumble, seemingly stronger and less unseatable than for a number of years past. His antipathy toward radicalism in America was more marked than ever, and he found the officers of the United Mine Workers ready to accomplish for him the expulsion of William F. Dunne, of Butte, Montana, a member of the Workers' Party. This was done ostensibly on the ground that Dunne was seeking to destroy the labor movement but actually for the purely political reason that the old-line leaders fear their radical opponents. All of which is in marked contrast with the progressive action of British workers in electing Margaret Bondfield as president of the Trade Union Congress. Mr. Gompers succeeded also, as usual, in squelching all efforts toward using the Federation as the basis of a labor party. The adamant position of labor's old guard on this issue is probably not susceptible of change. The hope lies in so educating the mass of the workers, especially the young recruits, that they will push new leaders into position. To make headway labor must coordinate its political with its economic power, and even then its cry will be for more strength.

WHAT the rights of a minority in an organization should be was a question raised sharply in the A. F. of L. convention not only in regard to the Workers' Party but also with respect to the Federated Press. In the latter case the report of the A. F. of L.'s special committee is an illuminating example of muddleheadedness. The first point made against the Federated Press is that its European manager is Louis Lochner, a pacifist who headed the People's Council of war days. Now if the labor movement is to purge its ranks of pacifists, it would better dissolve at once before it gets the workers at each other's throats again in a general world war. Equally ridiculous is the charge that the Federated Press tries "to report the news of all 'pretending-to-be' factions and wings of the labor movement." What, pray, should a labor-press association do which is trying to occupy a nonpartisan position toward the workers' movement as a whole?

MAGNUS JOHNSON, the second Farmer-Labor candidate Minnesota has elected to the United States Senate, does well to emphasize the field that still exists for political action in this country. It has become rather the fashion in advanced labor circles to view with cynicism and indifference the possibilities of progress through constitutional political means. This attitude is certainly justified if we look only to the old political parties. Fortunately events like the election of Shipstead and Johnson in Minnesota prove that the old organizations are not as impossible to dislodge as it sometimes seems, and we must not lose faith in political progress through other groups. Mr. Johnson rightly points out that the G. O. P. has been talking cooperation to the farmer solely as a means of "passing the buck." Minnesota, he says, is thick with cooperative societies and yet "the best marketing organization is feeble if there is no market." Viewed as economic factors consumers' and producers' organizations are among our most hopeful movements, but as Mr. Johnson says: "We know that cooperation or economic organization of any kind is not a substitute for a just or honest government."

NOW the Filipinos are talking of adopting Gandhi's method of non-cooperation. General Wood's administration seems to have come to an impasse. The election of October 2, held in a district which is normally hostile to the Nacionalista and Collectivista parties which are fighting General Wood, gave an 11,000 majority to the coalition. It is nonsense for papers like the New York Times to discover a victory for General Wood in the fact that 42 per cent of the voters favored Sumulong, the Democrata candidate. The essential fact is that 58 per cent voted against him where in ordinary times any Democrata was a safe bet. Manuel Quezon's courage in making the election a test of the Filipino people's abhorrence of the Wood regime is vindicated. Quezon's candidate, Ramon Fernandez, was not strong personally. He was implicated in the inefficiency which General Wood had discovered in the conduct of the Philippine National Bank. The voters showed plainly that they preferred even inefficient Filipinos acting in Filipino interests to efficient representatives of Wall Street. Most Americans will sympathize with them.

IN the two short weeks of their control the editors of the New York Leader—née Call—have made a good newspaper. If they have followed closely the make-up and headlining of the other evening papers it is doubtless deliberate and probably wise; there is no reason to suppose that the 300,000 organized workers who, through their unions, are the present owners of the paper, would either buy or read it if it failed to provide the features they have come to recognize on the face of their accustomed papers. Crime and comic strips, sports and "columns"—the Leader provides them all. And if the comics are rather worse than most, the sporting pages are excellent, and Howard Brubaker's column, The Cheer Leader, provides far and away the best puns in town. We wish it might appear every day instead of three times a week. A school page and a woman's page will fill out the proper departments of a paper which sets out to be a "regular paper." The editorial page is a vigorous and lively defender of the radical position in politics and economics and of labor's rights in industry. There is plenty of room for change and improvement in a labor paper only a fortnight old; but already the workers of New York have an organ which deserves their steady support.

IT is human nature that the naval officers involved in the disaster on the California coast should seek for excuses to save themselves from blame and the service from ignominy, but we had not supposed any of them would have the impudence to transform a display of negligence and foolhardiness that cost twenty-three lives into propaganda for increased appropriations. Yet Captain James H. Tomb, chief of Destroyer Squadron 12, stood up before the investigating court and glibly proclaimed that if Congress had not refused appropriations "for the proper equipment of destroyer squadrons" the tragedy would not have happened; he complained especially that the vessels lacked "sonic depth-finders" with which to take soundings. Depth-finding fiddlesticks! An old-fashioned lead line would have been sufficient, if the officers had been willing to slow up long enough to use it. We doubt if Congress will be much inclined to increase naval equipment until the service can show a personnel with the competence and the care not to drive full speed through a fog when approaching a rock-impounded coast.

WHAT Ireland has long needed for her intellectual and spiritual healing and what America needs for an understanding of Ireland has been provided in the Irish Statesman, a weekly journal edited by George W. Russell (Æ), the first issue of which appeared in the middle of September. This is a revival of the publication of the same name which was started by Sir Horace Plunkett and expired in 1920, after only one year of existence, for lack of funds. The new paper is backed financially by a group of anonymous Americans of Irish descent. They have left the control of the paper in the hands of its editor and a small board of management of which Sir Horace is a member. The Irish Statesman supports the Free State, but its position is none the less critical and independent. Principally it is dedicated to a policy of reconciliation between the factions of South Ireland and between the North and the South. It is moderate and tempered in its tone, and consequently it will displease the extremists in all the camps; but among the tired and peace-loving majority of the Irish people its quiet intelligence may easily sound more loudly than the shouts of the bitter partisans. And to the friends of Ireland in other lands it offers hope of some better counsels in that distracted country.

NEWS from France does not consist exclusively of the jingo speeches of the Prime Minister. There appeared the other day the story of a young man in the employ of the Paris office of the American Express Company who had managed to steal 475,000 francs from the firm and spend it on his best girl before he was found out and arrested. He was brought to trial, admitted his guilt, and the prosecuting attorney demanded that he be severely punished. A long time behind the bars seemed to be the young man's fate until his lawyer rose to remind the jury that boys will be boys and that it costs more to be a boy nowadays that once upon a time. The advocate then described the American Express Company as a fabulously rich organization which had made big profits exploiting people on French soil, which had heaped up millions in exchange operations that had depreciated the franc, which was managed on so poor a system that the peculations of the young man were almost inevitable and, finally, which had a great deal more money than was good for it anyhow. When the lawyer for the defense sat down the jury acquitted the young man almost upon the spot and could scarcely be restrained from sending the American Express Company to jail for twenty years. Far be it from us to condone such a verdict. We realize that it was—well, everything you say. But there was something ingratiatingly human about that jury, wasn't there?

WE do not know whether Zev or My Own is the faster American three-year-old. We do know that the public always sides with the under dog or the long-shot horse and that a substantial section of it feels that the Jockey Club's officers and the trainer of Zev were guilty of poor sportsmanship in not giving My Own a better chance to demonstrate that he was the proper contender to be matched against the English Derby winner, Papyrus, in the international race at Belmont Park. If Papyrus gallops home with the $100,000 stakes, there will be many to say that had My Own run against him the tables would have been turned. But all this is not Zev's fault; he is a thoroughbred even if some of the mere humans about him are not. He is said to be as gentle and as well-mannered as the much-extolled Papyrus, and his past performances have shown him to have the heart of a steam engine and legs like steel springs. We hope both horses get away together, reach the final stretch before the grandstand neck and neck, and then that one (we don't care which) in half a dozen furious leaps passes the judges' post a full half length ahead.

The Twilight of a Civilization

WE generally think of people as living in states, nations, social organizations of various kinds. This conception is useful but it bears as little relation to reality as the algebraic symbols of some formula do to the actual facts of a path in the woods, the timber for a house, the diminishing weight in sickness of somebody that we love. Beauty, peace, terror, and grief—these are the actual elements of human life. And these are felt by individuals. All aggregations are symbolic. The reality consists of men and women, each with his portion of suffering or joy. It follows that the measure of an age, a period, a year, is the peace, the freedom, the absence of unbearable pain and shattering delusion that mark the lives of the individuals who make up mankind.

Now, it is very well and very wholesome to be optimistic, if optimism is the result of clear vision. If it is the result of wearing blinkers it destroys the very elements that might legitimately feed it. Shut your eyes to evil and you let it alone; you do nothing about it; you let it wax and grow fat. While you are comfortable the world goes more and more to the devil. But tomorrow—this is the warning that must be sounded today in the ear of every liberal, of every lover of freedom and of the true goods of civilization—tomorrow the knife will be at your throat.

We used to read in school and college about Roman history and Roman politics, about government by murder and dictatorship and the proscription of the "outs." And these things, in our ordered world, seemed to have so little reality that they read like a legend and we scarcely believed that the severed head of the slain Cicero was the same that pleaded for beauty and truth in the name of Archias, the poet. Well, murder, dictatorship, the proscription of "outs"—these things are upon us. The gains of centuries are lost. Horthy exterminates his opponents or drives them into exile; the Fascisti throttle the press and administer castor-oil; Hitler and his Fascist legionaries in Bavaria talk of the sacred honor of the German name and mean the pogrom of Jews and Socialists; the Bulgarian Communists are being interned in prison camps copied from those Hungarian camps where men and women literally rotted to death. When the Russian revolution of 1905 was on, America shuddered at the tales of floggings in Czarist prisons; it rightly held flogging to be symbolic of the vilest barbarism. Today America is the classic land of the knout, the only home of lynchings. In Oklahoma a military dictatorship, benevolent, perhaps, but still a military dictatorship, locks horns with a Fascist mob whose weapon is the torch, the faggot, and the knout. North Germany, the classical land of moderate socialism, is being driven at this moment under an industrialist and reactionary yoke that will reestablish the worst terrors of feudalism without its old religious and social mitigations. The assassination of Rathenau continues what the assassination of Jaurès began. A dark age is upon us.

It is, as we said, the individual and his fate that count. All through Central Europe the intellectual classes are dying of slow starvation: students labor in mines; physicians, after a day of toil, are waiters or film operators at night; it is dangerous to speak German on the streets of Prague or Ukrainian on those of Lemberg; one of the greatest of living German actresses is insulted on the streets of Berlin because of her slightly Jewish cast of features; a Catholic can hardly teach school in an Alabaman or Texan village; the roads from Central and Eastern Europe to Constantinople and Trieste swarm with ragged and penniless Jewish students expelled from the Polish and Hungarian universities; the fugitives from Smyrna are smothering Athens, those from the East, Vienna and Berlin; our Negroes are being driven northward by the tens of thousands—they flee from insult, pogrom, the knout, and the stake. Jewish families that have passed long and honorable lives in Southern communities find life increasingly difficult and friendless. White terror, Fascisti, Ku Klux Klaners—these are but varying names for an engulfing wave of barbarism.

This picture is not overdrawn. It is made up of solid facts visible to all who can see. It does not dig sufficiently, of course, into the concrete and place before the imagination strongly enough the men and women and children in the deadly and hourly grip of hunger, of disease, of terror, of insupportable injustice. Yet we do not despair; we speak out because we do not despair, because, in fact, we believe that the forces of peace and justice and tolerance are still strong enough in the world to make a stand. In America, in England, among the temporarily silenced liberals and humanitarians of Italy and Germany, in Holland and Scandinavia and Mexico, even in Poincaré's France, there exist vast spiritual resources that can be stirred to work for a rebirth of a measure of liberty, peace, and justice.

But the liberals of the world must not deceive themselves; they must dwell in no fool's paradise; they must not let divisions and controversies among themselves cause their ranks to waver. England trembles at the air-fleets of France; a reactionary imperium is linking up the Bavarian, Hungarian, and Italian forces; festering injustice is making for war among the cruelly oppressed minorities of Poland and Czecho-Slovakia; rumors of war stir Europe periodically, and the sighs of relief she breathes as each fresh crisis passes are no deeper or more permanent than those of the first decade of this century. Let but the torch of war be lit and all the forces of reaction, myth, blood, hate will easily darken the minds of men with the false cries of national honor, security, and defense.

We have seen it. Let it be our effort that it shall not be again. Let us forget the questionable distinction between liberal and radical, socialist and economic meliorist. The day of building a new and better world is, alas, far off and questions of method may be left to the future. The problem of the hour is to save the slow gains that were made in the period from the French Revolution to the World War. It is no less than that. The days when we can afford to sneer at nineteenth-century liberalism are over. If the united front of all the active liberals in the world can but save that liberalism as a starting-point for the future, it is more than we can expect at this moment; it would be enough to carry the hope of our civilization through one of its darkest and most desperate crises.

Lloyd George, Puppet

MR. LLOYD GEORGE has come to the United States, presumably to make money. It is a habit that many Englishmen have, and Americans surely should be the last to protest when Englishmen follow such good American pursuits. Mr. Lloyd George, it seems to us, has a right to his royalties, and his sponsors naturally will advertise him as best they may. We feel that our neighbor, the Freeman, is too liberal with its indignation when it shouts that > Mr. Lloyd George . . . has spent eight busy years in the deliberate and purposeful organization of mendacity, murder, robbery, arson, oppression, and famine; and it is sheerly on the strength of his success in these elevated pursuits that he presumes to come among us.

From across Park Row comes the welcoming bark of the World:

> We have with us this morning, ladies and gentlemen, one of the nine wonders of the world. For according to reports here is a man who consists of many men in one: The Man Who Won the War and the Man Who Lost the War, the Man Who Botched the Peace and the Man Who Tried to Save the Peace, a Liberal Tory, a Tory Liberal, a savior and a destroyer, a prophet and a politician, a leader of democracy and a manufacturer of peers. . . . This man has lived on crises, gone to bed and got up with emergencies, gambled in empires. When you judge him, remember that. Remember that there are no precedents by which to judge him, for no statesman of any age, and none other even of this age, has had so many times to act so quickly at awful risk amid so many complications.

To the World as to the Freeman there is something superhuman, almost demoniac to one and heroic to the other, about this man Lloyd George. He stands beyond criticism, says the World; he is "an undesirable alien," says the Freeman. It would be better to attempt to understand him. There is no question that he has lied, and been the cause of murder, arson, and famine; but we do not believe that he intended any of them. He has held power and gambled with high stakes; so have, in our own day, Woodrow Wilson and William Hohenzollern, Ludendorff and Foch, Sazonov and Clemenceau—not to mention Poincaré and Mussolini. He is not alone; and the tragedy of Lloyd George is the tragedy of every one of these men—that they did not prove superhuman, could not master their environment, and instead of rising above their day, expressed it. They were, after all, but puppets, through which spoke the voice of an incapable period. Lloyd George is today, politically, down and out, a statesman in the discard; but he is a symbol of the period of the Great War, and if Americans still look upon the war years as a heroic epic, it is fitting that they should pay tribute to Lloyd George.

Lloyd George is called the master of brilliant improvisation; he has an amazing gift for sensing the spirit of his audience and expressing it. That is to say that he has been the man for his age. He has been the H. G. Wells of the political world, ready to plunge into any problem, however complex, without a moment's hesitation or preparation—and he is likely to emerge with a temporarily satisfactory solution, although almost never with anything of permanent value or significance. In this contentment with superficiality, this refusal to go to the roots of problems, he again expresses his period. Europe "slipped"—it is Lloyd George's own word—into war because it insisted on playing Pollyanna when the cake was burning, and thought it a sufficient remedy for a bad odor to shut a door upon it. Europe—and we—may do as much again. We have learned so little; we still think that we may blame the faults of an age upon a few men, and that if it had not been for their wilful wickedness all might have been well.

"Lloyd George ruined the British parliamentary system," we hear it said—and certainly there are ample data of corruption to support the argument. But here are Russia, Italy, Spain, Bavaria, Oklahoma openly flouting parliamentarism; we cannot blame Lloyd George for them. The cancer lies deeper. Lloyd George may have been the agent of parliamentary decline in England, the instrument of imperialism in Ireland, Egypt, India, the trumpet through which madmen shouted "Hang the Kaiser" and "Make Germany pay for the war"; his weaknesses may, since he was in power, have been the direct agencies of the disaster of Versailles—but England gave him power, kept him in power, and was well content, yes, proud of him. War-time England, to be sure—but an England very like war-time America, or France, or Germany.

Havelock Ellis, apropos of something very different, says:

> It is certainly strange to observe how many people seem to feel vain of their own ungratified optimism when the place where optimism most flourishes is the lunatic asylum. They never seem to pause to reflect on the goal that lies ahead of them, though there must be few who on looking back cannot perceive what terrible accidents they might have foreseen and avoided by the aid of a little pessimism. When the gods, to ruin a man, first made him mad, they do it, almost invariably, by making him an optimist.

It might have been written as an epitaph on Lloyd George's career. If Americans want to pay their dollars to hear his sermons, what does it prove unless that they deserve no better fare?

The Violent Alien

OVER and again, in current writings and speeches, there are allusions to the alien in America as an instigator of mass violence, especially in labor disputes, and hostility toward our foreign-born population is sedulously cultivated by picturing the danger of armed revolution from this element in our national life. Have the persons who preach, or accept, this doctrine ever taken the trouble to test it by the records of recent mass violence in the United States?

Take, for instance, the ugliest exhibition of violence in a labor dispute within recent years—the massacre of strike-breakers at Herrin, Illinois. In spite of the absurd charges made for political effect by officers of the United Mine Workers, the unanimous testimony of Illinois public officials, of newspaper correspondents, and of the United States Coal Commission is that the Herrin workers—including those who killed the strike-breakers—constitute one of our oldest American stocks, a community almost untouched by foreign infiltration. Likewise with the southern counties of West Virginia, where guerrilla fighting has been almost ceaseless for several years and where in 1921 an armed march was attempted which brought the State to civil war. Who are the men who, goaded by the ruthless policies of autocratic mine owners, have taken down their rifles and shot from ambush or in the open the mine guards and others whom they regarded as their enemies? Are they Italians, or Hungarians, or Poles? On the contrary, they are native-born mountaineers, far better trained in the use of the long-distance rifle than any group of foreigners in this country begins to be.

Or take mass violence against the Negro in the South or in the North. That is admittedly of "pure American" origin. Nobody pretends that the mobs that lynch or burn black men are composed of recently arrived immigrants. The Ku Klux Klan, which is expressly anti-foreign in its make-up, has been guilty of more mass violence in Texas, Oklahoma, and various other States in the last year than can be matched by any other group in the country.

On the other hand, what is the labor history of those regions and those industries in which our foreign-born population is chiefly to be found? Rhode Island is our most alien State; nearly a third of its inhabitants are foreign-born. Yet its industrial history has hardly been turbulent. In New York, Baltimore, and other great centers of clothing manufacture there have been numerous strikes of tailors, cutters, garment workers, fur makers, and others in recent years. Thousands of persons, almost exclusively foreign in origin, have walked out of their shops and made every legitimate effort to prevent others from taking their places; yet these strikes have been so devoid of violence or even of demonstration that a majority of the fellow-townsmen of the disputants have scarcely been aware that any controversy was going on. Our great steel and iron industry rests largely on the sturdy backs of recently landed immigrants. Yet about the only violence that took place in the bitter strike of 1919 was committed by the Pennsylvania constabulary and police. William Z. Foster, commenting on the peaceable character of the contest, said: "Wait until a strike of this sort takes place some time among American-born workers!"

There is nothing in the least mysterious in the fact—and it is one despite propaganda to the contrary—that our old American stock is more prone to mass violence than our foreign-born population. The reason, of course, is that the European immigrant is derived for the most part from generations of law-bound and submissive ancestors, while the older Americans are the immediate descendants of a race of frontiersmen and fighters. Violence has been bred into their bones. The pioneers were more independent than tolerant. They were strong for personal liberty—when their own was concerned—but they expected to maintain it by the ability to draw quicker than the other fellow. Even mob action is an advance over personal vengeance; a barrelhead court is better than none; the frontier did the best that it could. But although the frontier is now little more than a memory, its habits and its instincts are still with us, and will cling to the older American stock for many years to come.

No, there is no basis for the theory that our foreign-born population is a source of mass violence or a probable focus for armed revolution. The older Americans who tremble on this account for their privileges and their prestige are needlessly disturbed. Because of his psychology and previous environment the foreign-born resident does seem to be more open to new industrial and political ideas than his American-bred neighbor, but education and persuasion—not bullets and bombs—are his means of propaganda. Of course some of our older Americans are afraid of even such methods, but it is a little awkward to avow such a fear openly. To storm about danger from alien violence preserves American self-respect and makes one more likely to be believed.

What Is An "American Dinner"?

> The Lloyd Georges had dinner in the Rose Room at the Waldorf-Astoria. . . . Mr. Lloyd George had asked for a typical American meal, and Oscar provided bluepoints, sorrel soup, mousse of sole with oyster-crab sauce, potatoes parisienne, breast of chicken, new lima beans, Waldorf salad, and ice cream, cakes, and coffee.—New York Times.

WE don't want to spoil either Mr. Lloyd George's digestion or his illusions, but we must turn aside for a moment to laugh discreetly at this "American dinner," the only indisputably native dish in which was lima beans. It is true that oysters as the beginning of a dinner is an essentially American custom, but the oyster itself is international, as is the eating of it raw on the half-shell. Had the oysters been served escalloped or as a soup, they would have been much more American. Sorrel soup is distinctly Continental. Not one American housewife in a hundred would know how to make it even if she could get the sorrel. Perhaps clam chowder is our most typical American soup, although if it is made right—with plenty of milk and clams—it is a meal in itself. Sole is anything but an American fish, and prepared as a "mousse" it would certainly get the gorge of anybody sufficiently American to tell "The Star-Spangled Banner" from "Yes, We Have No Bananas." He would suspect that it concealed something like frog's legs or stuffed snails.

For a typically American fish one should, we think, choose one not from the ocean but from our inland waters—perhaps a Great Lakes whitefish—or at least something prepared in an American manner, like creamed cod on toast as the Bostonians know how to produce it. Potatoes parisienne, of course, stands condemned by its own name, and roast chicken is as universal as war. Waldorf salad, we admit, has claims as an American dish, since it combines fruit and nuts with green vegetables, which is not European; but it is too new to our diet to have much significance. Likewise ice cream is nowhere else made as it is here, nor consumed in such stupendous quantities, but we doubt if Mr. Lloyd George noticed the difference—or, if he did, liked it.

What, then, would we serve Mr. Lloyd George as an American dinner? Well, in the first place, we would not expect it of Oscar, who is European; at the Waldorf-Astoria, which is international; in New York City, which is cosmopolitan. We would whisk Mr. Lloyd George into the heart of either one of our great regions of authentic native cooking—New England or Dixie. In New England we should like to serve Boston baked beans and steamed brown bread, but this would hardly do in a course dinner. So, having in mind the season, we would tentatively suggest—oh, very tentatively and subject to numerous alternatives—a dinner of stuffed roast turkey with lots of thick gravy on the side, mashed potatoes, baked squash, cranberry sauce; pumpkin and apple pie, and coffee. In the South a choice would be easier. We should order fried chicken, candied sweet potatoes, lima beans, and beaten biscuit; caramel ice cream and coffee. We should certainly avoid that monstrous American invention, pie à la mode.

All of which we submit tentatively and humbly, not as cooks—the greatest of professions—but as mere editors, the most useless of all futilities. At least a million American housekeepers could better either list, and could cook it so seductively that Mr. Lloyd George would never return to Blighty.

Railroads and the Mechanics of Social Power

By AMOS PINCHOT

I. Can the Government Run Railroads?

(This is the first of three articles which aim to explain how through control of transportation a unified industrial-financial group has built up a power which dominates the politics and culture of America.)

I AM not going to begin these articles by saying that the railroads are the most important things in the world; nor am I about to tell you that commerce is the nation's life-blood and the railroads its arteries. We have heard this said—said well, said indifferently, and said badly for the last twenty years. Incidentally it is not true, though there is some truth to it, mainly of an accidental kind.

There are things more important to a nation's welfare than its railroads. For instance, its land, its natural resources, and the reality of its regard for justice. But the railroads are important enough; and, before long, they will be the storm-center, the issue and test of faith in momentous political campaigns which will divide the public into two camps—the believers in democracy, and the exponents and beneficiaries of various forms of privilege.

Unfortunately, the railroad question is not a very simple one. It cannot be answered by a mere comparison between the probable efficiency of private and government operation. Other considerations are involved, some of them exceedingly practical, others reaching down to the vitals of the theory of American life.

In almost every case our great monopolies, such as the coal, oil, steel, and beef trusts, owe their ability to prevent competition and sell products at extortionate prices to the fact that the railroads, controlled by the same interests as the trusts, give the latter unfair and illegal transportation advantages, which they deny to the companies that are outside the monopoly group. Experience teaches us that these advantages, many in number, powerful in their effect, ever changing and very hard to detect, cannot be done away with while our railroads stay in private hands.

Railroad regulation has failed. Its oldest advocates admit it. And, despite the no doubt sincere efforts of our commissions and the less sincere but equally futile dissolutions by our courts, the railroads, industrial trusts, and bankers continue to act together, each year more firmly united by the common purpose of protecting the advantages, privileges, differentials, or discriminations—it does not matter what term we use to describe them—on which their monopoly, power, and consequent profits depend.

The chief objection, then, to private railroading is not its inefficiency, its extravagance, or its dishonesty. It is, first, that independent competitive effort in our basic industries has become almost impossible because of the railroad-trust group's control of transportation, and, second, that by means of industrial monopoly built on private railroading vast and steadily increasing reserves of excess wealth—far above what is necessary to carry on business—are being concentrated in the railroad-trust group's hands. And this excess wealth, which is but another name for excess power, expressing itself in every phase of American life, is used not only to prevent competition and increase the prices of necessities of life, not only to cripple the initiative and functioning of independent capital, and not merely to destroy what Sumner of Yale used to call "the equal chance." It is also used, constantly and successfully, in shaping the attitude of the press, in guiding education and public opinion, and in capturing office-holders and political parties and through them controlling the action of State and Federal government.

The railroad question has been confused by such an immense mass of misleading propaganda that it is hard for most of us to make up our minds about it. Consequently, the safest thing is to maintain an attitude of what might be called suspended conclusion, meanwhile searching for more facts.

How much hard cash the railroads and industrial monopolies have put into propagandizing against government ownership it is hard to say. The sum probably runs far into the millions; for we have Mr. Frank J. Warne's testimony before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce that in the single year 1916 the roads spent eight million dollars in advertising expenses, hiring space in 17,000 newspapers to defeat the eight-hour day. And compared to government ownership the eight-hour day is a comparatively small issue.

Propaganda against government ownership generally runs along three definite lines: (1) That Federal control of railroads during the war proved that the government cannot administer a railroad system properly; (2) that the roads ran up a big deficit under Federal control; (3) that the government wrecked the roads and returned them to private ownership in "deplorable condition."

Of course, any one who stops to think realizes that conditions during Federal control were too abnormal to constitute a test of government operation. It was war time. As Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, head of the Southern Pacific Railroad and a staunch enemy of government ownership, pointed out before the Interstate Commerce Commission, the roads had to be run primarily for war purposes and "regardless of expense."

In the twenty-six months of Federal control the railroads were not and should not have been conducted as commercial enterprises or for commercial purposes. When the government handed them over to seven regional directors, six of them railroad presidents and the seventh a railroad vice-president, it said in effect: "The government hereby places America's transportation system in your hands. All that is asked of you gentlemen is swift hauling of men and supplies to tidewater for overseas shipment. Subordinate everything to this. Commercial business can wait. What the country needs is service, at all costs."

Now, if these seven men abused the confidence and large powers placed in them; if they sabotaged in order to discredit government control, as I do not for a moment believe, they should, according to war standards, have been taken out and shot. If, on the other hand, they tried their best, but failed to do a good job, it was not the government's fault; it was the fault of their own incompetence and the broken-down state the railroads had fallen into under their own banker-directorates. In reality, they did not fail.

The government gave the railroad presidents a free hand. During the twenty-six months of Federal control it patched up the roads to the tune of a billion and a quarter dollars. The government paid the companies the enormous rental of $906,000,000 a year, about 5 per cent on their total outstanding securities, water and all; admittedly much more than they could have earned. Likewise, in order to eliminate the chance of strikes, it radically advanced the wages of employees. Generally speaking, the function of the government was to appropriate money needed to put the roads in shape; to advance wages to secure the full cooperation of labor; to discipline some inefficient railroad presidents; and to insist on unification, common-sense car distribution, and business methods.

The results were, on the whole, good. The roads got along well under Federal control, because the executives, backed by the government and free from the domination of cream-skimming directorates, found themselves for the first time at liberty to do whatever they thought was right and necessary.

Enemies of public ownership have harped on the charge that, during Federal control, the railroads ran up a deficit of about $715,000,000. Let's examine this deficit. On February 28, 1920, in a report to the President of the United States, Director General Hines, counted in railroad circles a man of marked ability and conservatism, stated that $494,000,000 of the deficit was due to the fact that rates were not advanced simultaneously with wages and other operating expenses; also that the great coal strike had tied up the roads and cost them not less than $114,000,000. This would appear to explain most of the deficit, but an important contributing cause remains. The roads that had received land grants were obliged by their charters to carry soldiers and war supplies at about one-third to one-half below commercial rates. Sixty-six per cent of the prodigious volume of the government's war business was hauled at these low tariffs. In addition, there occurred a post-war slump in business and building, reaching its climax in February, 1919, when the average daily surplus in freight cars rose to 451,026, the highest on record. Also an extraordinary series of storms from November, 1919, to February, 1920, seriously interrupted railroad operation. These unusual circumstances occasioned, according to Mr. Hines, a further loss to the railroads of several hundred millions. All of these facts, little commented upon by the daily press, were enough to warrant Mr. Hines in writing to the President that the so-called deficit was "in no sense chargeable to Federal control as against private control."

As to the charge that the government wrecked the roads and returned them in "deplorable condition," let us see what shape they were in when the government took them. On March 22, 1917, President Rea of the Pennsylvania testified before the Interstate Commerce Commission as follows: "We realize that the condition of the railroads today presents a menace to the country, not alone to the owners of the properties, but as affecting directly the international situation."

Eight months later, or a month before the government took the roads over, after quoting an expert who estimated that our railroads required five billions to put them in trim, President Underwood of the Erie summed up the situation as follows: "It needs no gift of prophecy to foretell the financial end for railroads in the Northerly and Easterly sections of the United States except their net earnings are increased. There is a short word that indicates it—smash!"

The following month the Railway War Board, composed of five railway presidents, told the Interstate Commerce Commission that, in order to become a well-equipped machine, the railroads needed 2,000 new locomotives and 150,000 new freight cars, in addition to those already on order. During Federal control, according to the Director General, the government supplied 4,226 locomotives and 159,066 freight cars.

Now let us hear from the Interstate Commerce Commission. Late in 1917 it made an examination into the condition of the railroads. The day after the railroads were taken over, Commissioner Aitchison said: "The conclusion which we all reached was that existing conditions were intolerable and constituted a menace to the public safety."

How fully the railroad presidents themselves realized the havoc private management had wrought is shown by the way they snapped up the government's forced war-time generosity in providing funds to repair the damage. In the three years prior to Federal control the average annual expenditure for maintenance of equipment on Class I roads was $440,000,000. In the two years of government control the average rose to $971,000,000, an increase of $531,000,000 a year or over 100 per cent. In the same three years of private control, 1915 to 1917, the average bill for way and structures was $409,000,000. In the two years of government control the average was $708,000,000, a raise of $299,000,000 or 73 per cent.

The cold fact is that it was only the government's purse that saved the roads from a pretty complete debacle and Wall Street from a first-class shake-up. For most of the roads had been run, not in the interest of the stockholders, but for the benefit of an inside ring of trust magnates, manipulators, unprincipled financiers, and supply companies, the latter largely controlled by railroad and trust representatives and selling to the railroads enormous quantities of materials, according to Mr. Warne over $83,000,000 worth a month.

Railroad division engineers will tell you privately that Federal control worked and that the roads went back to private ownership in better shape than they left it. Privately, railroad presidents will tell you the same thing; so will Wall Street financial houses. They will admit, in confidence, that unification under the government was a sheer necessity. But only once in a while we find a railroad president, in an unguarded moment, letting slip to the public the truth about Federal control. Congratulating his colleagues on the savings made by Federal control, President Bush of the Missouri Pacific said: "Satisfying as may be the money savings throughout the country resulting from unification and coordination of railroad facilities and practice, the outstanding gratification is with respect to the accomplishments for the government and its allies by the unified railroads in the successful transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions of war to the ports of transshipment overseas." And Mr. Kruttschnitt declared, on March 10, 1921, before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce: "The railroads of Class I performed the greatest transportation task in their history, having during that year [1920] handled the largest volume of traffic, both freight and passenger, they ever handled."

The roads came back to private ownership on March 1, 1920. How, one might ask, could they have performed the feat mentioned by Mr. Kruttschnitt if they were returned in "deplorable condition." No fact is ever inconsistent with any other fact; facts never contradict each other. If, as we know to be true, the roads were on the rocks before the government took them, and if, as Mr. Bush and Mr. Kruttschnitt say, they functioned well, while and after the government had them, we are obliged to discredit the alleged fact that the government wrecked them and returned them shattered.

Can the government run railroads? Of course it can. As Mr. Ford says, there is no mystery in railroading. It is a fully developed, understood art, difficult only when you try to combine the inconsistent functions of milking the roads for the enrichment of insiders and giving the country sound transportation. The government runs an army, a navy, and a post office; a Panama canal and an Alaska railroad; it conducts huge irrigation, power, and reclamation projects, all more efficiently and certainly more honestly administered than the railroads are under private ownership. Though, for economic reasons which we need not discuss now, the government should not, in my opinion, take over any service except where monopoly is inevitable, it must be admitted that, in the government services enumerated above, there can rarely be found graft or conspicuous inefficiency, except in war time when the dollar-a-year men flock in, carrying with them their ideals and practices.

The history of public ownership has been the same everywhere. Whenever the government takes over a service that is of great importance, used by a majority of the voters, and where the difference between good and bad service affects the public's pocket, convenience, or safety in an obvious, unmistakable way, it is well handled. That is the rule. And when we take over and operate our railways, we shall discover that no administration will dare to give us such inefficient, expensive, dangerous, and dishonest railroading as we have endured for half a century. For politicians will quickly realize that to do so will surely make railroading the big issue in the next election and render the party in power liable to be swept out by an avalanche of votes.

In the next article, I will take up other and more imperative reasons for government ownership of railroads, including the part private railroads play in preventing competition in industry and in establishing monopoly and high prices.

MISSOURI: Doesn't Want to Be Shown

By MANLEY O. HUDSON

NOTHING is simpler than to throw a few millions of human beings into a hopper and ascribe to all of them qualities which not one of the individuals may possess. For a generation now four millions of Missourians have been herded under the music-hall slogan, "I'm from Missouri and you've got to show me." And as a consequence they have gained the reputation for being a cautious and inquiring people.

Now few things might be said about Missourians which would be further from the truth. In the large—by which I mean that I cannot produce statistics for what I am about to say—in the large, they deserve no credit for such skepticism. You do not have to show the Missourian. He knows already. And he is quite content to let it go at that. Missouri doesn't care to be shown!

Every time I come to town
Th' boys keep kickin' my dog aroun';
Makes no diff'rence if he is a houn',
You' gotta quit kickin' my dog aroun'.

This Ozark doggerel is not merely the original of Senator Vest's famous eulogy. It breathes also the sentiments with which the Missourian looks at the world. His dog may be a hound, but it is his and he proposes that others shall take it at his valuation. Missouri may not be the greatest State in the Union. Illinois may have a richer soil and a more prosperous people; Iowa may have a better organized community life; and Kansas, a quicker sense of civic responsibility and political opportunity. But Missouri doesn't care to hear about it. Missourians are satisfied with her, and she is satisfied with herself. Besides, who can say that Arkansas excels her in anything?

For Missouri—we who are to the manner born call her "Mizzourah" with no apology for rolling the r—Missouri is not merely a geographers' diagram. It is not simply a place. It is a state of digestion. It is a set of conventions. It is a slant on life. In brief, it is a civilization.

An effete Easterner whose travels in America are bounded by Baltimore on the south, by Buffalo on the west, and by Bar Harbor on the north may wonder that the straight lines remembered from his school geography as the boundaries of Missouri could so clearly mark out the personality of a people. I have met Americans on the Atlantic coast to whom Missouri was no more than a name for a river or a waltz or a compromise. Judging by the date-lines not many editors know today that Kansas City does not vote in Kansas. And perhaps few New Yorkers will be able to understand why it is that we resent their placing Missouri in that trans-Allegheny vastness which they call "the Middle West." Our query is, "West of what?" It all depends on where you start. We don't find Missouri west of where we begin to measure the continent. To us it is difficult to see why the rest of the country does not call it "the center." The nerve controls may be elsewhere. And we're willing to use Chicago as a sort of aorta through which to supply the rest of the country. But Missouri is the heart of America!

What other State was so favored by the geographers? The eight bordering States give Missouri a contact with the Great Lakes, the Alleghenies, all of Dixieland, the Gulf, and the Rockies. They make her the friend of the North and the South, the common ground of the East and the West, without identifying her with any section.

As a place, Missouri is not quite coterminous with the map-makers' shuffle. The two broad portals which she opens so generously to the outer world are for most purposes not part of Missouri herself. We must exclude St. Louis first of all. For that sprawling city lops over into Illinois and takes its cue from the screeching factories and glaring furnaces of other lands. It serves Missouri chiefly as a sieve for Eastern money and Eastern manners. It is a huge railroad terminal—the only American city besides Chicago where passengers always change. No train ever passes through St. Louis. It is an island of Germanic culture in a sea of American indifference. It once had a Fair which made it great, and the laurel has been borne in slumber these twenty years since. Only this year a bond issue seems to have waked it up; it was no mean thing to vote eighty-seven million dollars for improvements on the crest of a high tide of taxes. But except for Forest Park and its unique open-air theater, St. Louis sets no pace. It forms no part of Missouri. Even the postal clerks know it as St. Louis, U. S. A.

At the opposite end of Missouri's corridor, Kansas City stands as an outpost flung out by the great Southwest in its reach for Chicago. Busy, boasting, and Babbitt-ful, Kansas City holds a key position in the American system of interstate commerce. It is a way-station for the country's hogs and corn and oil. It is a warehouse for Montgomery Ward & Co. It has life but it lacks character. It once got bold enough to experiment with a Board of Public Welfare, but the courage faded when Jacob Billikopf went East. It lacks history, too, though a few of us can still recall the days when we bought our trousers from the Grand Pants Co. for "$1.75 a leg, seats free." Those were the good old days! Then as now Kansas City was like New York—all of its people come from somewhere else and many of them are still in transit. Like New York, it is a part of no State. It is interstate. It does not wear Missouri yarn, and its face is turned toward Kansas.

These exclusions leave to Missouri a territory larger than all New England, with a population almost as large as that of the Irish Free State. They leave the farmers who cultivate each year a half a million acres of wheat and oats and corn and hay. They leave the miners who produce a large part of America's zinc and lead and coal and iron. They leave a host of small villages, each consisting of a few houses clustered around a combined post-office-and-general-store which handles postage-stamps, prunes, and potatoes, all in the bulk. They leave St. Joseph, Kirksville, Hannibal, Columbia, Jefferson City, Sedalia, Springfield, Joplin, Carthage, Cape Girardeau—each with a niche in our national history, each with a Main Street all its own.

For its population, Missouri was originally indebted to three things—the bad land in Virginia, the failure of the potato crop in Ireland in 1847, and the revolution in Germany in 1848. From Virginia came a yeoman stock of purely English blood, urged by the hard times of the twenties to seek their fortunes in the promised land across the plains. Some of them stopped en route in Kentucky—in Madison County, Sir! A few of them brought their slaves along. But with the climate inhospitable to both cotton and tobacco, slavery got no firm hold in the State. An abolitionist conference at Lexington in the late twenties attracted little attention, and if Missouri was a bone of contention it was not due to her own defense of slavery. One-twentieth of the people are still black or mulatto, but we have no Jim Crow cars and a lynching or two a year is regarded enough to "make the Negro keep his place."

This Virginia immigration gave to Missouri society a Southern tinge which many communities still retain. They built their court-houses on the best Virginia models of the time, and where the court-house square exists today, with the town built around it—in Liberty, in Marshall, in Mexico, in Springfield—the architecture remains unsurpassed by any of the styles borrowed from Chicago or Cleveland suburbs. A Southern family tradition lingers, too, where the invading Yankees have not smothered it, and helps Missouri to resist change. I recall entering a farmhouse "in the kingdom of Callaway" a few years ago on a cold winter day, to find a glowing fire cracking out its welcome. As I held out my hands, I exclaimed to my host about his fire. "It ought to be good," he parried, "It's been burning long enough." I asked when it had been started. "In 1832. My father brought it out from Virginia when he came across the prairie in a wagon, and it's been burning ever since."

It was a very different strain that came from Ireland and from Germany. The Irish soon mixed, for here they never limited themselves to politics and the police force. But the Germans held aloof, and they still live in enclaves, secure from the ravages of puritanism. In the early days they captured South St. Louis, whence they've ministered since to many a thirst. They proved themselves superior agriculturists, and in the eastern counties they gradually crowded the Virginians out of the better bottom lands. With their militant ideas of freedom, they opposed the extension of slavery, they kept Missouri from seceding, they sent Carl Schurz to the Senate. More recently they held back the Volstead onslaught until the general capitulation. They began as Republicans in 1860, and they've voted straight ever since—until the combination of the war and prohibition led them to reelect Senator Reed. Content with what they have escaped in Europe and what they have found in America, they add no ferment to Missouri's society. They help to keep her satisfied.

The Atlantic seaboard is too far away for a large European immigration—there are some Greeks in St. Louis and a few Italians in Kansas City. But if some explorer sent out by the peasants of Southeastern Europe should ever rediscover Missouri, and if a 3 per cent limit would not bar it, the Ozark wilderness might be transformed into another Switzerland!

A traveler who journeys from Kansas City to St. Louis on the Wabash or the C. & A. or the Missouri Pacific or the Rock Island—all of our railroads seem to run east and west—may wonder about Missouri's prosperity. For in a land of teeming plenty, poverty still lifts its ugly head. But if we take as a test the existence of a favorable trade balance, there can be no doubt about it. Not that she depends on her foreign trade; if she chose to do so, Missouri could probably live more comfortably on her own resources than any other State in the Union. She could produce almost everything she needs except coffee and rubber, and doubtless the agricultural experiment stations would soon find substitutes for those luxuries.

But what community would care to be self-contained with such wares to spread its fame? There is, for instance, the corn-cob pipe on which Missouri holds a world-wide monopoly. Wherever a few smokers gather together, a hymn of thanksgiving can be heard for the Missouri meerschaum! Then there is the Missouri mule. He it was who won the war. Indeed he has won all the modern wars. He opened up Cuba for our bankers, he stilled the Boer's insolence, he elevated Japan to the international peerage, he waded through blood in the Balkans, and now he has made the world safe for Poincaré and Mussolini to play in. But he never gets a decoration. He was the only part of the A.E.F.

that got left behind in Europe. And a few days ago I saw him trying to win the peace in Haute-Savoie.

We take our religion very seriously—that is, we insist that every man must profess it and on all red-letter days we bow to its authority. We shouldn't think a marriage were valid unless a preacher tied the knot. And any renegade is entitled to a funeral from a church. But on ordinary week-days we don't allow ourselves to be greatly hampered by our faiths. On Sundays the Irish go to mass, the Germans gather in the Lutheran Church, and the rest of us are exhorted from the Baptist or South Methodist or Presbyterian or Campbellite pulpits. A small Virginian aristocracy is Episcopalian, and Christian Science was growing in power until its recent difficulties. The Latter-Day Saints have won a prescriptive right to their center in Independence. But for other queer peoples we have no time and no toleration. We don't care to be shown that our beliefs are not the only true beliefs. I once heard it whispered that a Baptist minister had gone over to Unitarianism, but the rumor was too awful to follow up. Since the war, we feel the citadels of our faith attacked by a newly strengthened modernism. William Jewell College recently dismissed a professor who had yielded to the temptations of the "higher criticism." Until the final victory is won, we must all be fighting fundamentalists.

As to our politics, they don't much matter. We like the game. A few men—and latterly women—play it and are much admired. A few more spectate. But Missouri was never a "sovereign independent State," and we look upon our State government as merely a local division under a government which has its seat in a far-off Washington. Bill Stone was far more interesting to us when he ruled the bosses at Jefferson City than when he was chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the United States Senate. We pointed with pride when three of our politicians—Clark and Folk and Hadley, not one of them native sons—were ranked among the presidential possibilities in a single electoral year. One reason for the toleration of Reed is the feeling that he wants what he wants when he wants it. In the ordinary campaign the inherited categories of Democrat and Republican are quite enough for us. The Prohibitionists have disappeared. As for being a Socialist, it isn't done. Our farmers were cold to Townley. On the whole, it is men not measures that matter. We endured an obsolete taxation system and an antiquated constitution for a whole generation. We didn't propose to take any new-fangled notions from Oklahoma or Wisconsin.

We keep a store of patriotism always ready, and on the war Missouri was ready to follow the lead of the East by going in or by staying out. Once in, it was necessary to have a certain measure of forced taxation in behalf of the Y.M.C.A. and the Red Cross, to prove that we were united. We held in readiness for any pacifist who might appear the same medicine that was administered to Lovejoy in 1836. We insisted that it was not enough for one to say that he was against the Kaiser and for the war—he had also to believe that the Kaiser was a mad dog loose in the world and that the war was a heaven-blessed righteous crusade or we questioned his Americanism. When it came to the peace, we were all for the League of Nations until our politicians got so nervous about it, and now—we wait for a lead from Washington.

Education is a necessity in Missouri, but only for those who are growing up. It ends with the close of the last spring term. A week of Chautauqua each summer and three Lyceum evenings during the winter are enough to keep the adults alive to an outside culture. I asked a Baptist home missionary what books he found in the homes he visited. Just two, he said, the Bible and the Sears-Roebuck catalogue. But in the towns, the parlor tables exhibit Wells's Outline and the latest Hutchinson novel—Sinclair Lewis would be resented. The State maintains a circulating library, and will send out a case of "standard authors" on proper demand, but the supply is quite equal to the demand.

But Missouri does not read books—she reads magazines and newspapers. Any up-to-date person will know the progress of the latest serial in the Saturday Evening Post. We once had a great magazine of our own, great because it introduced America to Spoon River; but his Mirror and Reedy were buried in the same grave. The new Point of View published in Kansas City "for all who are interested in Travel, Art, Architecture, Music and Drama," has yet to make its mark. And once, in Colonel Nelson's lifetime, we had a great newspaper—the paper that introduced daylight saving to America; but today, in spite of its wide territorial influence, the Kansas City Star takes no precedence over thirty other dull American dailies. In St. Louis, the Post-Dispatch still crusades in an intrepid and intelligent way for an old-fashioned brand of Pulitzer righteousness; and the Globe-Democrat, since killing off its hoary rival, the Republic, justifies its morning monopoly only by the excellence of its editorial page. But the leadership of the metropolitan dailies is fast waning. Missouri editors have gone to school to Walter Williams and their annual Journalism Week at Columbia is beginning to show results. The smaller cities are developing a press of their own, with United Press service, and the publication of a daily paper is coming to be one of the earmarks of urban respectability.

Another challenge to Missouri's self-satisfaction is bringing learning to the land. The farmers have begun to read government bulletins. The time was, not so many years ago, when the farmers and the homemakers knew more about their jobs than any bureau chief could tell them. But now they have capitulated to hard times and to the craze for modern babies. The farmer kills his hogs, fills his silos, and rotates his crops, and the homemaker cans her cherries, sets her hens, and nurses her baby according to the latest bulletin from the State University.

For the University of Missouri is bringing a revolution in lower as well as in higher education. Thirty years ago, in the pre-country-club period of American college education, it was a sleepy recruiting ground for the learned professions. The first shift came when athletics and highly colored sweaters captured the enthusiasm of the small town high-school boys and girls. The university began to standardize the high schools throughout the State, and that in turn drew it into the job of training the teachers to man them, or more accurately to woman them. The curse of too many colleges has been met by creating the rank of Junior College and by fitting the professional courses at the university onto the sophomore college year. The regimentation of the schools is now all but universal, with a few outstanding exceptions such as the original School of Osteopathy at Kirksville.

And now the College of Agriculture is regimenting the farmers. There are first the clubs to which the boys and girls at home go to spurt themselves in farm endeavor. Then the "short-horn course" at Columbia for the older ones who can be spared from home only during the slack winter months; four months in each of two winters makes a boy into a farmer who will never be a peasant. Then the regular four-year course which is training the farm leaders of the next generation—the county agents, the experiment-station experts, the teachers of agriculture, and the "gentlemen farmers." But most important is the Farmers' Week in January when even the genuine dirt farmers gather at Columbia to listen to lectures, to watch demonstrations, and to civilize up generally. There they courted favor with "Chief Josephine" while still she held the record as the world's largest-producing milch cow. They heard David Lubin once, and when he scolded them for not organizing and controlling their markets they took it sitting down. During the war they entertained an English lord.

It is a revolution which promises freedom from many a tyranny. The chinch-bugs and the chiggers have had their day. The menace of the grasshopper is gone. The weather man has lost his spell. The "hill-billies" are passing. Missouri has begun to be shown—by herself.

The millstone today is bad roads. The Missouri farmer was imprisoned until Henry Ford broke his chains. For fully a third of the year he is still mired in the mud. Recently the members of an automobile club, motoring from the Pacific coast to the automobile show in New York, had to take the train at Kansas City and ship their cars to St. Louis. But the reluctance to learn from road-building elsewhere is now yielding, and the Santa Fe Trail and the Jefferson Highway are promising beginnings. A sixty-million dollar bond issue, a non-partisan highway commission, and a project for primary and secondary roads for the entire State are the progress registered in a single year.

In spite of the mud, or because of it, each new generation seems to find its way out. Many towns seem to be peopled with old men. To Oklahoma, to Idaho, to California the boys go off. And though they never cease to be Missourians, they never come back. Many of them become famous, and a few deserve fame. There are Harlow Shapley, the astronomer at Harvard; Walter Stewart, the teacher at Amherst when Amherst valued teaching; Glenn Frank, the editor of the Century; Charles G. Ross, the Washington correspondent; Fred Deering, the Minister to Portugal—to mention only a few who are under forty. Every State has its great men; in Missouri we grow them for the rest of the country. And let it not be forgotten, we gave Mark Twain and Jesse James to the world!

The girls roam less and have a shorter range of opportunity. Everywhere they are teachers. We still have a notion that business is not their sphere. Journalism is opening up to them, and medicine and other social work. Domestic service, being the preserve of the colored folk, is not respectable for the whites. But most of the girls are drawn down that vista of dreariness which we refer to as "Just staying at home." And though we have always had fewer women than men, we count them lucky if the last call for the dining-car does not pass them by. Home means hard work for them, and often valiant sacrifice. But it is a world in which nothing happens.

I chanced to meet one of these stay-at-homes on a train out of St. Louis last Christmas Eve. She was tall, shapely, thin-skinned, with small ankles and small wrists but large feet and large-knuckled hands, and she still nestled up to twenty-five. The crowded condition of the car led to conversation, and I asked where she lived and what she did and what the prospects were. She lived in Warren County; though an artist by temperament, having once had a few lessons with Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, she was now a farmer; and the prospects were horrible. I dilated on the glories of a life out-of-doors. "You talk like a novel," she replied. "You haven't sat on a plow from sunrise to sundown for fifteen days straight running." "Well, don't you make money?" "We're supposed to be partners—father, mother, and I. But I never see any money."

I asked her how she spent her leisure. She read a bit—she liked Browning's poems and Barrie's plays. But there wasn't a library within forty miles and books were so hard to get. "But for Father Donovan's lending me books and giving me ideas, I'd go mad. Life gets so awfully dull. I get to a point now and then where I feel I can't stand it any longer." I inquired what her escape was. "I have to have a fling. There's no other way out." "Are you returning from a fling now?" "Yes. At breakfast two months ago I told my parents I couldn't go on another day; that I was going away. They asked where, and I said I didn't know. Away! They refused to drive me to the station, so I carried my suit-case and walked the eight miles. Fortunately I had saved a little money from the music class I used to have in Jackson County. I took the first train that came along and went to St. Louis. There I found a hotel, and went out to the theater. Next day I got a job as governess through the Y. W. C. A. The children had been unmanageable, but after a week I got the household straightened out. And tonight I did so hate to leave them. But then—that's not the way I want to live my life."

"And what now?" I asked. "I'm going home. The family want me to marry. But there's no chance to meet anybody except the farmer boys in the neighborhood, and they wouldn't understand why I have to have my fling. Tomorrow I'll feed the pigs, and I guess we'll soon be getting ready to put in the crop." When I had watched her greet her father at the station in Jonesburg, I spent the rest of my journey searching for the secret of a civilization which could produce such a human being.

Perhaps Missouri herself has been a stay-at-home too long. Saddled with the monotony and drudgery of plowing the fields, her life has lacked color. For too long she had no desire to see how the rest of the world was living, not even how it was doing its plowing. She did not want to be shown. But a new era is breaking. Missouri too must have her fling. And she is now beginning to look for it, in a flivver.

Little Old New England

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

GAZING toward the turmoils of the Upper Mississippi Valley and listening to the ejaculations of Brookhart, Shipstead, Magnus Johnson, Howell, Wheeler, Dill, and others, the country forgets that in New England, in ways more reticent but under compulsions equally painful, the local population is striving to discover an outlet from a great crisis into a new security.

In the Upper Mississippi Valley there is a claimed need for lower freight rates in order to retain a broad market for Northwestern agricultural products. In New England there is an equally claimed need for lower freight rates in order to retain a broad market for Northeastern manufactured products. Meanwhile, among all the groups of railroads in this country, the ones which most clearly are producing earnings so low as to make a rate reduction supremely difficult are precisely those of the Upper Mississippi Valley and of New England.

To a tourer of New England there is no scene of any abandoned village more affecting and more burdened with a message of the transitoriness of human power than the financial and political scene in which those great alleged masters of New England life—the New York, New Haven and Hartford and the Boston and Maine—are disclosed on their beds of agony and weakness, suffering excruciatingly from financial gout and industrial anemia, while their former subjects gather about them with bandages and bottles to see what can be done to nurse them back to mere servile serviceableness.

It was feared that these railroads would eternally rule New England. It is now feared that they may not be even reasonably able to run errands for New England.

Two plans—in the main—are brought forward for their restoration. Each of these plans would have been thought a few years since to be a plan of despair. One of them would sink the New England railroads into the trunk-line railroads which run between New York and Chicago, thus thoroughly surrendering New England rail transportation facilities into "foreign" control outside New England. The other would consolidate New England's principal railroads into one great regional rail transportation system with grants of public credit from the treasuries of the New England States and with boards of public trustees from the executive offices of those States.

Public ownership with private operation is an idea which frequently has been suggested and sometimes has been used in the settling of transportation problems. New England has developed the precisely reverse idea under which the ownership remains private and operation becomes public.

Public trustees, appointed by State authorities, have been quite successful, it is claimed, in improving the condition of the private owners of traction properties in eastern Massachusetts. Testimony before a committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Boston week before last showed from conservative lips that the public trustees appointed to operate those properties are believed to have done very well in comparison with the era of purely private credit and of purely private management which preceded them.

Accordingly, it was asserted, the Boston bankers who are suggesting public trustees for the management of a consolidated New York, New Haven and Hartford and Boston and Maine are doing so without fear of the results. Thus they show greater fearlessness than many Northwestern radical Senators who actually favor public operation of railroads but do not quite dare to say so. There are things which a member of Lee, Higginson and Company can safely say but which a member of the Farmer-Labor Party can say only at the risk of a grave loss of social standing in the Eastern press.

It is to be noted, however, that the public credit which the "Storrow Committee" would extend to the great New England railroads is credit from the local New England States, and it is to be noted that the public trustees which it suggests would be trustees appointed by New England local State governments. Appeal is not made to the Federal government for credit or to the White House for the trustees federally named.

For that local independence of character and of program New England deserves perhaps a visit of inspection from Senator Frazier of North Dakota. Here are people suffering large woes who wish nevertheless to be rescued by local agencies and not by Washington. To a Washingtonian the scene is one of heroic primitive Sabine virtue.

To regenerate their railroad transportation system and to get renewed good rail service; to regenerate their agriculture and to get a renewed effective countryside; to discover and develop new sources of power in order to supplement or replace the coal which comes so expensively from mines so distant at final costs so high—such are the problems that New England must solve if it wishes to retain its position in American life, and they exceed by far in difficulty the problems which confront the Northwest.

The Northwest needs to stop growing more wheat than the European world is willing to buy from off expensive American farm-land when it can buy wheat from off the cheap farm-lands of Canada and of the Argentine. The Northwest needs to turn a bit to other crops and heavily to cooperative selling societies. It needs to do things which are difficult and disagreeable in performance but easily and surely visualized. New England struggles with problems for which the solutions are visualized—if at all—with only the greatest uncertainty.

In New Hampshire men like Frank Knox of Manchester and ex-Governor Robert Bass of Peterboro have initiated a "survey" of the condition of their State and a prospective "program" for arresting the decline which it has shown in many particulars and for changing that decline into an advance. Ex-Governor Bass has incubated an ingenious proposed law for impounding water in new reservoirs at public expense on New Hampshire rivers, while meeting that expense in the end through contracts made beforehand with private manufacturing plants for the paid use of the surplus water. The future of New England, according to Mr. Bass, lies in cheap power from water sources, in skilled labor of the highest training, and in manufactured products so clearly and uniquely the result of such labor that they will be able to travel great distances at high freight rates and still on their merits find a market at high profitable prices.

To a traveler from the national capital New England exhibits a consciousness of a grave crisis, but most admirably a will to live it through and dominantly to live it through by its own exertions.

WHEN Everett took a job as truck driver for a large Philadelphia concern he did not say that he was "colored." Tall, white, with brown hair and brown eyes, and with Caucasian—or should I write Nordic?—features, nothing in his physical appearance betrayed his "race." Week in and week out he worked steadily, apparently giving entire satisfaction, earning the praise of his boss. Suddenly he was "let go." A real white man, a friend from his Jersey home, happening to secure work for the same firm, had given the information that Everett's mother and father, sisters and brothers, all of whom he personally knew, were "colored."

"But I'm the same man I was yesterday, ain't I?" protested Everett to the boss.

"Why yes, but you're colored. It would hurt the business—the other men won't work with a ——."

All right, then, he'd be "colored," he determined, as he stamped out, flaming.

In New York he applied to the Pullman Company for a job as a sleeping-car porter. The man at the desk looked up at him in amazement and replied: "We can't use white men as porters."

"But I'm not white, I'm colored," Everett fiercely declared. No use. The other, unconvinced, waved him politely out. Everett was never sure whether the man believed him simply a plain liar or a new brand of interesting lunatic.

The widow Moore is the daughter of her former Virginia master by one of his slaves. She is stately, gray-haired, with bluish-gray eyes, and far from unfashionable in dress. She listed with the Barton Rental Agency a piece of property she owns, and did not state that she was "colored." In due time Barton's "For Rent" sign appeared in the front window of her vacant house. Some time later she called at the agency. Mr. Barton told her that her house seemed a bit hard to rent, that is, to desirable tenants. She should be patient, however. The house would certainly be rented, and to first-class people, too. They did not rent to any other class.

"Of course," he continued, "we could easily rent to colored, for example, but ——"

"Well, why not? Colored people are good people, aren't they?"

"I'm not saying they aren't, but when they get into a property it depreciates. If you should want to sell later, you would lose money. Moreover, any agency which places colored among white people thereby earns an undesirable and unprofitable reputation. We therefore make it a business point not to ——"

"Have you had any applications from colored people?"

"Oh, several."

"Then rent it to them. Why keep the house idle if they are good people and can pay?"

"Sorry, madam, but we shall have to decline ——"

As the widow Moore was leaving Barton's office, she had a consuming desire to fling back at him the scorching words: "I'm colored." She thought how much she would enjoy seeing him writhe as they annihilated him. Instead she went out and rented her house—to "colored."

The brown letter carrier bought a house in the very middle of a block occupied entirely by whites. When the day to move came, he went to his work as usual, while his blonde, pink-cheeked, blue-eyed wife superintended the transfer of their household goods. She wore no tag stating that she was "colored."

Her new neighbors watched the emptying vans from behind front-room curtains and upstairs windows. Late in the afternoon, when the greater part of the preliminary "settling" was over, the lady next door ventured over.

"You must be tired, working here all day by yourself. I just thought I'd run in and ask you if you would not like to come over and have a cup of hot tea or something with me." The blonde wife went.

The brown letter carrier finished his day's work, hurried to the new home, slipped into rough clothes, and began to busy himself about the yard. The lady next door and his wife were in the midst of a pleasant neighborly chat, finishing their luncheon. The former was saying: "I'm so glad I had a little something in the house. It's such an awful job to move. Now, anything I can do until you get straight, let me know. Just come right over any time and use our stove and things until yours is connected." The postman's wife thanked her.

"Your yard man has come, I think," the neighbor continued, as she saw the brown man in overalls in the yard.

"Oh, that's my husband," said the carrier's wife, and without waiting to see what visible effect this pronouncement had—an omission she now decidedly regrets—she ran out to him. But the lady next door "does not speak" now, and the neighborhood bristles with antipathy against the interlopers.

IV

None of his friends seems to have known what blood mixture filled Norton's veins. He himself was able to account for three strains—American Indian, American white, and Mexican. He had the complexion of an Italian, his head was covered with a mass of deepest black hair, and he wore the long curling mustache of the vogue which preceded the present truncated, stubbly fashion. At any rate he certainly did not state that he was "colored."

When I first met him he was a night clerk in the Brookline, Massachusetts, post office, dreaming of the day when, with a friend who was both violinist and composer, he would entrance a waiting world with the beauties of an exceedingly graceful light opera to the preparation of which they both devoted all their spare moments. Suddenly he became violently religious, and vehemently damned the very art to which hitherto he had been ardently attached. He joined a church in the shadow of Faneuil Hall. He and his wife became prominent in its activities, and with the inspiration and approval of its pastor, he prepared himself for missionary work in India. The missionary board approved his application. He went to the New York offices to complete preliminaries. Somehow information seems to have reached the board that he was "colored." Perhaps some member of the church had drawn that conclusion from the fact that his wife was indubitably "colored," and this startlingly subversive intelligence had been communicated to the board. At any rate, upon seeing him the good gentlemen of the missionary board were sure that some unaccountable mistake had been made. They were profuse in their apologies. In spite of their written approval of his application for service in India which he held, it seemed that they had intended to state "service in Africa." It is reported that they oiled their explanation of this unusual blunder with the same old quasi-pious stuff which white Christians too frequently employ when confronted with a Negro demanding mere human consideration. "Colored people are so much happier among their own, you know." "Africa should make a particularly compelling appeal to every consecrated colored man," and so on.

But Norton was interested in souls, he said, and not in the color of human skins. He left the board's rooms convinced that there was a mistake and that he had made it. He had seriously misjudged the board. Bitterly he reflected afterwards that he had thought that they were Christians!

His missionary zeal did not at once abate, and so he started with his wife on a tour through the South, with the avowed purpose of converting the Negroes there. He had desperately determined to be "colored." They got as far as Petersburg, Virginia, became upset and frightened at the hostility they engendered among the Negroes by their frank, somewhat superior-minded assumption that they needed conversion, and returned, cured, to the North, where Norton accepted the pastorate of a church in a New England town. But his disillusionment must have been both thorough and permanent, for not long afterward he had given up religious work for good and was driving a huge auto truck for some New York business house.

One winter morning he was found frozen to death in the city's streets. It is said that his mind had become deranged from brooding over his abortive missionary efforts. His widow now does uplift work in a Jim Crow Y. W. C. A. in a Southern city. And the soft-voiced, elderly gentlemen of the missionary board, one supposes, still approve "colored" missionary applicants for service—in Africa only.

Billers

By ANN HAMILTON

Forty or maybe fifty year
Tim Billers wore a coachman's gear,

Drove for Mister and Missus Brown,
Steered their carriage round the town,

Fussed with horses all his life
To buy bread for a snappish wife;

His cloth hat made his face look hot,
He always joked around a lot;

A great one to be awful kind—
Quiet and kind as you could find.

Then Brown got in a bunch of crooks,
Lost some money and pulled the hooks,

Skinned Billers out of all he'd earned
Since the first time his hand was turned;

And one day down on Center Street
Billers shot him and fixed him neat;

But people seemed to understand,
And crowded up to shake his hand.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter himself was educated in the old-fashioned way. He went to school at nine o'clock, not because of any deep desire for instruction at that hour but because he was punished for being tardy. From nine to three he lived by rule; he could not speak without permission; he progressed from room to room not by himself but standing in line with his fellows; he was frowned upon if he laughed, or scuffled his feet, or dropped a book, or wriggled in his chair, or failed in the smallest detail to maintain a decorous and highly unnatural demeanor. From time to time he has read with interest of the experiments in education which are going on around him. There are schools, he learns, where "the nature-study room is ready to receive the collection of snakes, mice, kittens, and puppies which children are already bringing." He reads that "the deadening effect of artificial discipline is very evident," and that "in freedom alone can the individual experience the inherent quality which is contained in every existing thing."

* * * * *

HE has eagerly awaited statements from the parents of students at these paradises of education. "My child," he expected them to say, "at six shows signs of becoming a great painter," or "My young daughter, aged twelve, manages the household with more ease than I do," or "Just from his experiences at playing grocery store in school my boy is a better mathematician than his brother in high school who never had the advantages of a real education." And alas, what actually are the reports? "My son at twelve can neither read nor write nor spell; I am afraid I shall have to take him out of that school." "That school may be all right for shy, backward children, but for our two, who have already so much energy and gusto and persistence that no one in the house has any peace, it is simply ruinous. We cannot stand the strain of so much freedom." "They don't think it is proper for a child to read at her age and of course she has read since she was four and loves it, and she simply refuses to be amused by paper cut-outs or wooden beads on a string." And the most disturbing report of all is that one of the most modern of the schools is contemplating going back to the old primary system where Order and Discipline and Quiet and Rules are the first lessons taught, if not the first ones learned.

* * * * *

IT is all very perplexing. The world, though not exactly full of, is nevertheless partly populated with, persons whose minds are free, fresh, and able to receive or even to create a new idea. The Drifter knows a few such persons; and every one of them is a product of the old system. Obviously these are happy accidents. For a time he was joyful in the thought that under the new system of education such accidents would be more frequent. And so they may be; yet it is barely possible that some people are born to be free and some to be slaves; the latter, under any sort of tuition, and with any amount of freedom, will not learn the proper relationship between themselves and the universe, and the former cannot be kept from learning it. While these abstruse questions are being settled, however, the Drifter almost wishes that he were back in school; he would not insist on perpetual freedom but he would enjoy being keeper of the school menagerie.

Spain Today

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The article published in your issue of September 26, under the heading of The Revolt in Spain, is a tissue of happy-go-lucky inaccuracies, intermingled with some occasional truisms which, in trying to explain all, leave all in a maze of obscurity.

Whether the individual Spaniard is as democratic as painted is a matter of individual appreciation. I believe he is. But the assertion that the Spanish Government is the most autocratic in Europe (Russia and Italy temporarily excepted) is far from true. Really, in Spain, never in my recollection was there a government in the approved sense of the term. To call it "misgovernment," while true enough, would not fit in exactly, nor do I find any appropriate word in English to designate the actual thing, which in Spain itself is called desgobierno, something akin to "ungovernment." Whoever says that the King of Spain rules by divine right ought to know better, for he does nothing of the kind. Much less does he appoint ministers, life senators, ecclesiastical dignitaries, and the like, although he has, perhaps, something to do with the decorative part of the system, that is, the bestowing of decorations and grandeeships of the realm. As to appointing army officers he has no power at all. The War Minister brings the nominations in batches every year from the military colleges for the King's signature, and that is all the King does—the signing up. As to the high officers, the Minister can be depended upon to have them appointed among his friends and retainers. The same can also be said of the ecclesiastical appointees, who are all recommended by the Minister of Justice.

The Spanish Senate contains 300 members, 150 of whom, that is, half the number, are elected through compromisarios or senatorial electors, just as the President of the United States. Whether the elections are fair or unfair is another and altogether different question. Perhaps it concerns others than Spaniards. That the grandees are exempted from taxation is a huge hoax. There may be tax-dodgers among them, of which there are said to be quite a few outside of Spain. On the other hand, there is no doubt of King Alfonso's popularity.

Miguel de Unamuno has not been punished otherwise than by demotion from rectorship to professorship at Salamanca. He was once tried and convicted of lese majeste, sentenced to seventeen years of hard labor, and pardoned a few days afterward by the King. In fact, he never was in prison. As to his demotion from rectorship to mere professorship, while I do not know the exact motive or pretext, I have heard that it was based on the fact that his mental faculties were impaired and that the distinguished professor had become an actual crank and a bore.

New York, September 22 Ramón A. Martínez

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I can well understand why Mr. Martínez should find my article on Spain full of "inaccuracies." Politically we speak totally different languages. I take the point of view of the liberals and he of the royalists. I fully agree with Mr. Martínez that Señor Unamuno is guilty of lese majeste; he regards it as his mission in life to liberalize the Spanish monarchy. Mr. Martínez states on hearsay that Señor Unamuno's "faculties were impaired" and that he is a "crank and a bore." I have had the pleasure of hearing Señor Unamuno speak in public, I have read most of his writings, and I consider him Spain's greatest intellectual and moral force. No less an authority than James Fitzmaurice Kelly rates Señor Unamuno as Spain's greatest living man of letters.

Before going to Spain I, too, cherished the current foreign notion that Alfonso was a popular monarch. Were Mr. Martínez to visit Spain now, I am sure that he would not be so stout a defender of the Spanish King. In his youth Alfonso was looked upon as the beloved messiah who was to free his people from centuries of almost continuous warfare. They want only bread and peace. But instead of peace he gives them war, and for bread he gives them a stone. Peoples today no longer suffer in silence and pay for the gambling debts and amorous escapades of absolute monarchs while their sons are slaughtered because of the criminal negligence of the appointees of their rulers. Mr. Martínez says that there is "ungovernment" in Spain. For that very reason the Spanish King is an autocrat. Some one must hold the reigns tightly in a land where anarchy threatens the state, and Alfonso has usurped powers which were not conferred upon him by the constitution of 1876, ostensibly still in force. By this constitution Alfonso is empowered to suspend guaranties when parliament is not in session. Professor Ogg, in his "Governments of Europe," says: "It need hardly be pointed out that the opportunity for the evasion of constitutionalism which is created by this power of suspension is enormous, and anyone at all familiar with the history of public affairs in Spain would be able to cite numerous occasions upon which upon pretexts more or less plausible the guaranties of the fundamental law have been set at naught."

Now when a king makes and unmakes ministries without regard to parliament or people it looks very much as though he ruled by "divine right." It may be that the ministers of war and of justice recommend military and ecclesiastical appointees, but if a minister of war or a minister of justice is responsible only to a king and not to parliament he easily degenerates into a convenient rubber stamp. Alfonso has had to bow so often to popular clamor in his appointments and dismissals that, fearing for his throne because of recent riots and mutinies, he either secretly engineered himself or allowed to be engineered the military coup d'etat of Señor Primo de Rivera, a general and a nobleman. The present dictatorship is a clever camouflage on the part of the King to save his tottering throne.

Again, if Mr. Martínez will examine the constitution of 1876 he will see that one-third of the senate is appointed by the King for life. As to the question of exemption from taxation of grandees and ruling class in general, that is one of the burning issues in Spain today. The liberals reiterate again and again that the privileged classes do not pay their taxes and that the poor man bears the burden alone.

Lingerie in Oklahoma

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Just before Attorney General Palmer made his mighty effort to make this country unsafe for the safe and insane for the sane, I purchased two suits of red flannel underwear. Some time after this Mr. Palmer made his fierce drive on Reds. In those days I was getting small wages and my outside clothes were very thin. I was almost certain that if the seams ripped or the goods broke and my red undergarments were brought to light I would be arrested and charged with being a dangerous radical who wore a red flag wrapped around his abdomen. So I pulled them off and locked them up in the trunk.

A few months ago I bought myself three white nightgowns—yes, I know that a he-man should not wear nightgowns, but they are very nice to sleep in when used for that purpose. Well, a short time after the purchase Governor Walton busted into the Klan. One of my neighbors says that if he sees anyone prowling around in the night time with a nightgown on he will shoot first and investigate afterward. Sometimes I hear the chickens squawking and I get up to see what is the matter and run outdoors before I realize my danger. But after due deliberation, I have decided that until safe and sane times come and until the commandment "Mind your own business" is taught it will be best to lock up my nightgowns with the red underwear and stick to B. V. D's.

A Victory for Passive Resistance?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Since Homer is said to have nodded, I suppose that we must expect even The Nation on occasion to nod. I am sorry, however, that the nod came on such an issue as the abandonment of the passive resistance policy in the Ruhr. This is not a triumph of force, not a defeat of passive resistance, as you have stated. On the contrary! For nine months the passive resisters have held the whole military power of France at bay. They have made the French invasion a futile and foolish thing. See, for evidence, J. Henry Scattergood's testimony in his address at Williamstown! Hopelessly defeated in his purpose to conquer the German citadel by force of arms, Poincaré at last looked for traitors to betray it and found them in the great German industrials and their puppet, Stresemann. The German people have been sold out. But passive resistance remains what it has been from the beginning, a weapon more potent than an "army with banners"—and machine-guns.

Intellectual Washington

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Returning from my vacation The Nation for September 5 has been placed before me and I have read your article entitled Washington: A Capitol Without a Thunderer. Permit me to offer comment on one sentence that has for me and for others with whom I discussed the article a very bitter taste and which is, I believe, essentially false. I refer to the sentence in which you state, in referring to the newspaper press of Washington, that "its intellectual level has, over a long period of time, been that of the bulk of its poorly salaried constituency."

Now I cannot think that you wish to slur the government employees because they are badly underpaid or that you wish to give the idea that our intellectual level is low because of our underpayment. Furthermore, I thoroughly believe that it is absolutely incorrect to state that the intellectual level of the government employees is low. I believe that I am in a position to know the facts with reference to this matter. From my nineteen years' experience here I believe that there is no librarian in the United States who has a more intelligent constituency or a constituency with a keener appetite for the best literature, including plenty of high-brow stuff! It has always been one of our handicaps that we are unable to supply the demand for the best worthwhile books of non-fiction as they are published. For example, we were never able to buy more than twenty or twenty-five copies of Wells's "Outline of History," whereas the insistent demand for that book would have justified us in buying fifty or more copies had we been able to afford them. In spite of the fact that we have almost no branch libraries we have a registration of over 60,000 readers and an annual circulation of over 1,000,000 volumes. This means that our readers come miles for the privilege of securing books. It is unfair to say that the intellectual level of this town is low.

Peace, in Normandy

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Is it perhaps a symbol that across the bay from Havre where every day enormous ocean liners disembark numberless visitors to the Old World a little center has lately been established dedicated to the study of international problems? All the world has lately seen the exploiters of public opinion, unrestrained by conscientious scruples, deliberately creating a false and dangerous international situation. The public mind is being so misled that everywhere men and women of vision, fearful of the sinister future being prepared for mankind, ask in dismay whither the world is tending.

To what, indeed, will mankind be brought if these dangerous doctrines, scattered broadcast across the world, are not exposed in their falsity? Today merely to assume the right of criticism requires audacity; to attempt to combat the situation is to assume a crushing burden.

It is to this overwhelming task that the little conference, called last summer at Honfleur, dared to dedicate itself. While the evil psychology of war still dominates the world, in this quiet corner of Normandy a noteworthy effort toward international education is being made. Here year by year serious minds will meet and exchange opinions, and here future policies will be discussed and amplified in an atmosphere of liberal thought.

Each year it is planned to follow the program successfully established during the three-week session of the past summer. One after another a succession of competent men and women of varying nationalities met and discussed from various angles contemporary problems, international, sociological, and economic, always in an atmosphere of liberal thought and in complete freedom. Never by official means could such a real rapprochement have been attained. The effort of such a resolute group must do more to establish human brotherhood than could all the diplomatic missions in the world, charged with diplomatic lies. Is it too much to hope that in the future the work of the Honfleur Conference may prove a weighty factor in the struggle for the truth? Such an effort deserves every encouragement. In France the friends of peace hail with joy the initiative of the little group that has called the Honfleur Conference into being.

A Protest Against Indiana Imperialism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Without wishing to detract from the glories of Indiana, as revealed by Theodore Dreiser in The Nation of October 3, I must, as an Ohioan, object to his annexing William Henry Harrison to the Hoosier State. Though born in Virginia, General Harrison made Ohio his home and was elected to Congress and to the Presidency therefrom. He is buried at North Bend. Tecumseh, whom he fought at Tippecanoe, was also an Ohio man. Thomas A.—not Thomas B.—Hendricks, was Vice-President of the United States and he was born in Muskingum County, Ohio!

A Correction

In its issue of September 26 The Nation made the following statement in an editorial note:

> Non-resident fees in State universities are a common provision, but the University of California has added to its fee of $150 for students from outside the State an extra sum of $50 for all foreigners. Whether they live in the State or not, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, foreign students who have not taken out their first papers must pay both fees.

The San Francisco Chronicle, it appears, and consequently The Nation, was in error. B. M. Woods, the assistant dean of the University of California, assures us that this statement is unwarranted. He says:

> The university has never required alien students to pay tuition or other fee additional to that collected from all non-residents of California. Non-resident aliens and non-resident students of the United States are treated exactly alike.

We are particularly glad, in view of our strictures on the reported practice, to print this correction.

Confusing Psychology

Psychological Types. By C. G. Jung. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.50.

IN psychological works by Englishmen one is frequently impressed by the distillation into simplicity of profound insight and elaborate scholarship. In similar works in the German tongue one is time and again astounded by the indirectness, obscurity, and dogmatism with which a few simple—and questionable—ideas can be expounded. In this instance the fault may be in the translation. But it would have to be a very bad translation indeed which could turn decent German into such appalling English. One reads page after page in pained disbelief. The words, with a few hundred barbarous exceptions, seem English enough. But the cadence of the phrases, the structure of the sentences, the architecture of the ideas are like nothing to be found in any major European language. Certainly if Mr. Jung's book is even readable in the original, then his translator owes him and his English-reading public an apology. This reviewer can certify to having read the six hundred pages with care. He can urge no one, save gluttons for literary punishment, to do likewise.

It is a great pity. For despite its pretentious jargon, its weird generalizations, its petulant bombast masquerading as science, the book is interesting. Mr. Jung has attempted the hopeless and tempting task of classifying human beings into psychological types. Coleridge, it will be recalled, divided mankind into Platonists and Aristotelians, Gilbert and Sullivan observed that "every little boy or gal that's born into the world alive is either a little Liberal or else a little Conservative." An unremembered wit said there were two classes of people in the world: those who divided people into two classes and those who did not. Mr. Jung has his two pet types and his four favorite subdivisions under each, and in an intelligible prose they might have been as illuminating as any others. Under the names extravert and introvert, Mr. Jung calls attention to the familiar distinction among human beings between those who are characteristically controlled in their conduct by the external world of facts, objects, and conditions, and those who are moved for the most part by their undisciplined dreams, their irrelevant visions, and their uncontrolled fantasies and desires. (As Mr. Jung concludes his ponderous volume with a hundred and six pages of what his favorite words mean in his vocabulary, the reviewer trembles to use any word in its common or garden variety of meaning.)

Mr. Jung's distinction has been made time and again under different names: the classic and romantic, the objective and the subjective, the rationalist and the sentimentalist, the tender minded and the tough minded. It has received classic illustration in Hamlet and Ulysses, in Mary and Martha, in Rachel and Leah. Mr. Jung himself spends some four hundred pages in culling examples of this distinction in "history, poetry, psychiatry, aesthetics, and philosophy." So copious and omnivorous are his explorations that at times the book seems for all the world like a parody of German Wissenschaft written by Stephen Leacock or Robert C. Benchley.

The distinction probably holds water, though Mr. Jung does almost nothing to show how much or what variety of water it does hold. He complicates and classifies still further by calling solemn attention to the fact that both the extravert and the introvert may be moved primarily by reason, feeling, sensation, or intuition. There are a good many pages about the last named, but intuition remains none the less as vague and sloppy a term as it is in the hands of Maeterlinck or Bergson, or in the practitioners of the Higher Life meetings that fill ballrooms on Sunday afternoons in New York hotels.

Now Mr. Jung is a distinguished and successful psychiatrist at Zurich, and gives evidence even in this book of being a sensitive knower of men. But page after page he turns local insights into cosmic dogmas, and plausible suggestions into the silliest of "world laws." Somewhere in the muddled stream of these six hundred pages Mr. Jung points out that if you criticize a man's work you simply show that your "type" is not "in rapport with," "projects no parallelism with," "has simply a negative relation with" the type you criticize. The present reviewer, even after six hundred pages, is unable to say whether he is an extravert or an introvert, or whether thought or intuition is with him a primary or mediate function. He can only say in all frankness that the book seems a notorious instance of that pretentious verbalism, that mechanic of thought without its content, which justly brings learning into disrepute. Psychology at its best is a highly suggestive form of literature; it gains nothing but a bad reputation by palming off flub-dub science.

The Art of the Singer

Lillian Nordica's Hints to Singers. Transcribed by William Armstrong. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

The Art of the Prima Donna and Concert Singer. By Frederick H. Martens. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

NEARLY ten years have passed since the death of Lillian Nordica. In spite of the lapse of time and in spite of the rise to fame of younger singing-women, it holds true that anything the late Mme Nordica has to say to the singers and the would-be singers of today possesses a quite special value. Mme Nordica's talent was not one of those Minerva-like phenomena that spring into being practically perfected. In the absorbing pages of these "Hints to Singers" an unremitting worker speaks to other workers.

Underlying an extraordinary career is the determining fact that Lillian Nordica first of all learned really to sing. This basic mastery of vocal technic proved an unfailing stand-by. Her steady recognition of that fact, together with the caprice of fate that deprived her of the natural facility with which not a few eminent singers have been endowed, imparts to the hundred-odd pages of her "Hints" their peculiar and abiding worth.

A somewhat longer companion book to the Nordica volume is "The Art of the Prima Donna," by Frederick H. Martens. It really consists of hints to singers by not one but twenty lyric ladies. Mr. Martens has interviewed the twenty—"heart-to-heart talks" is his exact language. "In easy, conversational fashion," he adds, "they present the lessons of experience which has led them to the summits of vocal success."

It may perhaps seem ungracious to begin by charging Mr. Martens with a sin of omission, but really one cannot help wondering at the conspicuous absence of certain names from the twenty prime donne that he selects. It is hard to see how he could manage not to call on Mmes Fremstad and Garden, Mmes Melba and Tetrazzini. Mme Sembrich's long career would seem recent enough, as well as important enough, to entitle her to an honored place in the book. Mme Matzenauer could certainly contribute matter of exceptional interest. And perhaps no singer before the public is better qualified to expound instructively the art of the prima donna than Mme Frances Alda. And yet not one of those distinguished singing-women is summoned to give testimony in Mr. Martens's court. However, though some of the inclusions in his company of twenty (in view of the omissions, at least) may occasion a mild surprise, he does allow his readers to hear from Mmes Calvé, Schumann-Heink, Farrar, Homer, Galli-Curci, Hempel, Raisa, Jeritza, Verlet, and Easton.

If a sufficient proportion of these heart-to-heart confessions do not greatly transcend the lingerie-and-tatting stage of lyric experience, there is also a lot of solid meat in the book. For instance, all that Mme Calvé has to say is worthy of close attention, including her defense of the discreet use of gesture on the concert stage. "Breathe right and you will sing right," sententiously remarks Mme Schumann-Heink—a fundamental truth that her own singing nobly illustrates. Mme Galli-Curci and Mme Hempel prove particularly judicious and practical in their advice. "As I see it," remarks Mme Rosa Raisa, "the real soprano, the artist who has voice and musicianship, should be able to sing every kind of soprano role, as they did in the old bel canto days," and there Mme Raisa, who, thanks to her early studies with Barbara Marchisio, was trained in the authentic spirit of bel canto, nails the modern fallacy of an extreme vocal specialization.

Unfortunately the substance of wisdom is not the whole of this book. We find the same old contralto wail about the unattractiveness of most contralto roles—"villainesses," witches, shrews. As a matter of fact, there is a whole treasury of contralto parts that these ladies seem not even to suspect. Do they know, to take a single example, that Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" was written for a low voice? If one or other of the complaining contraltos would only prove to managers and public that she can sing and play Rosina . . .!

Mme Easton voices some debatable opinion. "Never sing your top notes needlessly," she warns. "Old Sims Reeves used to say that every singer had just so many top notes and used them up, one by one." If that contention be true, Lilli Lehmann ought to have gone into vocal bankruptcy long ago. And yet in her eighty-first year she still can sing the top E, and does. Nor did any one ever accuse Mme Lehmann of parsimony in the expenditure of high notes. Quite the contrary!

The section of the book allotted to Mme Farrar, being particularly personal and vivacious, is bound to have readers. "I am by no means the first or last to present a successful Butterfly. At least two singers vocally my superiors [the italics are mine] have sung the part." "I think the role of Carmen is great fun, because it demands much high animal spirits and pulchritude, and the singer first of all must absolutely look her part, so that every man in the house who sees her will wish to send his card behind the wings." The frankness and liveliness of such and kindred statements are most engaging.

But Mme Farrar is just as blithely positive where the records do not bear her out. What does she mean by saying of Carmen that "no contralto has ever carried this role to success"? Did she never hear of a singer named Trebelli, nor of another named Maria Gay? And doubtless the best representative of the Spanish gypsy in our century, with the possible exception of Emma Calvé, was another contralto, Clotilde Bressler-Gianoli.

Mme Farrar is not so wary as to avoid repeating ignorant cant like the following: "Formerly, all she [the opera singer] had to do was to step out on the stage and pay attention to nothing but her song. In fact, so different are the two types of opera, that to ask any great exponent of the modern dramatic score to sing a Bellini aria, would be like asking Dempsey to pick up a pin." Mme Raisa might have something to say to that, as well as Mme Farrar's adored teacher, Lilli Lehmann. So might women named Pasta, Malibran, Grisi, Viardot-Garcia, Titiens, if they could speak to us. And what on earth is Mme Farrar thinking of when she declares: "Practically the only great Italian singer who has gone beyond his own country's repertory was Caruso"?

As for singing "from the inside, out," why "Calvé was the first to call attention to it by 'being it,' and together with Miss Mary Garden and myself, developed the singing actress of the modern repertory." At this point the ensorcellated reader can do nothing but reverently close the book and call for three rousing cheers from the living and the dead!

The danger to students that lurks in such a book as Mr. Martens's is illustrated to perfection in the gay and sparkling misinformation with which an interview with a prima donna, though perfectly innocent in its intent, may so easily abound. The book as a whole is rich in wisdom, in sound and mature counsel, but the burden lies with the reader of distinguishing the wheat from the chaff.

Greek and Roman Classics

Loeb Classical Library: Geography of Strabo II. Translated by H. E. Jones.—Polybius III. Translated by W. R. Paton.—Hippocrates. Translated by H. S. Jones.—Cicero de Senectute, de Amicitia, de Divinatione. Translated by W. A. Falconer. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 each.

Our Debt to Greece and Rome: 10a. Cicero and His Influence. By John C. Rolfe. 33. Warfare by Land and Sea. By Eugene S. McCartney. 36. Mathematics. By David Eugene Smith. Marshall Jones Company. $1.50 each.

Broadway Translations: Petronius, the Satyricon. Translated by J. M. Mitchell. The Girdle of Aphrodite—The Love Poems of the Palatine Anthology. Translated by F. A. Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3 each.

THAT literature—whether original, imitative, or compiled—owes a mighty debt to the fostering warmth of patronage is not to be disputed; on the whole it is probable that quality thereby, as well as quantity, has gained rather than suffered. Interesting enough in these days is the sight of a stream, issuing from this benign source, of the Greek and Roman classics and of treatises, fresh and modern in spirit, on our debt to the life of Greece and Rome. Thanks to the generous interest of the sponsor of the Loeb Series and the list of patrons who made possible the series entitled Our Debt to Greece and Rome, our chances of escaping that "age of ignorance" deplored in a despondent moment by Johnson in the Idler, "when the treasures of ancient knowledge lie unexamined and original authors are neglected and forgotten," are increased in great measure.

We await with eagerness the arrival of further volumes promised in these series where, as in many already issued, title and author alike promise excellence.

In the Loeb translations the new volumes are the second of the "Geography of Strabo," the third of "Polybius," the first of "Hippocrates," and in a single volume three of the best known of Cicero's shorter essays, the "De Senectute, de Amicitia, and de Divinatione." In Strabo we have volumes 3-5 of his work—the most significant to a modern reader—describing the Spain, France, and Italy of an age when, the writer tells us, "the inhabited world comes to an end" with the Strait of Gibraltar. The new instalment of "Polybius" contains the valuable treatise on the Roman constitution (Book VI) and ends with the capture of Syracuse. "The Hippocrates"—which includes the famous "Oath"—is enhanced in value by the translator's introduction and notes. Of the "De Senectute" and "De Amicitia" of Cicero—the late Frederic Harrison said that "every man who has attained, or hopes to attain to old age, or who has, or hopes to have a friend," should read them; "a pleasanter book for a quiet elderly man cannot be found," he adds. Of these and of the "De Divinatione" W. A. Falconer of Arkansas has produced an excellent translation.

In "Warfare by Land and Sea" appears a most interesting collection of analogies between ancient and modern warfare, both in tactics and strategy and in the importance of naval operations. Perhaps the most surprising information is in the chapter on ballistics, where we are told of the astonishing distances reached by the Greek and Roman siege engines—the artillery of the ancients, employed in field as well as against fortifications. The layman, reading Professor Smith's well-ordered and scholarly account of ancient mathematics, will probably find a suggestion to provoke thought in the continuity of our scientific knowledge and the contributions of Greeks in pure mathematics and of Romans in applied science.

"Cicero and His Influence" is J. C. Rolfe's subject; a separate volume in the series on "Cicero as Philosopher" is promised. Estimates of the man, ancient and modern, are cited, and a sympathetic account of Cicero's political ideals and his conduct as a statesman follows. Naturally the larger part of the book deals with the influence in his own and later times of the orator and writer—a subject, according to Schanz, that is yet to be written. On Cicero the man Mr. Rolfe is a partisan, for which we are grateful: it is to be doubted if any man among the world's great has had from lesser men more words of bitter criticism or of patronizing defense than he. His very human weaknesses, revealed so frankly in his letters, have no "good press" to hide them from his own time or ours, and have, since Mommsen's day, been a godsend to the thesis-provers and to the breed of pamphleteers—alas, not yet extinct!—who can aspire to the dubious rewards of shallow cleverness in writing of a great soul tragically burdened by fate. Some day, perhaps, we may better gauge the perplexities by which, as man and statesman, Cicero was so beset; may grasp the significance of his heroic effort to achieve the impossible. The hopeless deadlock between senate and magistrates on the one hand and the vicious counter-government of tribunes and assemblies on the other that to Caesar and Antonius spelled opportunity, to him brought a realization of the only way of deliverance. It is not that he was less clear-sighted than they, but more. Poignant indeed is his despairing cry when, at the very crisis, he tried to rouse a sleeping public to a sense of the facts: "nihil prorsus aliud curant nisi agros, nisi villulas, nisi nummulos suos." There is much in Boissier's observation that Cicero paid the penalty for his moderation; more truth, probably, in Cicero's own admission that he clung, with a passion too great, to his own ideals.

The Broadway Translations, we are informed, "are a scholarly and attractive issue of the more robust and human examples of classical and medieval literature." Unless one errs in reading the natural implication of the word "robust," both Petronius and the love poems of the Palatine Anthology may without cavil be allowed a place in the collection. The last few years have witnessed a rather startling output of robust literature: apparently the reading public is suspected of after-war propensities. It was last year, in fact, that the Firepaugh translation of Petronius appeared, in a "privately printed" edition. Compared with it, Mitchell's translation displays a commendable restraint; the notes are on the whole excellent, and unlike those at the end of the Firepaugh edition, are clearly designed for the sole purpose of elucidating the text. The task of the translator in this, by all odds the most colorful writing in Latin literature, is very difficult because of the variety of style and idiom of the original. Some of the notes, like that on "copo compilatus" in Chapter LXII, seem lacking in a sense of the true humor of the situation. The translator has, however, produced the most serviceable edition of the "Satyricon" so far done in English. Of all the speculations about the baffling personality of the genius who wrote the "Satyricon," that of Sidonius Apollinaris, that he was a native of Marseilles, is the most interesting. Certainly no other work of antiquity has in a greater degree a Gallic sureness of touch.

Under the alluring title of "The Girdle of Aphrodite" appear in verse translation the love-poems of the Palatine Anthology, that tenth-century collection, amounting in all to some four thousand poems, of the minor Greek poets, chiefly the Alexandrians. As compared with the complete translation, in prose, that appeared a few years ago in the Loeb series, this edition wisely follows in the steps of such competent translators as Symonds, Mackail, and Lang, and renders the elegiac couplet of the originals in English verse. Rhyme, the translator tells us in the introduction, is "the one grace of verse that English possesses and Greek lacks"; as the one "absolutely perfect translation" he quotes the version of Plato's epigram to Aster:

"Thou gazest on the stars:
  Would I might be,
O star of mine, the skies
  With myriad eyes
    To gaze on thee."

His own essays in rendering into English the sprightly conceits of these Hellenic strains en mineur are on the whole pleasing, in many cases even happy.

Man and the Market

An Introduction to Economic History. By N. S. B. Gras. Harper and Brothers. $2.25.

"To market, to market, to buy a fat pig;
Home again, home again, jiggety jig."

TO write for college freshmen a textbook that is a work of impressive and commanding scholarship, and to ride a hobby through three hundred pages without unduly boring or biasing the reader, are achievements of no mean order. These achievements Mr. Gras has accomplished in his "Introduction to Economic History," which is essentially a sketch of the economic development of mankind in terms of the growth of the market. More than that, it is a sane and reasonable essay in the economic interpretation of history. Wide and exact scholarship, a stimulating point of view, and a realistic mode of treatment are here combined in the making of an admirable book, albeit one stuffed with facts.

In place of the traditional classification, the author recognizes five stages in economic growth: collectional (including the old hunting and fishing stage), cultural nomadic (including the old pastoral and early agricultural), settled village, town, and metropolitan economy. Peoples do not necessarily pass through all these stages in order. Indeed, a valuable by-product of Mr. Gras's world-wide survey is a keen realization by the reader of the vast number and extent of the survivals of earlier stages today all over the earth, and an understanding of the forces that have brought and are bringing about development from one to another. The work is a study of the conditions, the growth, and the consequences of economic cooperation on a progressively widening scale, with constant attention to collateral political and cultural results, as well as purely economic ones.

The sinful "radicalism" of the conservative objective historian occasionally peeps out to cheer the reader. In the last chapter, for example, after sketching the growth of the eleven metropolitan areas which he discerns in the United States, the author quietly suggests the apparently remote contingency that some day "instead of the almost meaningless divisions of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, we shall have the metropolitan administrative unit of Chicago." Not if the Lusk Committee can help it! But Mr. Gras does not fail to recognize that man is a creature of politics and religion no less than of economics.

In the broad sweep of the survey contemporary happenings and ideas sometimes fall into interesting perspective. The Nonpartisan League becomes a revolt against the metropolitan dominance of the Twin Cities. Enthusiastic internationalists will find their judgment challenged, perhaps, by Mr. Gras's denial of the existence of a world economy in any proper sense, while hot nationalists will discover little support for their passions in his assertion that our real economic unit is not the nation, but the metropolis with its hinterland. Some accepted economic commonplaces, too, are brushed aside. As one watches "the long and frequent processions of pack horses and the trains of creaking carts making their way to town markets." the manor ceases to be the tidy little "self-sufficing" unit of the textbooks; and the towns, which in the theory of Adam Smith and his numerous successors have been engaged chiefly in manufacturing goods for the country, become primarily trading centers, with manufactures as little more than an incident.

In his preoccupation with the market, Mr. Gras does not always keep other things in due perspective. Though this be a world of trade, some of us still believe that the industrial revolution was an important, even if unfortunate, incident in the life of the human race, deserving of more than a single ten-line reference in a summary of economic history. We are firmly persuaded, moreover, that to explain modern business in other than money terms is to miss its point and to befog its problems. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries, after all, do differ from their predecessors. A due emphasis on the differences constitutes no denial of the continuity so dear to the heart of the genetic historian, and it does contribute to the philosophical patience so sadly needed as we survey our collective stupidities in dealing with the new-old problems created by those differences. After all, before any of us can bring home the bacon from market, we have got to know how to fatten the pig, and have got to decide who is to have the spareribs and who the bristles—and when all is said and done, as Mr. Gras himself frequently reminds us, life is more than pickled pigs' feet and scrapple.

After the "Peace"

Europe Since 1918. By Herbert Adams Gibbons. The Century Company. $2.50.

A MORE unqualified indorsement than this book contains of practically every substantive criticism that has been leveled at the Paris peace settlement it would be hard to find. Dr. Gibbons puts the case for the "peace" on trial from its beginning, and pursues the various counts of the indictment unfalteringly to the end. At the same time he disclaims any intention of arguing for or against any particular view of what was done at Paris or of what has happened since, and although his own opinions are freely expressed he may fairly be acquitted of bias. It is hardly likely, however, that the personages whose misconduct he exposes will think him anything but a rank partisan, and his book may win him the distinction of being admired for the enemies he has made; but those who dissent from his main conclusions about the peace will have to bring forward something besides opinions to overthrow them. For he has made out a good case.

What is clear, of course, is that everything at Paris went wrong from the outset, and that the mark of failure was stamped upon the conference almost from the day when the conference began. "The principal asset of success was lacking. The United States had failed to make her cooperation in the war contingent upon the acceptance by her associates of certain facts and well-defined principles. None of them was pledged to us. All of them were pledged to one another" (p. 36). The Treaty of Versailles, accordingly, instead of breathing peace, breathed war. "The Germans were to be considered permanently as enemies. They were not to be allowed to become friends. . . . The more light we get the more we realize that the Treaty of Versailles was not a treaty of peace, and that even those who made it were convinced that it would not and could not bring peace to the world" (pp. 93, 118). President Wilson is a sorry figure when the tale of his work at Paris is told, and the reader who still cherishes respect for either the motives, the intelligence, or the moral sincerity of that one-time idol will not have his respect enhanced by a reading of these pages. The brutal cynicism of Clemenceau, fittingly framed in equally brutal manners and speech, is as clearly pictured in Dr. Gibbons's straightforward narrative as are the weak complacency of Mr. Wilson and the shifty dickering of Mr. Lloyd George. It is a curious illustration of the work of time in dissipating hysteria and vindictiveness that practically every one of the leaders whom the makers and partisans of the peace acclaimed is today in contempt, while more than one of the many who then were denounced and buffeted is today held in honor.

The drafting of the Versailles treaty, however, was only the beginning of trouble, and it is in his account of the events which have followed the Paris conference that Dr. Gibbons makes his chief contribution. Successive chapters tell, in concise and popular form, the story of the treaties of St. Germain, Neuilly, the Trianon, and Sèvres, the effect of the Balkan settlement upon Bulgaria and Albania, the new Baltic republics and their relations with Russia, the formation and political evolution of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, and Jugoslavia, of Austria bereft of its provinces, of Italy from Giolitti to Mussolini, reparations and Allied debts, the Eastern question before and during the Lausanne conference, and the exploits of France and Belgium in the Ruhr. The cumulative impression, as one follows the round, is that the political schemers and autocrats who made the Paris treaties sinned persistently and repeatedly against the light, that they left force enthroned while professing to weaken and shackle it, and that the unsteady structure which they reared is certain before long to go to pieces.

A few typical quotations will best show Dr. Gibbons's point of view. "Since the Treaty of Versailles, from the Baltic to the Bosphorus, all decisions, all changes have been made by and in favor of the people possessing arms and using them" (p. 229). "Greater Poland was a glorious dream, but its realization has meant the disillusionment of the dreamers" (p. 256). "When we estimate the chances of long life for so curiously formed a state as Czecho-Slovakia, we have no other grounds for assuming its durability than the adoption of a program like that advocated by Dr. Benès at Genoa," namely, the acceptance of the principle of "a universal and binding compact of non-aggression" (pp. 271, 272). While "financially and in healthy trade prospects the Baltic republics are better off than any of the new states that have come into being as a result of the World War, with the possible exception of Czecho-Slovakia" (p. 230), Rumania is headed for bankruptcy (p. 316). "The Council of the League of Nations has postponed the collapse of Austria in the same way as it settled the Upper Silesia and Vilna questions, by offering a solution that took into account the transcendent interests of members of the Council" (p. 344); while "less than five years have proved that the Treaty of Versailles has deprived the German people of the possibility of a normal economic existence," and "unless there is a radical revision . . . the Germans may have to emigrate in large numbers or die or fight again" (p. 413). "The lesson of the protracted and fruitless negotiations at Lausanne seems to be that force alone counts for anything in international relations" (p. 440). "From the world point of view, there is no separate problem called the Question of the Straits. . . . There is a question of straits, by which we mean all international waterways. The League of Nations can rightly be suspected of being an agent of particular interests, plotting in the interests of some nations against others, until its champions are able to convince themselves and public opinion in the nations whose representatives sit on the League Council that the League can exist and function only as an instrument of impartial administration and justice" (p. 489).

Where the presentation on the whole is so able and large, it would be ungracious to emphasize defects of detail or to dwell upon debatable points. It is to be regretted, however, that space could not have been found for a fuller record of British performance since 1918, that the development of the neutral states could not have been traced along with that of the former belligerents, and that the spread of Fascism and reaction elsewhere than in Italy could not have been more thoroughly followed. The attitude of the Allied experts at Paris deserves a rougher handling than Dr. Gibbons gives it, and there will certainly be much dissent from the author's summary dismissal of communism in Russia as a failure, as from his declaration that the United States ought to guarantee military aid to France in case another 1914 should come. The great predominance of political over economic data, also, makes the picture of actual conditions at many points incomplete. With these reservations, the book may be heartily commended as an informing, acute, and stirring survey of a situation which bristles all over with danger to the peace of the world, and the plain truths which it presents ought to be widely read and seriously pondered by the American public to which it is primarily addressed.

Books in Brief

The Editorials of Henry Watterson. Compiled by Arthur B. Krock. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

This is a compilation by one of Colonel Watterson's ablest subordinates, made with skill and an evident desire to put the Colonel's best foot forward, for many of this editor's saddest mistakes and most erroneous prophecies are generously overlooked. Yet it is these which the historian of the future must also read in order to get a complete picture of Watterson. This volume will please many admirers of the Wattersonian grand manner and peculiar style and was, therefore, probably worth doing. Indeed, from its pages one may deduce some of the likable human qualities which made Kentucky's greatest editor so popular. But the reputation of few editors who have written over so many years can, we believe, be enhanced by such a review and marshaling of the evidences of their pens. It is, therefore, open to question whether a genuine service has been rendered by this volume to the memory of Watterson the writer. A serious defect of the book is that the explanatory comments of the editor are not set in sufficiently different type and manner to distinguish them clearly.

Eris. By Robert W. Chambers. Doran. $2.

"Eris" brings the number of Mr. Chambers's novels up to fifty-seven. This places the author on a numerical par with Mr. Heinz. Mr. Heinz's products are uninjurious, extremely popular, and inordinately profitable. So are Mr. Chambers's. But the comparison ends abruptly with the term "varieties." Mr. Heinz has fifty-seven. Mr. Chambers has only one. His variety consists solely in labels. Eris is a cinema star. There is a director villain, a journalist hero, and the inevitable ending. And there are frequent mid-Victorian attacks on the "Great American Ass," a term of opprobrium which includes all labor unionists, all "worshipers of the cult of ugliness" in art, in literature, and music, all Bolsheviki—in brief, all modern thinkers.

The Story of the Mikado. By W. S. Gilbert. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Only one man should have been permitted to recast the story of "The Mikado" from the imperishable original, and that is the man who has done it. In narrative form, the legend loses inevitably some of its infectious verve, but elements of quaintness and solemn-visaged fun survive in good measure. As an introduction to the classic for children the book is admirable, while the inclusion of most of the lyrics insures it a wider welcome. The volume is beautifully printed, and adorned with happy illustrations by Alice B. Woodward.

Opus I

MR. GILBERT EMERY, whom you can see nightly acting in a neighboring playhouse, sustains and indeed surpasses the promise and performance of his play "The Hero" in his new tragi-comedy called "Tarnish" (Belmont Theater). The title, though effective, is ill chosen and points to a moral or, at least, to a principle which has little enough inherent connection with the people and their story. It is an amusing but rather cheap and easy formulation—a vulgar error, in fact—that all men have an inveterate taste for perfumed mud and that a girl had better choose one who "cleans easy." If the play were on a level with this generalization or with the coincidence by which the "fancy lady" to whom Letitia Tevis's father gave the family's last and only five hundred dollars happens to be the same fancy lady who was once the special friend of Letitia's young man—if the play didn't rise above that moral and that device comment on it could be quite brief and sharp.

But the play does rise immensely above these things. They are crutches of a sort which I hope some day to see Mr. Emery discard. He hasn't quite enough artistic fortitude yet. But he is gaining. "The Hero" collapsed ingloriously in the last act. The inner line of development and culmination in "Tarnish" runs admirably straight and true. There is no cheap concession at any point. If the ending is technically "happy" it is, for once, profoundly natural. And it is treated with a reserve, with an undertone of restraint which points to Mr. Emery's sensitive discrimination between the happy ending of, say, a John Golden play and such a yielding to the healing illusions of mortality as is necessary to life itself. There is no doubt that Letitia would in time have yielded. She was so lonely, so buffeted. She needed her man. She takes him. The author asks nothing of us but to hope for the best. That is both sane and true.

The special virtue of the play, as of all good plays, is not in its action. The necessary compression of the dramatic form, its necessary pointedness, makes all action debatable. What is both sound and delightful here is the characterization and that part of the fable which arises directly therefrom. The elder Tevises are literally priceless. The lady, a whining and brainless snob, made the mistake in her youth of marrying the handsome bounder Adolphe. Now they are on the verge of old age. Long ago, of course, he ran through her money. They are in a flat on 189th Street. She has nothing left except the memories of former glory and the consciousness of gentility; he, white-haired, fat, but rosy, still treads, when possible, at least the edges of the primrose path. And both are of a selfishness so deadly and unconquerable, portrayed by the author with such masterly precision and truth, that for once the illusion of the stage almost becomes reality and one aches to crush these weak and morally slouchy and yet devouring monsters.

They try to devour their only child, Letitia, of course. Her love and loyalty and decency furnish easy food. But Mr. Emery has not made the mistake of having her too supine. The girl doesn't want, naturally, to see through her parents. But her vision is too honest. A disgust of the mind has come to her. She will flee, and one wishes her well; she has gone hard, and one applauds her hardness. It is the less noble material that yields to the hammer; the nobler gains compactness and strength.

What, finally, raises one's hopes of Mr. Emery and reconciles one almost to his central coincidence is that he does not stop with the sharp moral contrasts which I have indicated. He knows—and this is what separates the dramatic "maker" from the dramatic hack—that every human being has his case, plea, defense. Nettie Dark, the lady of the half-world, has hers, of course. That is obvious and easy. But the unspeakable coward, whiner, roué, Adolphe Tevis, has his. He snivels and lies and poses. But for a minute or two, in a scene with Letitia which is as deep and as delicately molded as anything in dramatic form written in this country, he states his case. And it is a case. It carries conviction. The color of the moral world is neither black nor white; it is an endless gray.

This admirable and moving play is superbly cast and acted. Miss Ann Harding who glimmered briefly with little but her beauty in Macdougal Street a few seasons ago appears here as perhaps the most stringently intelligent of our younger actresses. She has emotional reach, too. But mind is added to fire, accuracy to charm. Next to her performance I should place Albert Gran's as Tevis. The Micawberish is broader and easier. But here it is done with richness and zest yet without excess. Tom Powers is excellent as always. He is a lover and is not foolish, a young lover and yet a sane man. And equal praise must be given to Fania Marinoff, Mrs. Russ Whitehall, Marion Lord, Mrs. Jacques Martin, and Mildred MacLeod. Having seen "Tarnish," both the play and the performance, one has left the limbo of the early season and is convinced once more—it was high time—that both the drama, and even an American drama, and the art of the theater exist. # Play-Writing

Individual Instruction and Criticism

The Drama's course in play writing teaches in detail the technique of the professional play. It takes you step by step from the simplest rudiments to the actual completion of plays. Your work will receive the individual attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticisms will be directed toward your specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and your dialogue, and give you definite, constructive criticism and help.

You are encouraged to develop your own talent and individual style of expression. No attempt is made to lead you along any cut-and-dried plan. Not one form letter is used in the discussion of your plays or plots. Each piece of creative work receives the personal attention of Mr. Hinckley.

Producers Will Read Your Plays

Throughout the course, the aim is toward the completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers. If your manuscript has the endorsement of The Drama it will receive a reading by managers.

Thoughtful Plays Require Technique

As a reader of The Nation, you probably are interested in writing a play of ideas rather than a popular success. Technique is essential to the thoughtful play if it is to escape didacticism. Your play should present your opinions in such an attractive and skillful manner that the audience will absorb them without effort. Even though you scorn conventional form and dream of a style as individual as Shaw's or O'Neill's you must be soaked with technique before you can ignore it without losing your audience.

Limited Enrollment

British Raj Dethrones the Maharaja of Nabha

By BASANTA KOOMAR ROY

YESTERDAY he was the supreme ruler of 300,000 people inhabiting 1,000 square miles in the state of Nabha; today he is a tragic prisoner at Deradun in British India. The British Raj recently dethroned this Sikh Maharaja of Nabha. The British press correspondents have so far succeeded in withholding this significant news from the American press and the public.

The offense with which the Maharaja has been charged is that a few of his officers are responsible for the arrest under false charges and punishment of certain officers of the neighboring state of Patiala in the Punjab, and that he was cognisant of these offenses and did nothing to punish his offending officers.

This was a dispute between two of India's ruling princes. There is already a chamber of princes in connection with the Government in India supposedly to safeguard the interests of the princes. For mysterious reasons this dispute was studiously kept from the attention of this chamber. The British Government appointed a British official to investigate the matter, and he found the Maharaja of Nabha guilty. The report has not yet been made public. It will never be if the British Government strictly adheres to its traditions in India. No definite information as to the nature of the offenses of the Nabha officers is given out. The Maharaja was given no warning, and certainly no hearing was granted him. He is forbidden to publish any account of his side of the question. His Britannic Majesty's officials declared: "Let the Maharaja of Nabha be deposed," and he was deposed.

Soon after this he was made a virtual prisoner in his own palace. He was not allowed to go out, nor was he allowed to receive friends and sympathizers. His letters were opened, and even his movements within the palace were closely watched. His Highness the Maharaja Shri Ripudaman Singh of Nabha was indeed a singh (lion) in a golden cage. But this Sikh lion was soon removed to a mountain home. On Sunday, July 8, at 6:30 a.m. Colonel Minchin, the British political agent, reached Nabha with a colonel, a few British officials, about 250 soldiers, three machine-guns, and a quantity of ammunition. The Heera Mahal Palace was surrounded by armed soldiers, and machine-guns were placed at strategic points. The Maharaja was ordered to prepare for departure.

Then the British officials took possession of the fort of Nabha, and there, in the absence of the Maharaja, a conference was held in which the end of the Maharaja Ripudaman Singh's rule was declared. It was announced that the affairs of the state would be managed by the Government of India until the four-year-old heir, the Tikha Sahib, reached his majority.

At about 9:30 a.m. the Maharaja and Her Highness the Maharani were forced to enter an automobile and were driven away. They were both calm and stern as they entered the car, but their eyes were glistening with tears, tears perhaps not for their thrones and palaces and jewels, but for their child from whom they were being separated.

The Maharaja was compelled by the British Government to sign a document of "abdication." The conditions of this deposition, which the British so euphemistically call "abdication" are as follows: (1) The administration of the state will be handed over to the Government of India; (2) the Maharaja will in future reside outside the state; (3) visits which the Maharaja wishes to make to Nabha or other specified places will require permission of the Government of India; (4) the Maharaja will remain subject to the obligation of loyalty and obedience to the British Crown and the Government of India.

This condition of loyalty is the crux of the situation. The question of loyalty and disloyalty is the cause of the deposition of Nabha. This Prince of India is a Sikh by faith. The Sikh faith unites the Hindus and Mohammedans on a common platform. In recent years nationalist unrest and revolutionary activities have been spreading among the Sikhs, who for years have been loyal to the British Raj. The strangling of the Sikhs at home and in British colonies like Canada has alienated the more intelligent among the Sikhs. The Maharaja of Nabha is a real Sikh, a true disciple of Guru Govind Singh. He is well read, cultured, widely traveled, and intensely patriotic. From his early youth he has been a man of independent spirit. He does not talk much, but thinks deeply. Unlike many of his compatriots he thinks, not in terms of Nabha or sikhism, but in terms of India as a nation, glorious in the past, enslaved at present, but with a radiant future.

During the administration of Lord Minto the Maharaja was the crown prince of Nabha, and was nominated by the British Government as a member to the Viceroy's legislative council. And to the disappointment and dismay of Lord Minto this young prince, instead of sitting with the government members, was wont to sit with the leader of the opposition, Mr. G. K. Gokhale, a conservative and pacifist like Mahatma Gandhi, and his real and professional followers. In violation of the traditions of the nominated members, the prince of Nabha voted with Mr. Gokhale against the Government. This Tikka-Sahib of Nabha even voted against the Seditious Meetings Bill by which the Government sought to suppress freedom of speech and assemblage. This patriotic act at once made him seditious in the eyes of the Government, and at the same time exceedingly popular with the people of the land.

Such an act could not be tolerated in a prince whose state had done so much for the British in the Afghan War of 1879-80 and during India's War of Independence in 1857-58. So when his father, Maharaja Heera Singh, died, the British delayed long before formally installing him on his own throne. And again, during the World War Sir Michael O'Dwyer, the Governor of the Punjab, was displeased with the Maharaja for his tacit opposition to England's exploitation of India's princes and peoples. He was secretly charged with disloyalty to the British Crown, and on threat of deposition was forced openly to pay $1,600,000 for England's war purposes.

Quite undaunted the Maharaja kept in close touch with the ramifications of the Nationalist movement in India and abroad. He knew what the Amritsar massacre was for; he knew what it meant to see hundreds and thousands of his fellow-countrymen and coreligionists beaten by the British police in the Sikh holy places. Besides Gokhale, he was also a friend of Tilak, who before the advent of the revolutionists was the leader of the radical wing and had been imprisoned several times for his patriotic activities. To be a friend of Tilak was to be condemned by the British Government. Yet this Indian prince openly presided over a Tilak memorial meeting at Musoorie in 1921, paid $300,000 for a Tilak library, and in the course of his speech said: "Mr. Tilak was a man of towering personality, a leader of iron will and determination, a soul of inspired vision. He was a giant among men, inspired with lofty ideals of regenerating his nation and uplifting his country which could once style itself the cradle-land of civilization."

We knew then that some sort of humiliation for Nabha could not be long delayed. Today he stands humiliated indeed. But out of this evil to Nabha will come good to all India. The direct and immediate effect of this deed will be a tremendous tidal wave of unrest. The Sikh community is doubly affected—nationally and religiously. The Babbar Akali Sikhs have already challenged the alleged supremacy of the British rule in India. Led by the patriotic ex-soldiers of the British army in India they have started guerrilla warfare in the districts of Hosiarpur and Jullunder in the Punjab. The British have declared martial law in these districts and their aeroplanes are flying over them trying to terrorize the people into submission. Perhaps this is another reason why the Maharaja of Nabha has been deposed and deported from the Punjab in such haste. It would be useful for the readers of this article to remember at this time that there are thousands upon thousands of Sikh soldiers in the British army of occupation in India. For numerous reasons they are already showing unmistakable signs of militant restlessness. From the very beginning of his administration, Lord Reading has been doing everything in his power to pacify the Sikhs.

Not only the Sikhs, but all sects and creeds and provinces of India are protesting against the deportation of Nabha. For, quite unlike those treacherous Hindu, Mohammedan, and Sikh leaders who openly or secretly sow the seeds of sectarian dissension and communal bitterness, the Maharaja of Nabha is first a Hindustanee and then a Sikh. His exile will undoubtedly hasten the day when British rule in India will be a thing of the past.

Indian Rights in the United States

THE following memorandum, signed by representative American missionaries in India and addressed to the American people and the Government, was published in the Indian press on August 9. The decision of the Supreme Court regarding the naturalization of Indians in the United States was commented upon editorially in last week's Nation. The naturalization law of the United States limits the granting of citizenship to "aliens being free white persons," "aliens of African nativity," and "persons of African descent."

The undersigned citizens of the United States, resident in India, desire to place before the American people the following: America hitherto has been held in high esteem in India because of her idealism and brotherliness, but the recent Supreme Court decision that Indians are ineligible to become citizens of the United States has decidedly a tendency to diminish this esteem. In fact, it has caused a deep resentment in the mind of India. We do not presume to question the interpretation of the statute by the Supreme Court in this matter. Nevertheless, we cannot let this opportunity go by without registering our regret that such a ruling was possible. It will help to widen the gulf between the East and the West, and will give added impetus to the rising tide of resentment and bitterness against the white exclusiveness.

We deeply regret that our country has any part in augmenting this rising tide. By good-will and friendliness and just dealing between man and man, better moral forces of the world may yet avert a clash and make a more friendly world. We sincerely hope that our country will have a vital part in doing this. We are given to understand that as a result of this decision the Alien Land Act may be enforced and that land now owned and leased by Indians in America may be taken from them. We are not acquainted with the terms on which this may be done, but whether it is on liberal or harsh terms we urge that this act should not be brought into operation so that the insult of deprivation shall not be added to the injury of disenfranchisement.

In support of this we would draw attention to the fact that with the exception of a few of the Native States, Americans may, and do, hold land in India in large quantities, but the same privilege may be denied to Indians in America on the ground that they are aliens. The Golden Rule would demand that the same privilege be extended to Indians in America as is extended to us in India in the interest of good-will and friendliness and fairness. We trust that technicalities will not be taken advantage of to deprive Indians of the land taken in good faith before this ruling was given.

Russia and the Bulgarian Reaction

THE nature of the opposition to the present Bulgarian Government and the attitude of the Russian Government are indicated in the following telegram from the Russian Foreign Minister Chicherin to Premier Zankoff, sent on August 9:

Lately there has been taking place an unbroken series of systematic persecutions, violent attacks, and unheard-of crimes in general on the part of the Bulgarian authorities, acting hand in hand with the White Guard émigrés—the enemies of the Russian people—toward the Russian Red Cross Mission in Bulgaria, the repatriation workers, and ordinary Russians awaiting repatriation. The Russian Red Cross representative in Plevna, Schelpugin, was at first arrested by the Bulgarian authorities and then murdered under mysterious circumstances, being subjected before death to the most refined tortures. Immediately after this another Red Cross representative, Morozov, was nearly beaten to death. After orders had been received from Russia recalling the Russian Red Cross Mission, the Bulgarian Government, on the excuse of lying and calumnious accusations, seized the mission, subjected it to domestic arrest and repeated searches, and announced its expulsion.

It is impossible to recount all the indignities inflicted upon the repatriation workers and Russian citizens by the Bulgarian authorities and the Russian counter-revolutionaries. When the S.S. Ignatii Sergeev, the property of the Russian Government, arrived in Varna to take the Red Cross Mission on board, it was seized by the port and police authorities by order of Governor Chimchiroff. The police by force placed on board a group of 678 persons, without either documents or visas. The commissary of the steamer was inveigled on shore by fraud, arrested by the governor, and assaulted.

From among the vast number of members of the non-partisan Repatriation League arrested, assaulted, and tortured, I can quote as particularly notorious the tortures inflicted upon Yeremin, Popoff, Karaulny, Zhurkevich, Vladimir Inanov, Komarizky, Ludzin, and Panaitov. The Russian citizen Mme Harlambova was arrested for no reason in Varna, struck across the face with a switch, and subjected to six searches with indescribable insults. The Russian citizens awaiting repatriation arrested in Varna were on July 12 subjected to mass torture. M. Gudzenko, representing the Agricultural Exhibition Committee, was also arrested by the Bulgarian authorities, and, according to the information at our disposal, has not yet been released.

These unprecedented crimes were accompanied by a campaign of calumny on the part of the representatives of the Bulgarian Government, taking the form of a number of false statements and insults directed both against the Russian Red Cross Mission and against the Soviet Government. From certain indications in the Bulgarian press, it seems indubitable that the Bulgarian authorities, after seizing the office and archives of the Red Cross Mission, placed forged documents in them to justify the slanderous campaign carried on by Bulgarian ruling circles against the Soviet Republics.

The Union Soviet Government declares that it places full responsibility for the above acts on the Bulgarian Government, and demands the immediate liberation of M. Gudzenko and all the arrested members of the repatriation organizations, as well as all the Russian citizens arrested solely for their desire to return to their native country. The Union Government requests the Bulgarian Government to give full satisfaction, an apology for the above acts, and compensation for all citizens of Russia and the united republics who have suffered loss or injury in connection with these events. It demands the exemplary punishment of all Bulgarian officials guilty of ordering or participating in the acts previously mentioned, and also the most stringent punishment and expulsion from Bulgaria of the Russian counter-revolutionary emigrants who took part.

The Union Soviet Government has to draw attention to the fact that in various regions of the Soviet Republics there are living Bulgarian citizens who hitherto have enjoyed the constantly favorable attitude of the Soviet authorities, who afforded them the possibility of peaceful labor in the Soviet Republics, independently of their party views and political sympathies. This can be attested by the Bulgarian citizens themselves, who well know of all the political and economic advantages arising from friendly relations between Bulgaria and the Soviet Republics, and particularly the importance which trade with Russia has for Bulgaria.

The Union Soviet Government calls the attention of the Bulgarian Government to the serious results of its activities against the Russian people and the people of the Soviet Union. It reminds the Bulgarian Government that the political leaders of the Bulgarian people have more than once complained of the painful position of the latter in its international relations, and to the oppression suffered by the Bulgarian people in other countries. By its policy of violence against Russia, the Red Cross workers, and citizens awaiting repatriation, the Bulgarian Government is acting in conflict with the primary necessity for the Bulgarian people of struggling against the policy of oppression.

Awaiting from the Bulgarian Government an immediate reply to its justifiable demands, the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics will be obliged, if satisfaction be refused, to place on the Bulgarian Government the full weight of responsibility for the consequences, in particular for the repressive measures which against its will the Union Government will be obliged to adopt in the case of certain Bulgarian citizens living in Russia.

At the same time the Union Government protests in the face of the whole world against the provocative activities of the Russian counter-revolutionaries and the present Bulgarian Government, to which peaceful Russian citizens on Bulgarian territory have fallen victims, and which may yet react on certain Bulgarians in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

Spanish Labor Limps

THE weakness of labor opposition to the military coup in Spain is explained in part by the following letter from a Spanish Communist leader to the International Press Correspondence in which the writer reveals the fatal divisions in the Spanish labor movement:

> The Spanish Communist Party is still weak, and the smallness of its membership is the more to be regretted in view of the political tasks by which it is faced. We are up against a Socialist Party which has won no small influence over the masses by forty years of work, and which is at present engaged in winning over those working masses which have hitherto been adherents of that old and historical republicanism now in a state of complete dissolution. We have further to fight for the extermination of the very strong influence of anarcho-syndicalist ideology in the labor movement. Any attempt to form an estimate of the work done by the Communist Party of Spain must accord these facts the fullest consideration—must give due weight to the necessity incumbent on the party of carrying on the struggle simultaneously against an alarmed and cruel bourgeoisie, against a Socialist Party whose political weakness has not yet reached such a point as to bring it into the discredit in which the other parties affiliated to the Hamburg International have fallen, and finally against a deeply rooted anarchist tradition—or the most reckless and incorrect conclusions will be reached. . . . The policy to be pursued in an environment so complicated and so hostile to communism must be neither unintelligent nor rigid.
> Have we invariably shown sufficient intelligence and flexibility in our past struggles? We regret to have to admit that this has not been the case. In our party there has been no lack of heroism, self-sacrifice, and revolutionary impatience. But it has been lacking in political grasp of events, and in the capacity to view given situations from the Marxian standpoint. And as errors have always to be paid for in politics, we have had to pay for our political instruction by the loss of positions.
> The second congress of the party, held in Madrid in the middle of July, constitutes a decisive landmark in our movement. Now we are beginning to see clearly at last. We seem to have passed through the period of infantile complaints. We also seem to have got over our superficial and ultra-revolutionary conceptions of party action. The congress passed a number of resolutions of an entirely concrete character. . . . Besides this, the unity of the party has been established, and its ideological homogeneity and united organization are a sure pledge that future work will be capable of accomplishing much more than past. To this it must be added that at the present time many circumstances are extraordinarily favorable for a rapid development of the party. The political situation of the country, the ever more disastrous effects of the war in Morocco, the growing antagonisms in the army, and the increasing internal disintegration of the state, all these factors supply the objective premises for the rapid growth of our party. A few days ago, in Madrid, a mass of workers numbering about 10,000, declared themselves in full agreement with the standpoint expressed by a representative of our party on the responsibilities created by the defeat of the Spanish army in Morocco.
> With respect to the labor movement, the increasing loss of prestige of the Socialist Party and the obvious decay of anarcho-syndicalist influence are now enabling us to approach the working masses with every prospect of success.
> The fact that the two uprisings among the miners in Viscaya and in Seron could be officially led by the Communist Party of Spain is a proof that our prestige is increasing in the sphere of trade unionism, and that the party . . . is none the less possessed by the aspiration to place itself at the head of all proletarian struggles.

WHATEVER subject he chooses to make his own, Gifford Pinchot manages to turn into a challenge to the administration and policies of Calvin Coolidge. First coal, now liquor. His attitudes are quite unimpeachable—and he gets there first. We do not suspect Governor Pinchot's sincerity; he may want to be President, but we have no reason to suppose that he does not as honestly want the laws enforced. He is in politics in the public interest, and we need more whose purposes are as untainted as his. But nevertheless the challenge exists. His every act seems to say: "If Calvin Coolidge wants to be elected President he will have to keep jumping." As for the non-enforcement of the prohibition law, is there any doubt that it is a gross scandal, a piece of public dishonesty so blatant that private decency itself disintegrates in the face of it?

WE have been in small Jersey coast towns which have lost their bearings entirely in a flood of graft and easy money. When the owner of a power-boat plying between the rum-fleet and the coast gets $5 a case for all whiskey brought ashore, and lands several hundred cases in a night; when the men that help unload get $1 a case, and the revenue officers $2 protection money; when these things happen, and everyone is happy and serene—even the ultimate consumer who is too thirsty to cavil at extortionate prices—why should anyone be either honest or law-abiding? Mr. Hard, in another column, suggests that other Federal amendments deserve the equal attention of law-enforcers such as Governor Pinchot—the enfranchisement of Negroes, for instance, and free speech for us all. His plea is a fine one and we agree with him, but we must admit that there is a degree of actual overt dishonesty and corruption in the liquor situation that is not involved in these old sores. In any case we can hardly object to the enforcement of a law simply because other laws are not enforced. Either we must pass measures that will be obeyed or we must make people obey the measures that are passed. Mr. Pinchot is choosing the second course, and Mr. Coolidge, with less ardor, will doubtless choose it too.

IT takes bloodshed to put Germany on the front page now. Mere unemployment, mere starvation, mere food riots are old stories. But the process of degeneration continues, and Poincaré still betrays no hint of readiness to discuss matters on a common-sense basis. The French papers do indeed show a glimmering recognition of the fact that military victory has its limitations. Passive resistance has ceased, but the Ruhr is not yet functioning and producing. Before the French invasion Germany was paying the coal-owners who shipped reparations coal to France; now Germany cannot pay, and if the French Government is to get the coal it must itself pay. The coal owners are willing to ship the coal to France, but someone must pay them the wages they have to pay to their miners. France threatened to seize the coal tax, but part of the price Stresemann had to pay the industrialists for their support of his dictatorship measure was the abolition of the coal tax.

STRESEMANN hardly seems made to play the role of dictator. His voice trembled when he asked the Reichstag to give him plenary powers, and he did not put the motion until after prolonged bargaining with both industrialists and Socialists. Whether, once the argumentative Reichstag is out of the way, he will show a stronger face, is yet to be seen. The plan to force payment of taxes in gold instead of in shifting paper values is the necessary first step to order, but it is doubtful whether any German currency can be stabilized until some sort of understanding is reached with the French Government. Just why the Socialists felt it necessary to pledge their support to dictatorship is not clear. They still have the power, under a constitutional provision, to reconvene the Reichstag, and probably they regard that as their salvation. Meanwhile, with parliament out, the political battle continues between the state governments. When Bavaria went under virtually royalist control, Saxony and Thuringia reverted to their earlier Socialist-Communist coalition governments. There is plenty of explosive material in Germany just waiting to be stepped on.

PERHAPS the American press, reputed to be an accurate reflector of public opinion, has misled us a bit in regard to popular approval in this country of the French occupation of the Ruhr. We note, at least, that two college audiences, after listening to a debate on the question, have voted overwhelmingly against French policy. A Harvard team did its best to uphold the occupation against attack by the visiting debaters from Oxford University, but the audience voted its disapproval of the treatment of Germany 1,748 to 590, or nearly three to one; and this, it should be observed, in what may be called the intellectual center of pro-French sentiment in this country. Two nights later an audience in New Haven, after listening to a Yale-Oxford debate on the same question, voted 776 to 286 against the French occupation.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S tour is not to include Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, or the Falkland Islands, so the inhabitants of those various sections of the British Empire will have to miss, for the present, the exhilarating assurance, on the highest of all authorities, that the assistance they rendered at a critical moment saved civilization. The lack of this testimonial will perhaps be endured with the more equanimity from the fact that almost every day makes it more doubtful whether the war saved civilization after all. That there was nothing final about it seems, indeed, to be the one conviction that today unites those who preached it as a holy crusade. Mr. Lloyd George says at Toronto that he had hoped the last war would have put an end to war, but he sees imminent the menace of an even greater catastrophe unless the British Empire, by increasing her own strength, can "teach the world to keep out of war." And Lord Grey warns a London audience that it is "not so indisputably true yet" that in the last war militarism was defeated. That would depend on the answer to the question whether the peoples of Europe had been so penetrated, by the experience of the last war, with the sense that war was a great disaster that they would in future settle their disputes by some other means. If militarism, he added, was to gain ascendancy over the spirit of those who won the last war, it would not have been defeated but would have won. That "if" was a pleasant euphemism.

TALK of an "armed uprising" in the Philippines does not come from the Filipino leaders but from trouble-making Americans who want to discredit the Filipinos at home. The leaders of the independence movement in the islands are the same men who have peacefully and effectively cooperated with the various American civil administrations which preceded that of General Wood. The new factor in the situation is the general, and it is plain that he does not know how to adjust himself to a civilian's job. He may be a good army officer, but he is not fitted to participate in a task of democratic administration. He has failed. For Secretary Weeks to go on parrot-like reiterating that he will support General Wood to the limit is to repeat the most common failure of colonial bureaucrats. The Harding Administration would have avoided a lot of trouble if it had recalled Governor Reily from Porto Rico as soon as his unfitness became evident, and Mr. Weeks and Mr. Coolidge are only storing up trouble by delaying the recall of Leonard Wood.

FROM the moment that Governor Walton announced his intention to prevent a legally called election in Oklahoma his downfall has been predictable. For a quarter of a century the American people have been accustoming themselves to industrial dictatorship, and since the European War they have submitted to a high degree of political autocracy on the part of the Federal executive departments, but they are not ready yet to give up their right to the ballot. In attacking that fundamental the Governor showed the poorest possible generalship. He went farther than most of the post-war crop of European dictators, undoubtedly leaving many Oklahomans sympathetic toward the anti-Klan campaign to break away and join in the three-to-one popular vote invoking a special session of a legislature that was bent on destroying the Governor. But, though Governor Walton's attempted dictatorship has failed, the Klan does not emerge triumphant. The Democratic Party in the State is said to be determined upon some kind of anti-Klan legislation in order to save its political future, and the head of the Klan in Oklahoma is himself advocating an anti-masking law, with reservations that would prevent the act from upsetting the organization's ceremonials. Furthermore, the call for a mobilization of Klansmen of the Southwest at Dallas, Texas, is not necessarily the proof of strength that is suggested in most of the newspaper dispatches; the object is perhaps defensive quite as much as offensive. Indeed the Klan may have reached the position at which the American Legion arrived a couple of years ago, when opposition both within and without impelled that organization to modify its tactics.

ISRAEL ZANGWILL'S descent upon New York, his triumphal seizure of columns of front-page newspaper space, the crowding thousands that heard him speak at Carnegie Hall—all testify to the man's hold on the imagination of his own people and, to only a little less degree, of all Americans. He is able to say sharp things and some wise things and remain intact. No one can excommunicate him, because he is already apart. He is a person and a power, but he is not a leader because he refuses identity with any followers. And the fact that he is an artist gives him an added strength of aloofness. His place as a writer and a public man is clearly defined in an article which we shall publish next week by Johan J. Smertenko. His place in the immediate controversy over Zionism and the role of the Jews in Palestine is less easy to discuss. The issues are not clear. That French and British wrangling—and the existence of a large unreconciled Arab majority—make the hope of complete Jewish control in Palestine a dream is obvious; Jews of all nationalities in Palestine will have to be Englishmen first. But it is not quite as obvious that there will be no political future for the Jewish race even under the domination of Great Britain. Culturally the Jews may modify and mold that part of the Near East as Englishmen and Frenchmen can never do. Politically the Jews may come to form a sort of solvent in the ferment of Near Eastern politics; they may well hold the balance of power between the forces that find themselves in conflict there. We should like to hear the answer of Dr. Weizmann, that "distinguished chemist," to the epitaph on Jewish hopes pronounced by Mr. Zangwill.

MUNSEY, Stinnes, and Hearst are mere pikers beside the British newspaper-owners. Lord Rothermere, brother of the late Lord Northcliffe, and Lord Beaverbrook, who is a forty-four-year-old Canadian, recently bought the Hulton papers for the trifling sum of thirty million dollars, and Lord Beaverbrook is reported since to have added the Pall Mall Gazette to his Daily Express and to the Evening Standard, which is his share of the Hulton properties. His three London papers, however, are nothing compared to Rothermere's string. Rothermere was a newspaper-owner on his own account when his brother died, leaving him the main heir to the Associated Newspapers and other Northcliffe properties. The Daily Mail, which claims the largest circulation in the world, the Daily Mirror, which closely trails the Mail, the Evening News are his in London, and with them go some seventy-five weekly and monthly publications, and daily papers in Glasgow, Leeds, and Manchester. Some of these papers have been paying their enterprising owner 60 per cent profit annually for several years. It is estimated that Rothermere's papers reach nearly 90 per cent of the British reading public, and his chief rival, the Berry group, which bid against him for the Hulton papers, controls a group of newspapers equal in importance to the Hearst press in this country. When financiers operate such enormous sections of the press as profit-making ventures, is it any wonder that men study anxiously Mr. Astor's attempt to make the London Times a semi-public trust, and that workers make huge sacrifices to build up a press of their own?

FAR from getting better, housing conditions in New York City have grown worse in the last three years, according to a mass of testimony submitted to the State Housing Commission, which is trying to determine whether the emergency rent laws of 1920 ought to be reenacted by the legislature. From 600,000 to 700,000 persons are virtually without homes, it was asserted, living herded with others in tenement-house apartments. One case was cited of forty-two persons occupying one five-room apartment and sleeping in shifts. Plenty of new housing has been built for the well-to-do, but in the last three years only one building has been completed with apartments to let for as little as $10 per room per month—and that by a philanthropic organization. No intelligent person expected that New York's emergency rent laws would build new houses, but they were expected to protect the tenant from profiteering landlords. Even this hope has been only partially realized, as landlords have often made life unbearable for persons who have stood upon their legal rights, and have used the legislation as an excuse for insufficient heat and an almost unanimous refusal to make repairs. Added to the housing crisis is the fuel shortage. So far this winter dealers have generally refused to quote a definite price or date of delivery. The consumer must take his chances on both—or nothing. Actually, buyers in small lots have paid $17 to $20 a ton. "It's great to be a New Yorker," says the Interborough Rapid Transit Company's Subway Sun. Sure—provided you don't mind the lack of a roof over your head, or object to freezing to death for lack of coal.

IF General James E. Oglethorpe, the founder of Georgia, had a sense of humor, his spirit must be chuckling hugely as it roves along the banks of the Styx and considers what a to-do they are making here on earth over his poor bones after he has been dead—and all but forgotten—for 138 years. He has had more newspaper publicity in the last few weeks than he obtained during his entire lifetime, and hundreds of persons who never heard of him until this autumn have suddenly become violently passionate about the future resting-place of whatever dust may be left of him. Is the American craze for change to have no limit? Having dug up our war dead from the only soil which in any true sense can be called consecrated, must we now disinter every other American or near-American who may have fallen by the way abroad? General Oglethorpe left Georgia of his own free will, and lived in England forty-two years thereafter without ever returning. Why bring him back forcibly now? But, of course, universities must live, and universities—like soap—live by advertising. Oglethorpe University has a president, and a university president must be a money-getter and a go-getter and—finally, it seems—a bone-getter. It is a little depressing, though, that a modern university should have expended so much more energy and passion on a dead general than on live professors.

A SUSPICION has been growing of late years that it might be just as well to treat university undergraduates as adults instead of as children. The creatures seemed to be getting out of hand, and sops like student self-government and the honor system at examinations and student members on the Faculty Committee on Student Affairs were thrown out from time to time by more than one harassed Alma Mater. But, of course, the cut system and compulsory attendance at classes was the prop on which the academic world rested. It seemed obvious that if a student did not have to come to class he would stay away; if you did not believe it, you could visit the classes yourself and see why. Now Princeton has taken the bold step of permitting the students to decide for themselves if and when they will attend classes. This puts a fearful responsibility on the instructor. Henceforth he must make his classes interesting. At the end of the course he will also have to prepare an examination determining less whether the student has mastered his facts than whether he has any ideas about them, or about anything. Some young gentlemen will never come to class at all, but if they do not and can satisfy the instructor in those two points, Princeton is ready to admit that it is all right. Common-sense sometimes sounds alarmingly revolutionary.

NEW YORK plays New York for the "world's championship" in a sport that is as narrowly national as buckwheat cakes—and half a million fans on the spot yell themselves hoarse while millions more listen to radio announcers until their feet grow cold and their noses run. Some millions of tongues stutter, with varying degrees of inaccuracy, the classic lines of Casey at the Bat when "Casey" Stengel knocks a home run into the right-field bleachers. Still more millions enthusiastically choral "Atta Baby" when George Herman Ruth clouts the ball clear outside the playing field. There is no common sense or philosophy to it. Half a dozen men own all the stock in both Yankees and Giants, and hardly half a dozen players on either team call New York home. When a psychologist turns up able to explain why a whole continent goes mad over a sport which has become a branch of big business he will probably be so wise that he can also tell us how to avoid the next war. Before that, however, if anyone ever listens to him long enough to understand what he is doing, he will probably be lynched. We might spare the games but we could never get along without the living literature which they inspire in the Heywood Brouns and the Grantland Rices.

Mr. Hughes Makes a Secret Alliance

THE Republican Party, nominally, and a large number of American citizens, actually, are opposed to "entangling alliances." Yet without authority from Congress, and under cover of secret negotiations, Charles E. Hughes, as director of foreign affairs for the present Republican administration in Washington, has entangled the United States in an alliance which forms a new chapter in the most dangerous kind of imperialism.

By formal diplomatic agreement Mr. Hughes has allied the United States government with a group of investment bankers in making a loan of $6,000,000 to the republic of Salvador, and he has pledged the services of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court—or some other Federal judge—as arbitrator in a business transaction purely for private profit. In an editorial note two weeks ago on the Salvador loan we remarked that previous to the publication of its terms it was impossible to say what political control that country was ceding. The terms are before us now, and we are amazed not so much with what Salvador is giving for a mess of Wall Street pottage (for that is getting to be an old story among Latin American republics) as with what the United States is giving—the way in which Mr. Hughes has made the Department of State an agency for a group of financiers and has involved the Federal government in an undertaking which experience has proved to be the most potent cause of foreign aggression and imperialistic warfare in our day. The first paragraph of the bankers' circular inviting subscriptions to the loan puts it concisely:

> The United States of America and El Salvador have entered into an exchange of formal diplomatic notes with reference to this loan . . . by which Salvador on its part assures the United States that it will cooperate in every respect with the government of the United States and the bankers in carrying out the terms of the loan contract, and the United States on its part takes cognizance of the terms of the loan contract and states that the Secretary of State of the United States is prepared to carry out the stipulations with reference to him in Articles IX, XIX, and XXIII of the loan contract should it be necessary to do so.

The articles alluded to provide, among other things, for reference of differences to the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court and for the appointment of Salvador's Collector General of Customs. The latter, it is provided, must be one of two persons nominated by the fiscal agent of the American bankers "with the concurrence of the Secretary of State of the United States," which nominations "shall be transmitted to the republic through the Department of State of the United States." Thus both the judicial and the executive branches of the United States government are committed to the flotation and collection of this loan. The only branch not included is the legislative, and this branch Mr. Hughes studiously ignored, although his "agreements" with Salvador are far more important actually and potentially than most negotiations which when classed as "treaties" require the consent of the Senate for their ratification.

Mr. Hughes's action constitutes secret diplomacy at its worst. No adequate information of what was going on was permitted to reach the public until the agreement was completed. Then the important details were divulged only to prospective purchasers of bonds in a brokers' circular impudently marked: "For confidential use of addressee only. Not to be reprinted." The Nation takes pleasure in making public some of the salient data in this circular without permission and without apology. We think, for instance, that the circular hits the nail on the head when it says:

> The State Department of the U. S. government has inquired into the price which the bankers are paying for this loan as it wants Salvador to get a fair deal. Per contra, the bondholders are entitled to and will unquestionably receive the full protection of their own government. This protection is promised under the contract in so far as it is provided that any dispute as to the terms of the contract is to be submitted by the Secretary of the State of the U. S. to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court for adjudication and final determination, and Salvador agrees to abide by such a decision. In case the Chief Justice cannot act, any question is to be referred by the Secretary of State to some other Federal judge. It is simply not thinkable that after a Federal judge has decided any question or dispute between the bondholders and the Salvador government, that the U. S. government should not take the necessary steps to sustain such decision. There is a precedent in a dispute between Costa Rica and Panama, in which a warship was sent to carry out the verdict of the arbitrators.

Quite so.

We have spoken of this loan so far only as it affects the United States, because the most astonishing aspect is the way in which our government is made a participant—in everything except the profits. So far as Salvador is concerned, the loan presents an equally bad face. For the quarter century during which the bonds run, 70 per cent of the customs duties are to be paid direct to a representative of the bondholders in Salvador, and if this is not enough for the interest and sinking-fund charges in United States gold the entire customs may be demanded. In case of default the representative of the bondholders automatically fills the position of Collector General of Customs. As the brokers' circular neatly puts it: "The government [that of Salvador] at no time receives any of the money pledged for the benefit of the bondholders, but the bondholders collect this money themselves." It is further provided that during the life of the bond issue the customs duties, whether export or import, shall not be altered so as to reduce the gross revenues. Thus Salvador not only cedes her entire customs duties, if needed, for twenty-five years, but also pledges another generation to her present tariff policy.

One of the first duties of our new Congress should be to investigate this shameless transaction by an administration whose motto is "less government in business." Among the questions that may pertinently be asked we suggest:

Do the American people want the Department of State to make secret agreements with foreign countries and entangling alliances with international financiers?

Who gave Mr. Hughes the right to lay out work for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court or other Federal judges?

Are American fathers and mothers agreed that their sons shall be marched into Latin America to lay down their lives in order that the world may be made safe for Wall Street investments?

A Challenge to Henry Ford

MR. WEEKS may be a tool of the interests as Henry Ford suggests, but his sale of the Gorgas steam plant to the Alabama Power Company does not prove it. Nor does Mr. Ford make a case for the necessity of keeping the Gorgas steam plant, ninety miles away, as an integral part of the Muscle Shoals hydro-electric development.

So honest a Senator as Mr. Norris of Nebraska, chairman of a committee which investigated this whole matter, thinks it probable that the relations between the government and the Alabama Power Company with regard to their respective rights in the Gorgas plant were so tangled that the only way out was for the government to sell to the Power Company. He believes if Mr. Ford had bought out the government he would probably have sold the Gorgas plant to the Alabama Power Company for about as much as he offered the government for the whole Muscle Shoals outfit, including Gorgas. The alternative would have been endless litigation, in which the power company would have tried to enforce the contract provision that it should have first option on the Gorgas property if the government sold.

At any rate the government got $3,500,000 for the Gorgas plant which cost about $5,000,000. This may be bad but it is rather better than Mr. Ford's offer of $5,000,000 for real estate, house, factories, equipment at Muscle Shoals, the Waco limestone quarry, and the Gorgas plant, for all of which the government paid about $90,000,000.

From such a tangled mess of personalities and politics there seems to us one plain escape. Mr. Weeks suspects Mr. Ford of seeking a personal and political profit; Mr. Ford says that Mr. Weeks is playing into the hands of the big interests. Meanwhile, the farmers want nitrate, and they do not care very much whether Mr. Ford becomes President or what Mr. Weeks does for Wall Street if only they can get cheap fertilizer. Mr. Ford says he knows how to produce cheap fertilizer, and Mr. Weeks controls the power which Mr. Ford needs to produce it. Why not let Mr. Ford produce it, not for personal profit, but for the people? There could never be another doubt of Mr. Ford's sincerity if he would offer to hire himself out to the government as a dollar-a-year man, or better still at a moderate commercial salary, to develop Muscle Shoals as a great government-owned plant efficiently producing fertilizer at cost for the farmers of the United States.

Mr. Ford, Muscle Shoals seems to have fascinated you. Will you offer to head a commission of three, with, say, Senator Norris as one of your colleagues, to develop Muscle Shoals without a suspicion of private profit? Mr. Weeks, will you let Mr. Ford do it?

Reason in Fiction

SOME excellent and by no means hide-bound contemporaries are alarmed and shocked by the latest manners of the art of fiction; others are in a triumphant state about Mr. Joyce and Miss Richardson and Miss Woolf and Mr. Frank and speak of the amazing authenticity of the works of these and similar authors. We suspect that neither group is quite steadily keeping its eye on the object, as Wordsworth used to say, but that each is in reality waving a little private flag. The one group says under its breath: "This is disgusting and immoral. Is there to be no reserve or decency? Shall both the mind and the body appear habitually naked? Man, after all, is an animal that wears clothes!" The other group says not quite so softly but rather in a stage whisper: "Off with the indecent rags. Let us have the naked truth. That is decent; that is moral."

No, we haven't the slightest intention of taking a middle ground, counseling moderation, saying: truth and authenticity are good things, but even a good thing can be overdone. Heaven forbid! Truth and authenticity cannot be overdone. Nothing that is human can or should be alien. In so far as the art of fiction can press closer and closer to the very core and quick of life it will become a greater and, in the Goethean sense, a more useful art.

Do we then belong to the heralds and proclaimers of the new fiction? We do not. We deny its authenticity; we deny that its crazy-quilt fragmentariness of form or that its endless rambling establish a closer contact between reality and itself than has been achieved by other men and other media. We deny, above all, that its complete neglect of the human mind brings us nearer to the inner truth of life.

The human mind is, to be sure, nothing to brag of. It has made a hash of civilization. To speak of the horse-sense of most people in this world is an insult to a noble and useful animal. But the human mind, such as it is, exists and functions. And when it functions well—a thing that happens, however rarely—it is the source of any hope we have. But it always functions somehow, usually quite violently, and usually, alas, the violence is not in proportion to the excellence of the functioning. Nothing is so common and widespread as the making of judgments. Bad judgments, no doubt. But there they are. Take men at their crudest. Are they without principle? Ah, if only they were! They are as stuffed with principle and principles as a pillow is stuffed with feathers. Only the principles are all mean and superstitious and barbarous. There is no endless stream of sensation and revery flowing through the consciousness of these gentlemen. They stop the stream. They put their foot down. They do what they call thinking. They pass moral judgments. They live, in their own conceit, in an ordered and rational universe. They mean to keep it so, even if they have to go night-riding.

What the new fiction misses is both the terror and the pathos of this fact. Man is, after his queer fashion, a reflective and moral being. He doesn't, as a matter of fact, live in a mental void. His ideas are, as a rule, phantoms and hobgoblins and no true ideas. But he thinks they are ideas. He thinks he thinks. He thinks he governs his life by his thinking. To exclude that consideration and that fact is to exclude half of life and the groundwork of life and all the genuine damnation or salvation that there is.

There is another and more vital consideration. It is the mark of the artist to be a thinker. He must dwell in what Plato calls an intelligible world. He knows the shadows on the wall of the cave to be but shadows. He sees under the aspect of eternity. He may be passionately absorbed in experience; thought is part of his passion. Even while he endures life he transcends it through his mind. His pangs are never blind; his very ache has vision. There is nothing so secret, so shameful, so pitiful, so perverse in all the world that he cannot treat it in writing unless and until he deliberately resigns the higher function of his being and silences that reason by virtue of which he stands above life even while he identifies himself with it. He may become wholly one with the sorrows and aberrations of men. He may share with them everything except that ultimate and sovereign reason which stands aside and thinks the thoughts of eternity. We have a suspicion that the authors of some of the new fiction have silenced that voice within them. That is why the muddiness and earthiness in some of their work seems ugly to sensitive people. The earth is full of mud. But the stars shine over the mud. The stars should not be put out.

Irish Prisons

WE print this week in the International Relations Section documents and statements bearing on the treatment of political prisoners in Ireland. Both sides are presented. The Free State Government rests its case on the report of the International Committee of the Red Cross. Miss Broderick, in behalf of the Republican prisoners and the Prisoners' Defense League, criticizes the report and succeeds, it seems to us, in establishing the investigation as a one-sided and incomplete affair at best. She refrains from definite charges but in a letter accompanying the manuscript she makes some statements worthy of quotation:

> . . . I have been three times thrown into prison, the last time having been fired on by Free State troops and wounded. There was no charge brought against me and no trial. I went on hunger-strike and was released after fifteen days. . . . I have myself seen girls detained in hospital in grievous pain from being kicked in the stomach and side by men of the Criminal Investigation Department. I have seen women with their faces scratched and their bodies bruised by the violence of female searchers. One girl had a cut on her head necessitating four stitches. I have had the personal evidence of men who have been beaten and tortured until they prayed for death and of men who have seen men killed for no reason, before their eyes, and have seen others brought in to prison able only to lie groaning and speechless on their beds after the torture and who were taken out again for renewed torture within two days' time.

In regard to the investigation of the Red Cross, Miss Broderick says:

> One of these delegates, having obtained permission, then went round three internment camps, and half of one prison only. It may be noted that it was against the prisons and not against the internment camps that the most serious allegations were made. Notwithstanding this, the report stated to the world that the camps have an excellent and well-organized sanitary service (including medical attention) and that the complaints as to sanitary conditions, poor food, and forbidding correspondence and parcels were unfounded. We are entirely in disaccord with this finding—which is simply not true. During my imprisonment all letters and parcels were forbidden us, and sanitary and medical conditions were bad. For four days my wounds were left undressed. . . .

Miss Broderick, of course, can no more claim impartiality than can the Free State Government, but her direct personal testimony is more convincing than any official denial or than the statements of an investigation carried on under government auspices. We disagree with Miss Broderick's politics; we think that the Free State was probably the best form of government that could be secured for Ireland under the immediate menace of the British heel. Mr. Nevinson's analysis of the political situation printed elsewhere in this issue appeals to us as reasonable—as almost unanswerable. It is as a friend of the Free State Government, then, that we oppose with all our strength its policy of eliminating opposition by throwing thousands of men and women into jail, of refusing to acknowledge that these men and women are political prisoners, and of subjecting them to treatment that, in spite of the Red Cross inquiry, we still believe to be improper and needlessly brutal. It is not by such means as these that bitter hate will be healed and Ireland made finally into one strong nation.

Bones of Camels

FORD cars in the desert; airplanes in the Arctic; "horseshoe links" in California—we have grown accustomed to these inroads of civilization and almost forgotten the days when we lifted lonely voices of protest against automobile highways through the Adirondack wilderness. And now suddenly we find that progress has, so to speak, reached its goal. Upon the testimony of England's only Moslem peer and the first European openly to make a pilgrimage to the shrine of Mecca, that impregnable fortress of an ancient faith has become modern. Lord Headley—who holds the world's championships mentioned above—has returned from his pilgrimage with the word that newsboys and "legmen" and a foreign news service keep the streets of Mecca aware of all that goes on in the world. He says that automobiles whirl back and forth between the holy city and Jeddah, the pilgrim port on the Red Sea—"and the route is indicated by the bleached bones of dead camels which have been engaged in the pilgrimage." Well, in time, we suppose, even these bones will be covered with the dust of many cars and spattered with gas and oil, and nothing, nothing at all, will be left to testify to weary centuries of tired, pious men who have worn their hearts and their bodies out on the long road to Mecca.

Primarily, however, the news of Mecca's breezy western atmosphere sets our aesthetic rather than our religious or sentimental nerves aquiver. Some parts of the world, hang it all, must be kept inefficient, slow, unsanitary, and beautiful. We are not convinced that life itself moves along a lovelier course in backward countries. Bertrand Russell, Edward Carpenter, and a hundred other opponents of industrialism say so, but we have, none the less, an impulse to seek our own happiness in a world of bathtubs and gas ranges. But this we know: beauty which is natural and an essential, accepted part of life lives somewhere else. Peasants the world over in backward regions have beautiful things that we can only acquire through wealth or leisure—and they not only see and possess, they create them. The embroidered clothes they wear, the bags they carry to market, the water jugs they hang on their donkeys, the crooks of their shepherds are cunning and beautiful—and out of our reach. If we have them at all we have them as trophies, exotic ornaments thrust into the midst of our manufactured possessions, and strangely out of place among them. The backward peasants have these things of their own right—and they treasure them.

Newsboys and airplanes may invade Mecca, automobiles may preserve pilgrims from the more painful ardors of their faith, but we shall still hold on to a hope of beauty in the world until we hear that the peasants of the Near East have sold their gorgeous handwoven bags to tourists and carry their seeds to market in the neat oil-cloth containers of Fourteenth Street, New York, and Main Street, Gopher Prairie.

What of the League?

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Geneva, October 1

WHAT of the League of Nations as its fourth Assembly comes to an end? Well, there can be no doubt that it ends with considerable gloom and little satisfaction with the results achieved. The gloom is not wholly due to the grave European situation which has overshadowed the entire meeting, nor to the incidents growing out of Mussolini's murderous acts in Corfu. "It is the poorest Assembly we have had," is the verdict of one of the permanent staff who will not admit much that is disadvantageous to the organization to which he is so devoted. It certainly has not sparkled; many of its sessions have been as dull as those of any American legislature, yet there has been great excitement within the ranks of the members and much indignation at the course of events. There have even been moments, as at last night's session, when there was mutiny in the air, mutiny on the part of the members of the Assembly against the acts and decisions of the Council. Yet there have been few moving utterances; only Nansen, Gilbert Murray, and Branting have really stirred the Assembly. It has not been, or has not been allowed to be, guilty of expressing any of the wrath and indignation it has felt at the procedure of Mussolini or the conduct of the Council of Ambassadors in calmly turning over to that brigand the fifty millions of liras which the Greeks put up as a guaranty of bona fides. Nor has the deep feeling held by many of the Assembly's members as to the events in the Ruhr been allowed to express itself except in the moving and downright speech of Gilbert Murray—always the scholar and honest gentleman.

For this Mussolini is in large part responsible. There would undoubtedly have been much said about the Ruhr situation had not the Italian dictator drawn his red herring across the trail just as it met and jeopardized the very life of the League itself by questioning its competence. Someone here has remarked that when you get a great group of men and women together in a foreign city like this they are only good for one big issue—they are not capable of more. That seems to be true of the psychology of this group, and so, to the delight of the French, the occupation of the Ruhr came up only once and the debate was choked off as soon as one or two lesser delegates had seconded Gilbert Murray's outburst—just as Nansen was declared out of order last night when he dared to express his opinion about the high-handed action of the Ambassadors. Perhaps the collapse of the Germans would have made any action as to the Ruhr impossible, but men like Professor Murray see very clearly that if the League is not to be allowed to have an opinion about acts as contrary to the principles of the League as that, the League will rapidly lose caste.

Indeed, if I were an advocate of the League as it is I should go away from here heartily discouraged, and that is, I think, the feeling of the liberal leaders who are honestly trying to make something out of this body in the interest of peace and humanity. They are whistling, some of them, like Robert Cecil, to keep up their courage; they are pretending that everything is going well, but in their heart of hearts they cannot be happy. In the first place, there is the quiet but never-ceasing effort of the French and Italians to sabotage the League. Next, it is now old enough to have growing pains and also to have developed some of the vices and weaknesses—such as log-rolling—of all legislatures. Then its activities are cleverly limited by its charter as if with malice aforethought—there was, for instance, no way in which it, since Greece was afraid to do so, could move to demand that Mussolini be made to pay for the human lives he so wantonly blotted out at Corfu. If, asked one of the protesting delegates at last night's session, the League cannot deal with acts of its members directly leading up to war, and the International Court cannot be trusted with strictly legal questions as to the League's competence, what is the function of either body?

When I first arrived here there was a general feeling that after all the League had gotten pretty well out of the Italian-Greek mess. The liberals acknowledged that the League had received a black eye abroad, but they felt that after the facts became known the League would regain its former position in public opinion. After all, they said, a war was averted and it would not have been had there been no League. They took the position that the Council of Ambassadors had accepted, with only one slight change, the proposals made by the League, and that if five private citizens had volunteered to settle the difficulty the League would have accepted such an offer provided the five were in a position to do the trick. The League, they said, is only an instrument to an end and if there is a better one why not use it?

The answer to that was, of course, that in the case of Mussolini they had used a worse one. As it was, this attitude of forced contentment was radically changed when the news came that the Ambassadors had calmly handed over the swag to Mussolini without even waiting for the guilt of anybody to be fixed. Rarely have I seen men so indignant. They not only felt outraged for the sake of the Greeks, they realized that they had been buncoed themselves and that the Ambassadors had accepted their terms merely in order to get around them. One of the Englishmen declared to me that Thursday was the blackest day in England's history since August 1, 1914. Gilbert Murray thanked God in the Assembly that the League had had nothing to do with that and uttered his profound regret that he could not say the same of the British Empire. The action of Lord Crewe broke the hearts of the high-minded Englishmen here. They would have been outraged enough had all the other ambassadors voted for this steal; they could not bear the thought that their own ambassador had by order of the Prime Minister joined in. This, following the rumors that Baldwin surrendered to Poincaré in Paris, seemed the last straw to men in Geneva who are up against sinister French and Italian opposition at every turn.

On top of that came the news that, finding it impossible to get the League's Council to agree to refer to the World Court the five questions arising out of the Italian challenge of the League's competence in the case of the Albanian murders, Lord Robert Cecil had agreed to the compromise the Italians asked and that these vital questions should go to a Special Commission of Jurists. The Council wrangled hour after hour over this and then Lord Robert announced it to the Assembly, not in sackcloth and ashes, but glorying in his shame. While he had felt, he said, that the matters ought to go to the World Court, still he was happy to record that there had been substantial agreement, the real object desired had been achieved, etc., etc. It was the worst kind of political trimming and compromising the old, old language of the expedient politician. Lord Robert has quite changed since he entered the British Cabinet—as was to be foreseen. It is said for him: "Of course, he is no longer free to act as he should like to now that he is in the Government!" You are quite expected to forget that last year when he was playing a different and finer role he was also representing a Government, that of South Africa. Fortunately, as already stated, he was not allowed to get off unscathed. One man after another got up to dissent. As it is, some of the smaller countries are still talking of drawing out. My judgment is that they will not now, but there is no denying the truth of a statement like that made by a Finnish delegate that the press in his country cannot understand why anybody should be allowed to remain one moment in doubt as to the competence of the League in so clear-cut a case. As Nansen put it, if he had been asked to create an absolutely perfect case for the League to act on he could not have produced a better one than Corfu.

Geneva is like Washington in that those at work in the League find it hard to realize the trend of public opinion outside of this locality. I am wondering tonight if Lord Robert has estimated the damage his compromise has done to the cause of the World Court in America. How can anybody get up to advocate the court in the United States and face the query why the League did not have faith enough in its own court to intrust to it such vital questions as its own competence but actually preferred instead to appoint a special court of political judges? For that is what these judges are going to be. Each member of the Council is to appoint one judge. Of course, each member of the Council will choose some one whose opinion he has ascertained in advance!

To illustrate the kind of slim behavior the honorable men in the League are up against, I may add that the Italians early insisted that they would not accede to the question of the League's competence being taken up unless the matter were separated from the Corfu affair. That was cheerfully accepted. Then, when the competence issue arose, the Italians promptly pointed out that a unanimous decision would be needed in the Council to settle the question of reference! Had the issues not been separated unanimous action would not have been required, if my information is correct. It is a constant struggle against the reactionary forces, with the smaller, and especially the Scandinavian, states playing a fine, brave role.

Meanwhile, it is only fair to acknowledge that the work done by the permanent secretariat and committees steadily increases in value. Those who carry it on say frankly that they need a great deal of time to build up their machinery, but they insist that it is far more effective than three or even two years ago and that it gets stronger with every year. But, as I have already pointed out, the one thing that is lacking in Europe is time. Already there is increasing pressure to cut the appropriations for the permanent forces and there is no doubt that the expense bears heavily upon certain nations, although it is pitifully small as contrasted with the price of one battleship.

The fate of the League as a machine for peace will not, however, be decided by the efficiency of its social or economic or legal bureaus but by political considerations. It is both the weakness and strength of the League that it is tied up with governments. It is its strength because in so far as the delegations represent the governments and speak for them their word is binding. Where the tie is loose, the home government sometimes fails to honor the obligations incurred by the delegation—as the French did on one occasion. One of the most thoughtful and influential and democratically minded men here told me that he absolutely opposed any plan to elect delegates through the parliaments or by direct popular vote because it would then be so easy for the home governments to ignore or even to thwart the actions taken here. So we must face the fact that the League is but a machine of the existing officialdoms in the various countries, that its source is the governments, and that it will only with great difficulty, if at all, rise above its source. All the governments are willing that it shall go on with its philanthropic work, regulate the traffic in obscene pictures and literature and the traffic in women, talk of improving conditions of labor—the chief cannon-fodder. But when it comes to interfering with the existing schemes of the chauvinistic governments of today, then the League must look out for itself. It may be that it will be killed by direct sabotage of the sort Mussolini, unwittingly perhaps, undertook; it may be that it will one day face an indignant withdrawal of the innocent smaller Powers who insist on taking the League seriously and dislike being buncoed; it may be that it will perish slowly by sinking into innocuous desuetude in both Assembly and Council. That it has done some excellent work no one can deny; that it might be welded into a great instrument for human righteousness is also true. But its survival as a really useful organization for justice as well as peace calls for the reform of certain governments which at present have not the slightest intention of being reformed but propose to carry on the world as if it were the same world that existed in 1914.

How to reform these governments which learn nothing and forget nothing and are now mere puppets in the hands of the great industrialists within their borders—that is the great problem of humanity. I asked one of the most distinguished and despairing members of the Assembly what he had to suggest. He has seen communism in Russia and is sure that that road leads only to ruin. Socialism has never had any attraction for him. He agreed to my statement of the problem—but when I asked him for his remedy he threw up his hands. The men here seem to know nothing of the possibilities of the cooperative commonwealth; they only faintly realize that political government has everywhere broken down, and they grope in the dark for a solution while fighting incessantly against the powers of darkness so conspicuous here. These are steadily sending Europe to its doom and will yet land her there if some miracle does not happen, such as a British buying-off of France in her relations with Germany or an awakening of America to the possibility of her using her good offices and influence—still tremendously potent in Europe—to bring certain countries to their senses before it is too late.

Railroads and the Mechanics of Social Power

By AMOS PINCHOT

II. The Technique of Industrial Monopoly

(This is the second of three articles which explain how the control of transportation by a unified group has resulted in its domination of the politics and culture of America.)

THE railroad question is a practical one, but like most practical questions it needs some patience. The fact is, industrial civilization has grown so complicated that we cannot hope to readjust it properly unless we have some idea of the principles that govern its functioning.

One of these principles has been beautifully stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission: "In any industry whoever controls the avenues of transportation of either the raw material or the finished product can speedily drive all competitors out of existence." This statement is of immense interest, because it points out the main process, the technique, the actual existing mechanics by which wealth, and incidentally power, is accumulated in a modern nation.

Monopoly is the surest and quickest way of making money. If you can once destroy competition and establish monopoly in a large business producing things people need, you not only become rich; you become a power in the community. Let us see how the principle laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission has worked, not in theory but in fact, in building up monopoly in America's industrial field.

Up to 1901, when the Steel Corporation appeared on the scene, the steel industry was highly competitive. There was no monopoly. Prices were regulated by the law of supply and demand. Though some of the steel-makers formed pools and did their best to boost prices, the competitive spirit proved too strong for them. Whenever prices rose above a certain point outsiders would rush in, undercut the figure fixed by the pool, and take the pool members' customers away. Besides, as Mr. Schwab relates in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, the pool members themselves would not abide by their agreements. True, they would solemnly sit at the meetings and fix prices for steel products. But, according to Mr. Schwab, the moment a motion to adjourn was carried, they broke for the telephones, called up customers, and undersold each other without the least compunction.

In 1901, however, an amazing change was seen. As if by magic competition ceased. Prices were fixed by the newly formed trust, and no one dared disturb them. And there began a golden era of steady, unparalleled profits. Though the Steel Corporation's assets were worth only about $400,000,000, it had paid, by the end of the first nine months, dividends aggregating $41,979,168.75 and carried forward as surplus $43,620,940.30. According to Mr. Farquhar J. McRae, the statistician for the congressional committee that investigated the steel industry in 1911, in the first nine years ending December 31, 1910, its adjusted net earnings totaled $1,029,585,389.28, or an average of $13 a ton on sales to customers, or a net profit of 40 per cent on the actual cost of production.

How was this feat accomplished? By what means did the trust contrive to banish competition in the most competitive industry of the time? Why was it able to shelve the law of supply and demand, fix prices arbitrarily, and take so substantial a toll from the public pocket? A partial reply is found in the words of the Interstate Commerce Commission: "In any industry whoever controls the avenues of transportation of either the raw material or the finished product can speedily drive all competitors out of existence."

But this explanation is obviously incomplete. We must also inquire, first, how the trust controlled transportation and, second, how, with transportation controlled, it developed its monopoly and price-fixing prerogative. The answer is that it bought the great ore-carrying railroads from the Missabe range down to the upper lake ports. It bought the principal ore-carrying lake boats and barges and docking facilities. And it bought the strategic railroads from the lower lake ports to the Pittsburgh district. Today the Steel Corporation owns or leases roads with about 3,500 miles of track.

The immediate results of these purchases were little short of phenomenal. They are described in the report of the congressional committee already referred to, which was signed by the committee, but largely the work of Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, now of the United States Supreme Court. The outstanding fact developed in the report may be summed up briefly as follows:

It takes two tons of ore to make one ton of pig iron. The committee found that, because the Steel Corporation carried its own ore on its railroads, ships, and barges at cost and that of outsiders at a large profit, the cost of assembling, in the Pittsburgh district, enough ore to make a ton of pig was $2.61 more for the outsider than for the trust. In other words, control of transportation gave the trust an advantage or differential of $2.61 on every ton of metal it produced. And this does not count its further differential in assembling coke, coal, and limestone. So that the committee put the trust's total transportation advantage over the independent at something more than $3 a ton.

How impossible competition became under these conditions is shown by the statement of the trust's own very eminent engineer, Mr. Julian Kennedy, who was retained to select the plants the trust took over:

> The Chairman: As I understand it, you are of the opinion, if by any method we could force the common carriers of the country to treat all industries exactly alike, the advantage of the Steel Corporation over its competitors would be practically eliminated?
> Mr. Kennedy: To a great extent. . . .
> The Chairman: If the Steel Corporation chose to do it, with its present weapons, could it destroy its competitors?
> Mr. Kennedy: I think it could; yes.

In corroboration of this, Judge Gary admitted at the Lockwood investigation in 1922 that the trust's control of transportation was "a substantial advantage." And at about the same time the general manager of one of the largest outside companies told me that, in his opinion, there had never been a day since the steel trust's formation when it could not have destroyed every independent by using its transportation differential against them.

Indeed, this conclusion seems unescapable. For, armed with the differential, the representative of the trust can go to the independent and say: "If you undersell the price fixed by us you will have a price war on your hands. We will sell down to cost and, owing to our special transportation advantage, this will be about $3 below cost for you. How long do you think you can hold out?"

At this point, it is perhaps appropriate to say that, notwithstanding considerable propaganda to the contrary, the steel trust's power and profits are in no sense due to size or superior efficiency. The congressional committee reports that it is abundantly shown that "the actual cost of production between the United States Steel Corporation and other large concerns is practically the same." And Mr. Andrew Carnegie took the position that a huge combination of combinations like the Steel Corporation is a notably poor producer compared to smaller, but still large and well-integrated concerns. "If you want to keep the country ahead in steel," said he, "you cannot depend on the great combinations. In the nature of the case they become conservative."

In addition to the transportation differential already described, itself enough to overawe the most headstrong independent, the trust has a large but not easily measured advantage arising from its community of interest with railroads all over the country, which it does not own but controls to a greater or less extent, through common ownership and interlocking directorates. As far back as 1910 John Moody stated that officers and directors of the Steel Corporation were also officers or directors in railroad corporations capitalized at $10,000,000,000, the total capitalization of all our roads being $18,000,000,000. These interpenetrated roads naturally favor the trust, both in the matter of purchasing supplies and in the prompt delivery of trust products, whether to themselves or other customers.

The situation in the coal industry does not differ substantially from what we have seen in iron and steel. There, too, we find monopoly and high prices, due to the same cause—one interest controlling both mines and railroads. Dissolutions by the courts have had little effect beyond forcing the railroad and coal companies to the inconvenience of erecting partitions in their common offices, through which the business of squeezing the public goes on as usual.

Though I cannot prove it, as there has been no adequate investigation of the facts, I am credibly informed by dealers that besides controlling the price at the mines, the railroad-coal monopoly also fixes the price at which the local dealer sells; and that any dealer who undercuts this price may look forward to having his coal supply cut off at the source. But whether this is true or not, it is sufficiently clear that the public will never get good coal at reasonable prices until the government takes over the coal roads and at the same time condemns and leases to private competitive developers some of the unused coal lands now held out of use by the trust. There is nothing experimental about this. The government owns and successfully operates a railroad in Alaska; and the fee of all timber and grazing land and water-power sites on our Western federal reserves has long been held by the government, which leases the natural resources to private individuals or corporations under contracts guarding the public interest.

In the oil industry it is the same story. Despite all the Interstate Commerce Commission can do, the trust still controls railroad and pipe-line rates. Last year Mr. Nicholas, president of the National Petroleum Marketers' Association, testified at Washington that if the independents start any "real competition" they "are up against a system of reprisals that rather deprive you of the desire to try the experiment more than once." The railroads, he said, have "no cars for the other fellow." And Mr. Gray, president of the National Association of Independent Oil Producers, showed how the trust makes regulations for the use of its pipe lines which practically exclude the independents, except on a basis that prohibits competition. His experience in trying to change unfair rates and regulations by application to courts and commissions had been at once so expensive and so barren of results that he was forced to advise the independents not to attempt to disturb them.

In the beef industry the discriminations against the independents are equally notorious. The railroads favor the trust by countless devices which they replace by new ones as fast as the government proceeds against them. Empty trust cars are shipped back quickly, while those of independents wait for cargoes; refunds for defective icing; differentials through the trust-owned terminals and stockyards; rebates by false claims, rebates by bogus leases, differentials and discriminations of a hundred kinds. The Federal Trade Commission reported that, in 1917, the railroads hauled the cars of the Big Five packers an average of 80.8 miles, while those of the independents only made 54.5 miles a day.

No wonder President Calloway of the New York Central is quoted as saying: "We do not do these foolish things [rate discriminations] from choice. I will say that they are just as bad and foolish and stupid as can be, but what are we going to do about it? We have built up these big shippers and now they control us." And President Fish of the Illinois Central: "Tell me how to enforce the Ten Commandments and I will tell you how to stop discriminations."

But why, one might ask, will discriminatory practices cease under public ownership? A book might be written on the subject. One obvious answer is that the men in charge of the Federal government's technical work have always maintained a high standard of honesty and esprit de corps; another, that the railroad men responsible for discriminatory acts now report to superiors who are the beneficiaries of these acts and keenly interested in their continuance. Under government ownership, on the other hand, the men in charge of running the roads will report neither to trust magnates nor bankers, but to departmental heads, whose one chance of holding their jobs will be to furnish good service and avoid the scandalous favoritism that now goes on known but unpunished.

Contrast for a moment conditions in the industries in which private railroading has produced monopoly, with those that are still free and competitive, such for instance as automobile making. In the steel, coal, oil, meat-packing, and similar monopolies, prices have steadily gone up and the tendency of quality has been either to go down or remain stationary. In the automobile business, on the contrary, cars have become better and cheaper, notwithstanding the rise in labor and materials. Why is this? Merely because since freight rates are not a vital element in the automobile industry, railroad discrimination cannot successfully be used against competitors.

Thus, in the major basic industries of the United States, private railroading has built up an unwise, expensive, and by no means efficient monopoly system. It is unwise because it tears down the equality of industrial opportunity, which is the only secure basis of political democracy in an industrial age. It is expensive because it raises prices to levels which the public can ill afford to pay. It is inefficient because, since it is easy to make money under monopoly, the main incentive to efficiency and invention is removed. Likewise, by a strange twist of fate, the monopolists have unwittingly introduced into industry the cardinal and very real vice of socialism. Indeed, they have actually done what the socialists have dreamed of, i.e., destroyed competitive enterprise and erected in its place a dull monopolistic hierarchy; the main difference between the socialists' heaven and this arrangement being that, in the former monopoly is supposed to be for the benefit of all society, while under the existing regime it works to the advantage of a few people only, the monopolists themselves.

We are maintaining at great public cost a poor system of common carriers. Unable to support themselves, we subsidize them enormously through the Transportation Act. They are our most expensive paupers, and yet they have none of the loyalty to the public that should be attributable to a well-fed public charge. They still favor the private interests that have used and wrecked them, and they are common carriers only in name.

In the next article I will discuss the effect exerted by pools of power, produced by private railroading and monopoly, on our political system and on society.

Why Irish Labor Failed

By HENRY W. NEVINSON

Dublin, September 23

YOU ask me to tell you something about the state of Ireland, and specifically about the failure of the Labor Party at the recent election in the Free State. I have followed Irish questions very closely for forty years. I have lived much in Ireland. As often happens with Englishmen, I have loved the country better than my own. I have lately been staying in a "Republican" district far out in the west. I have conversed with leaders and followers of every party. And I have attended the meetings of the newly elected Dail. So I know a good deal about the subject. But does knowledge make the answer to a question easier? Never believe it! Ignorance answers easily. Any clever correspondent after two days in a Dublin hotel will slam you off a solution of Ireland in half a dozen lines. But every writer knows that the more you know the harder it is to write.

Take even the labor question about which you inquire. The labor leaders expected 27 or 30 seats in the new Dail (it is called the Fourth Dail, but is really the first duly elected under the Treaty of December, 1921). Now the Labor members sitting on the left of the small semicircle in the old courtroom of Leinster House make a forlorn little group of 14 (nominally 15, but one has already left them). They have lost their orator, O'Shannon, and they have lost their enthusiastic but steady leading member, William O'Brien. Their real leader and creator, Tom Johnson, still holds his place, though under proportional representation he scraped in with difficulty. That Northern Irishman, so honorable, so sensible and straightforward, so highly respected by all parties, stands as Leader of the Opposition, but what a fragment that opposition is! Next to the little Labor Party sits the Farmers Party, also numbering 14 or 15; and in some questions the two parties may combine. But even when combination is complete (and that will be seldom, for farmers are born opponents of labor and change) the opposition could count only on about 30 as against about 80 of the Government combined with the Independents, who will support the Government at a crisis.

The main cause of labor's failure was simply the condition of the country ever since De Valera repudiated the treaty directly after it had been signed. The real issue at the election was the continuance or destruction of the treaty. That was a question of life or death, and a question of life or death extinguishes all others. In England we have proved it in the "Khaki" or war elections. In Ireland the choice before the people was whether they would maintain the treaty as an immense advance in national liberty—an advance far beyond anything that former leaders had even imagined—or repudiate the treaty and bring the British Government, army, and police back again to renew the old struggle. I understand the idealists of the so-called Republican cause as well as any foreigner can. With the idealists are mixed up a lot of men and women who enjoy the excitement of fighting and bloodshed for its own sake, together with a lot of land-grabbers who have burned down the big houses, seized the lands or turned in their cattle, and strongly object to a Government which drives them out of the lands, takes the cattle to pay compensation, and actually insists upon rates and taxes. But I cannot go into the Republican question now. It appears to inflame your readers, as it inflames some of my friends here. My point is that Treaty versus Civil War was the vital question before the electors, and so the labor candidates had little chance. The Labor Party had strongly opposed many government actions, especially as to the imprisonments and executions. At the same time they had not denounced the Government violently enough to please the enemies of the treaty. So they occupied a middle position. And a middle position may appeal to philosophers, but it makes no appeal to electors in Ireland. Besides, the labor question is still new to the country. For about seven centuries the burning questions were defense of nationality, defense of religion, and defense of the land. Outside Belfast the labor question has hardly existed, and in Belfast it was surpassed by the religious contest. In the Free State it hardly exists outside Dublin, Cork, and perhaps Limerick, Waterford, and Galway, and it is noticeable that in all those big towns labor failed. In Dublin itself only 6 per cent of the voters voted Labor.

To be sure the party was torn by internal division, chiefly due to the workings of Jim Larkin, whom you have returned to this country as a gift. Ten years ago, at the time of the great dock strike here and the formation of the Transport Workers Union, I saw a good deal of Jim Larkin. I always regarded him as an egoist of immense physical and rhetorical energy, highly qualified to detect and expose suffering or wrong, but far less qualified to discover remedies. Now, though he does not announce himself as a leader, he is said to inspire the dockers' rank-and-file committee, which dictates to the executive of the union. His only power lies in Dublin, where he occasionally addresses open-air meetings. In the election he always opposed the candidates of the regular Labor Party, and though his own supporters always failed, he probably reduced the labor representatives in the Dail. He has no followers in the Dail himself. As to the charges of bolshevist aims and Moscow influence, I disregard them. They are made against everyone whom other parties dislike. In one movement we are freely charged with receiving "Tory gold"; in another, with receiving "Moscow diamonds"!

The Irish Labor Party refuses labels. It will not even call itself "socialist," for who knows what socialist means? For the moment the vital labor question here, as in England, is unemployment. The causes are much the same in both countries, the main cause being the callow brutality of French politicians in carrying on the starvation and destruction of the German people. Actual unemployment is perhaps relieved here by keeping some 10,000 to 15,000 (the number is still uncertain) men and women in prison as actual or possible violent rebels against the state; also by enrolling some 40,000 young men in the new Free State army. But neither prisoners nor soldiers are lucrative, and both are being reduced. Meantime strikes rage throughout nearly all the cities, worst in Dublin and Cork. Strikes are at present labor's only weapon, but the weapon is suicidal. As Bernard Shaw says in a characteristic article in the first number of the new Irish Statesman (On Throwing Out Dirty Water, and in "dirty water" he includes all manner of obsolete Irish conceptions and ideals): "The strike means starving on your enemy's doorstep. . . . The modern capitalist simply calls the police to remove your body to the mortuary." But I suppose the striker may hope that his body on the doorstep may first infect the owner's household. It is not a pleasing process for either side to contemplate.

White, Protestant, and Dry

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE "Citizenship Conference," called here by distinguished Protestant religious leaders to promote a hope for a more vigorous enforcement of the Volstead law, was notably lacking in speeches by distinguished Catholics and was notably lacking also in attentiveness to the enforcement of the constitutional rights of Negroes or of man as man. It spoke much of "obedience to law" but it cared little for law as law. It fixed itself on a certain tiny segment of the circle of law and on that segment it lavished the full force of the assembled Protestant conscience of America.

Drawing by Art Young

"Now, gen'lemen, let us all stanup an' give three cheers for the glorious Cons'itution."

Washington, which is always unwillingly enacting legislation forced upon it by exigent groups of voters, perceives once more that after having gone through a legislative spasm it confronts an administrative crisis. Alone among the countries of the world, the United States produces people who, having forced a government to enact a certain law, then find that they must rally together—as this "Citizenship Conference" declares—to conduct a "ten years' fight" to secure the actual recognition of that law as a binding law to which obedience must be rendered.

The difficulty of the matter is considerably increased by the numerousness of other laws to which obedience is not yet rendered but to which obedience is strictly logically equally desirable.

It is suggested accordingly that the Department of Justice, in imitation of the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding freight traffic, should issue "priority orders" regarding law enforcement.

The situation is that we have a congestion of law-enforcement traffic and movement. The enforcement of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments regarding the civil and political rights of Negroes, is stalled in the passes of the Alleghenies. The enforcement of the basic rights of man, in so far as they are possessed by Catholics and Jews and Negroes and citizens charged with crime but unconvicted of it, against the Ku Klux Klan and other mobs, is stalled on hills and plains throughout the country.

Meanwhile the "bottle-neck" yards, which cannot be widened except by new enormous expenditures of public money, are jammed and clogged by the busy engineers and conductors of statutes regarding maternity welfare, motion-picture inspection, sedition eradication, boll-weevil extermination, foreign-trade inquiry, domestic-trade analysis, gambling prevention, Sabbath protection, and other endeavors classifiable as necessaries or classifiable as luxuries.

The essential demand of the "Citizenship Conference" is that the Volstead law shall be classified as a necessary and shall in fact be put at the head of all necessaries and given a special absolutely first extra "priority order" entitling it to unconditional precedence over all other forms of enforcement traffic on all Federal Government tracks.

Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, the leader and the idol of the "Citizenship Conference," informs the Federal Government that by all means there must be a special Federal department or agency, responsive directly to the President himself, for the enforcement of prohibition and of prohibition alone.

Many Negro inhabitants of Washington, however, think that the numbers fourteen and fifteen come before the number eighteen, and that while it may be a very good thing to have a special Federal department for enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment regarding prohibition, it would also be an equally good thing to have a special Federal department for enforcing the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments regarding particularly Negro suffrage.

They argue in fact that the Negro suffrage Federal enforcement department ought to have a large "priority" over the prohibition Federal enforcement department both in size of appropriation and in vigor and concentration of effort.

They think that an appropriation of $100,000,000 a year would be no less than is needed in order to enforce Negro suffrage in Mississippi under a Federal Negro suffrage enforcement Volstead law.

They also think that a special emergency appropriation of perhaps half a billion dollars may be needed in order to compel Congress to obey the mandate in the Fourteenth Amendment regarding the reduction of the congressional representation of States in which Negro suffrage is restricted.

In any case they see no reason why their constitutional amendments, which have been law for more than half a century, should not have a special Federal enforcement department if such a department is to be granted to a juvenile constitutional amendment which has been law for less than half a decade.

At this point, however, there is a considerable clamor raised by the special friends of the first amendment. This amendment is almost as old as the Constitution itself and has to do with free speech. It is not impertinently suggested that "priority order number one" should issue to the activities of a Federal free-speech encouragement department which would watch over, and endeavor to prevent, all invasions and infractions of the right of free speech, particularly during strikes in Governor Pinchot's State of Pennsylvania.

It develops then, however, that there still are certain enthusiasts and fanatics who give their special attention to those primary and basic rights of man which antedate the Constitution and which underlie the whole idea of government and which have to do with preventing individuals from physically assaulting the properties or the persons of other individuals.

Physical security for property and for person, it is pointed out by such antiquarians, is the original primal purpose of government; and there is less of that security for individuals against other individuals—or for individuals against mobs—in this country than in any other civilized country in the world.

It is accordingly strongly suggested that a special Federal agency shall be instituted for the purpose of establishing a civilized degree of physical security in the United States and that this agency shall be given "Priority Order Number Triple A 1 Plus" and that "Citizenship Conferences" shall be numerously held all over the country to rally all citizenry to the support of this agency in order that the primary foundations of government may be securely laid in the hearts and minds of all citizens to the end that thereupon from time to time there may be raised high towers and pinnacles of new lofty excess-baggage ideals.

Such are the lengths to which the zealots would go who are willing to get along with a scandalously scanty enforcement of some recent ideals if only they could be as safe from burglars and murderers as people are in loose-living, gambling, drinking England.

It is firmly responded to them that such is not the temperament of our dear country. From the beginning we have been not so much interested in our own security for ourselves as in our own morality for others. England is as it is because we came out of it and left it to its life of security and sin. We are as we are because we preferred jeopardy and reform.

We also prefer recent reforms to old reforms. We enforced complete free speech for a while. We enforced Negro suffrage for a while. Now we are going to enforce prohibition; and we incidentally assert that if only we can get people to live up to our latest white Protestant dizzy ideal, they somehow will learn to respect the laws which are the primary dictates of the human conscience.

As a lily-white Protestant, I ask my fellow lily-white Protestants to note that in fact we are now giving this country a perfectly spectacular instance of our preoccupation with the latest top-branch fruit of our own peculiar meeting-house morality while the broad basic human positive rights of whole great racial and religious groups of our fellow-citizens are neglected by us and indeed simultaneously violated by large numbers of us without any effective national rebuke.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is never so glad he is not an editor as when he reads something by one of those poor bloodless creatures on a genuinely important topic. So long as editors discuss European politics or the condition of the Federal Reserve banks, it doesn't matter what they say, because nobody cares about such things or reads tiresome articles on those subjects anyhow. But when one attempts to write on an all-important subject like food he ought to know more about it than an editor can possibly know about anything. In last week's Nation the Drifter was pained to find an editor who had probably never had half a dozen square meals in his life trying to define—and draw up a menu for—an "American dinner." The Drifter would bet a Virginia-cured ham against a pound of Philadelphia scrapple that this anemic editor learned all he knows about American cooking in the railway-station restaurant of Bridgeport, Connecticut, or looking for handouts at the back doors of quick-lunch rooms along the waterfront of New York City.

* * * * *

SO long as he confines himself merely to pulling to pieces the alleged "American dinner" served to Mr. Lloyd George at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, this editor chap is not so inadequate. Editors are always good at finding fault with other people. But just set one of them to doing something on his own account, and where is he? In the first place, with an editor's customary absent-mindedness, he forgot the soup course in both his New England and his Southern dinner. Not that this is so serious. Soup is not a great institution in American families. It makes a lot of extra dish-washing and the men folk refuse to count it as part of the meal. As a New Hampshire farmer-friend of the Drifter would say, soup "ain't got no chaw to it." It may properly be—and commonly is—omitted. But the Drifter finds it less easy to excuse the editor for failing to provide any green vegetables merely because he does not think highly of the claims of Waldorf salad. How about cucumbers? They are indubitably American, even if they do promote indigestion (and maybe that's American too). And then there's lettuce. Not that lettuce is exclusively American, but we have some ways of eating it that possibly are. When the Drifter was a boy lettuce was uniformly eaten with vinegar and sugar, and that method still prevails in thousands of rural homes throughout the country. In the Drifter's own home there was a better way of eating lettuce—with sugar and thick cream. Yum, yum! The Drifter could eat two or three plates of that now at one sitting. It beats oil and vinegar, mayonnaise, Russian, or any of these fancy modern dressings all hollow. Only it seems impossible to get it. Sugar still exists—too much of it in most cooking—but cows no longer give that thick cream of the Drifter's boyhood. You could almost cut it with a knife, like butter, and could scarcely pour it out of a pitcher without wishing for a pair of tongs.

* * * * *

THEN, too, pumpkin pie may be all right, but it is neither so good nor so typical of New England as squash, while in the South—at least in Maryland—sweet-potato pie is a delicacy which no visiting Englishman should be allowed to miss. Also the Drifter is sure that no true American housewife, North or South, would have failed to provide at least two or three kinds of home-made jellies, jams, and preserves.

* * * * *

BUT the greatest failure of this under-nourished and ill-informed editor remains to be exposed. He has provided no hot bread, North or South, and has omitted the most typical and important cereal of America, corn. Would a New England dinner be right without baking-powder biscuit or some kind of hot rolls or muffins? And would anybody but a provincial New York editor conceive of a typical Southern dinner without cornbread? Beaten biscuit—bosh! As well offer a man a mouthful of dry dust!

* * * * *

ALSO why limit Mr. Lloyd George to two dinners—one in New England, the other in Dixie? American cooking deserves a wider survey. There is the unique school of the Pennsylvania Dutch; there are the groaning tables of the Middle West; there is the cookery of Louisiana, with a French flavor, and that of the Southwest, with a tang from Spain.

* * * * *

THE Drifter's own selection for a typical "American dinner"? Ah, he is no such simpleton as that; if he were he would turn editor. Nobody who has eaten such a meal could write about it until at least six hours afterward and then he wouldn't want to profane its memory by translating it into words. Also the Drifter surmises that the great American dinner, like the great American novel, was cooked and forgotten fifty years ago—or remains for a wiser and worthier future to contrive. THE DRIFTER

Euterpe in Arkansas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read with joy Mr. Edson's beguiling description of the happy state of Arkansas. I few issues later I was a bit taken aback to see in your correspondence column several letters from indignant natives of that State asserting that Arkansas had to the square mile as many leagues of paved road and readers of the Ladies' Home Journal as any other State. Nevertheless, being still desirous to go into that country, I sent a letter to a dealer in real estate who lives in a small town in the foothills of the famous Osarks, asking him for advice regarding farms in his territory. The answer I got was inclosed in an envelope upon which was printed in the upper left-hand corner this verse:

"There is a land the Lord has blessed
More richly far than all the rest.
In it you cannot find a flaw;
It is the State of Arkansas."

Not long after I received a "follow up" which greeted me from the envelope in this wise:

Colorado, irrigation.
Kansas, stagnation.
Say, why don't you come to Arkansas
Where they need no irrigation.
Any man can engage in speculation,
Bring on his wife's relation,
Have a good time and free salvation
Without any danger of starvation?"

After receipt of these letters I feel an inner urge to pack my goods. In a land where even the dry and callous "realtors" dally with Euterpe surely life must beckon.

Jim Crow Here and There

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I notice that one of the railroad men who wrote to The Nation regarding my article, Jim Crow in Texas, merely hinted at "exaggeration." I did not tell the worst things to be told in that article, for I only told what had happened to me. Worse things have happened to others. A Negro bishop and his wife were made to get up in their night clothes and get out of a Pullman berth in Kentucky, simply because whites aboard objected to their presence on the car. A white woman was awarded "damages" against a railroad in Mississippi because she had to ride on a Pullman car in which some Negro bishops had a section. Two colored workers of the International Y. W. C. A. were compelled to get out of the drawing-room of a Pullman car a few months ago in Texas because whites who were riding in the open part of the car, and who could not even see the colored women in the drawing-room, and who only accidentally learned that colored people occupied this very separate accommodation, objected.

Gum and the Army

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of September 26 I learn that the Army and Navy Journal in November, 1922, reported Secretary Weeks as saying that the nation (with small n) spends more on chewing gum than it does on national defense.

This struck me as likely to be interesting equally to those who deplore it and to those who welcome it. So I set about verifying it. After looking in several wrong places in the index to the World Almanac, I succeeded in extracting from that compendium the information that the value of America's chewing-gum product for 1919 was $51,240,156, and that the "actual" budgets for 1922 included "Navy Dept.—Pay of the Navy $170,660,523.38; increase of the Navy $143,028,025.57; Marine Corps $35,448,401.92; all other $109,657,861.75" and "War Dept.—Pay of the Army $50,692,348.10, Panama Canal, operation and maintenance, $2,791,035.40, Rivers and Harbors $43,262,427.26; all other $305,312,638.86." Of course "All other" for the War Department must include all expenditures for arms (including artillery), munitions, horses, and the upkeep of forts and West Point. If Secretary Weeks recognizes these and the navy as part of the national defense, we must infer either that the expense of chewing gum has increased immensely since 1919, or that the Secretary spoke carelessly, or that the Army and Navy Journal proved itself an inaccurate reporter on such an occasion, and made its own champion ridiculous by exaggerating his words.

"It Shall Not Be Again"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit an unclassified and unlabeled liberal-radical—I prefer the name humanitarian—to express his deepest appreciation of your editorial, The Twilight of Civilization, in the current issue of The Nation.

No, your picture is not overdrawn. It could not be. No pen nor brush is powerful enough adequately to describe or depict the horror, the anguish, the misery, the hunger pangs, the disease, the insanity (in the literal sense of the term) which are the direct results of the war and still more so of the infamous peace. And our participation in both is perhaps one of the principal causes of the misery and the reaction that we see around us.

In the terrible darkness that surrounds us there are a few beacons of light. And one of the steadiest, never-wavering beacons is The Nation.

In sincere appreciation of the work you are doing in combating ignorance, brutality, and reaction everywhere, I inclose check for one hundred dollars to help along the circulation of The Nation. May it forever remain a beacon light of peace, tolerance, fair play, and humanitarianism.

Is This the Fact?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of October 3, H. C. Dekker in speaking against birth control states that in the writer's opinion "the world would decline considerably in population if propagation were left to a pure parental instinct," and further on "we might confidently look for a tremendous decline in birth-rate were this kind of knowledge universally available and the means at hand to use it."

Exactly, but why call this an argument against birth control?

Mohegan Lake, N. Y., September 28 B. A. K.

Or This?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Dekker, in his letter in this week's Nation seems skeptical concerning the benefits of birth control, and is alarmed lest our population diminish to the vanishing point if we practice voluntary parenthood.

In Holland, where birth control has been practiced for a number of years, the population has increased and the infant mortality rate has decreased. Couples have children when they want them and when they can afford them.

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

I think you draw out roses on the stem
Just by your love, because you look for them.

So a drab woman, when you look at her
Puts on new leaves where never any were.

No matter how much winter she has seen
Or how much sorrow, you will make her green.

If she should stand a skeleton-tree for years
You would not give her up, for all your fears,

But look at her as if she rustled soft
Multitudes of leaves held lightly up aloft,

Until her branches were an airy flush,
Color of second life, green burning bush.

And if the woman flings her hair, and shakes
Her thin leaves from her—bows her head and takes

The steep path down her roots, to lie as seed
Under the ragged triumph of a weed,

And though her shell grows crooked, cold and brown,
You let her go, and do not cut her down;

You let her go, content that she will come
Up from the earth in hymeneal bloom;

You do not cut her down—though all her sisters wear
Glittering leaves, and she is gaunt and spare.

I, Pyramus, ——

Some Makers of American Literature. By William Lyon Phelps. Marshall Jones Company. $2.50.

I ADORE Billy Phelps. If that is the wrong way to begin a review of a book of criticism by the Lampson Professor of English Literature at Yale University, I must plead that for purposes of review this book has stumped me; but it has sealed my affection for the man. I can now readily see why it is that Professor Phelps is beloved by those youngsters who sit, or have sat, at his feet and who concede his deficiencies as a critic and yet champion his importance as an enthusiast for letters. He has, they will tell you, nothing of the pontiff or academician in him; he has not soured on his job; he hasn't the usual professorial vice of making the livest author seem like an embalmed cadaver; and he is so cheery, kind-hearted, and good-natured in expounding his unblunted tastes in books that he can make even Archibald Marshall appear as a writer full of gusto.

I know of no one who writes like Billy Phelps, unless it is Diogenes Laërtius. His mind hops around like a grasshopper; you never know where it is going to land next. There is no continuity or coherence (in the grammatical sense) in what he has to say. His essays are a patchwork of incredible irrelevancies. In the midst of a discussion of Emerson's idea of the Over-Soul he will suddenly be reminded that Emerson's favorite among his own poems was The Daughter of Time and will tell you, "I would not exchange The Humblebee for a hundred Daughters of Time." Something seems to start him on a line of thought, but before he has developed it he thinks of something else. To follow him in his mental processes becomes a strange and fascinating sort of game. It takes a dull and humorless person not to enjoy him. And in his essays I seem to see a new art of expression, arising as clear and distinct as James Joyce in "Ulysses." Between the uncorrelated cerebral impressions and remembrances of Leopold Bloom as he walks down a Dublin street and an essay by Billy Phelps on Emerson or Webster there is a remarkable similarity:

"He [Webster] learned self-reliance by supporting himself through Dartmouth teaching, writing, and editing a newspaper. He was graduated in 1801, and in 1901 a week-long centenary celebration took place, which the Dartmouth authorities have incorporated in a handsome volume—invaluable to anyone interested in her greatest son."

This management of irrelevant anti-climax, this revolutionary syntax is nothing short of a triumph of genius. It is impossible not to conceive a vast affection for a man who writes such non sequitur paragraphs as these:

"We are fortunate enough to possess the numerous volumes of his [Emerson's] Journal, published not long ago, which illumine his inner life, and are full of good anecdotes. As Dr. Johnson wrote disparagingly of New Jersey, so Emerson gave a delightful opinion of Connecticut. In 1862 he met Mrs. John C. Fremont at Washington."

"In Anthony Trollope's little-known but highly interesting novel, 'The American Senator,' he makes a slip which would betray the fact that even if we did not know the author's name we should know that he was not an American. He invariably says Senator for Minnesota, instead of Senator from Minnesota. The little preposition displays the vast difference between the method of representation in the British House of Commons and our National Legislature. One reason why the average is higher than here, is because they have Open Constituencies, which makes it possible to secure the best men, and insures the country against the loss of their services in the event of a local defeat. The moment any statesman in England is defeated in an election, a number of constituencies come forward, and request that he do them the honor of being their representative in the House. With us, the Senator must reside in his State, and the representative in his district. The advantages of our system are, in my judgment, overweighted by its drawbacks. I think it would be fine if any State or district might choose the best man, regardless of his residence; then we could have at Washington a company of the ablest men in the country, met in the best interests of the nation."

It is all like that. There are, in this book, essays on Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin, Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Mark Twain. They are discursive essays in which the art of digression is carried to its apotheosis. Something is always reminding Billy of the story of Pat and Mike, and the story of Pat and Mike reminds him that, though he is supposed to be talking about Emerson, personally he feels sure that Robert Burton got a lot of fun out of writing "The Anatomy of Melancholy." Having recorded that impression, he indulges in an adage: "It is forever characteristic of humanity that the more serious and ambitious a person is, the more he is given to self-reproach. Consider Milton's Sonnet on his twenty-third birthday."

Even when Billy reasons, he reasons in a fashion unlike anyone else: "As everyone knows, Emerson was a Unitarian minister, and he might have continued in that profession if it had not been for three things: he disliked all confessions of faith, he disliked preaching in the pulpit, and he particularly disliked pastoral work." This is very much as if one should say: He was a trapeze performer and he might have continued in his profession if it had not been for three things: he lost both legs in an accident, he went blind and suffered from palsy, and he became a convert of a religious cult which prohibited its adherents from having anything to do with circuses. The reasons in both cases are remarkably complete.

Among his many other attractions as a writer, Billy Phelps has an aptitude for critical epigrams which are sure, succinct, and illuminating. Of James Fenimore Cooper he says, "he brought to the gates of immortality an enormous amount of excess baggage," which I take to be the best thing ever said about Cooper. No better differentiation of the personalities and points of view between Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin has been expressed than this: "Edwards would lie awake all night, thinking of some sin he had imagined himself guilty of committing; Franklin, after committing some gross sin, would write in his journal, 'Another erratum,' and calmly proceed with the day's work."

The essay on Emerson is really a masterpiece of hedging, wherein a sound critical sense creeps through a maze of benevolences. "In Emerson it is difficult to see the connection between any sentence and those that preceded or followed it. . . . Someone has wittily said that in Emerson's 'Essays' 'the whole is often less that the sum of its parts.' . . . It seems almost as if some of his essays would read as well backwards as forwards; or one might begin in the middle and read either way. . . . It is natural, therefore, that there should be some lack of connection; but, as a friend suggests, although the sentences were not always connected with one another, they were all connected with God."

And that's the way I feel about Billy Phelps. Although his sentences are not always connected with one another, they are connected with God. He is not urbane, but there is no malice in him; he is not a great critic, but he is a good sort of a person to instil in youths a love for literature; he is one of those for whom the profession of criticism has only one attraction—the pleasure of praising. I adore Billy Phelps.

Heretical Orthodoxy and the Cycle

Money. By William Trufant Foster and Waddill Catchings. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

AFTER a quarter century's reading of books on money, this reviewer has at last come across one that helps him understand something about that puzzling subject. If the combination of trained economist and trained business man can give us a work like this, let us have more such combinations. By issuing this single book, if it had done and were to do nothing more, the Pollak Foundation would have justified its existence. But the publication of Mr. Fisher's monumental work on index numbers, and the announcement of other studies already well under way, give additional promise of the help that impartial scientific research is yet to render in the endless task of making more solid the material foundations of life.

The book under review is a remarkable study of money in its relation to prices in a world of private ownership of industry conducted for profit under the freest possible conditions of competition and individual initiative—that is, with all due qualifications, the United States of 1923. Economics in the existing world becomes "the science that deals with human interests from the standpoint of price." Disregarding a good part of the old meaningless textbook distinctions, the authors use the term money to cover, not only all forms of currency, but also bank credit, that is, deposits subject to check. This adoption of everyday business terminology makes it possible to understand something of the relation between money and price. Inflation is a matter of simple mathematical definition: "any increase in the volume of money that is accompanied by a rise in the general price level." Deflation is the reverse. Our entire economic life, from the business point of view, is simply a process of buying and selling for money. As the sole purpose of money, socially considered, however, is to keep goods flowing smoothly and continuously from producer to consumer in as large a stream as possible, the community has one overwhelmingly important interest in the money system. That system should be such as to maintain a stable price level. "Where the price level happens to be is of minor importance; the major need is that it should stay where it is." Viewed in this light, no small part of the boasted "flexibility" of our banking system becomes sheer perversity. The sturdy realism of the treatment of business activity in money terms, as opposed to an economics which regards money as insignificant and modern trade as only refined barter, is refreshing to others besides the tired business man. At last we are beginning to find out what the earlier economists never discovered, namely, that money can obstruct as well as facilitate production and exchange. With rare success, Messrs. Foster and Catchings show how it does so, and they accordingly offer a fruitful suggestion for the control of the business cycle.

It is impossible, within the available space limits, to present even the outlines of the argument, but its drift may be suggested. The primary essential to business stability is that dollar-demand for consumers' goods shall match the value of such goods offered for sale at current prices within a period of a year (nature's cycle). But in our money economy this annual production-consumption equation is upset because of the time factor introduced by money. Money (including, be it remembered, bank deposits) is suspended purchasing power. Though the banking system be maintained absolutely on a gold basis, even so the two basic assumptions of orthodox theory do not hold true: goods produced do not necessarily correspond to new credit created, and new credit and new goods necessarily do not affect the market at the same time. Hence at one time, as in the period just after the war, new credit, rapidly passing on, through wage and other payments, into the hands of consumers, puts dollar-demand far in excess of the value of the current output of consumers' goods at current prices. A business boom inevitably follows. At another time, as in 1921, the situation is reversed, and we find ourselves in the trough of depression. The root difficulty is our lack of knowledge and intelligence sufficient to keep the money supply in right relation to the current output of goods; it is not any inherent defect in our system of private property, competition, individual initiative, and profit-making, which the authors stoutly defend.

Their suggestion for a remedy is bold, interesting, heterodox, and, in the reviewer's judgment, theoretically sound. The gold standard is a necessary concession to human weakness; for "with humanity as it is no nation has ever kept its paper money within bounds without arbitrary restraint." "The gold basis, in spite of the fortuitous output of mines and the equally fortuitous acts of legislatures, has come nearer than any other basis to maintaining the stability of the money unit. . . . Confusion is better than choas." Yet though the gold basis as a stabilizer of prices is better than nothing, in fact it is a miserable failure. Retaining the gold basis as a precautionary measure only, we should therefore utilize our present enormous gold reserve to make a courageous experiment in stabilizing our price level, as one of the greatest services we can do to ourselves and the world. All the gold might be used as a reserve against currency, which, aside from subsidiary coin, might well be of but one single sort—United States notes. When the price level, as indicated by perfected index numbers, began to rise, the amount of such notes in circulation might be decreased by the sale of government securities in the open market. As the price level fell, the government might buy such securities, thus increasing the supply of currency and tending to keep up prices. If then the rediscount policy of the Federal Reserve banks also were directed solely to the maintenance of a stable price level, inflation and deflation due to expansion and contraction of bank deposits could be curbed. Thus two powerful forces for stability would cooperate, one affecting the volume of currency, the other of bank deposits. The plan is as sound as it is bold, though its full operation, as the authors point out, requires more knowledge than we yet possess. Imagine, however, the grief of the "sound money" advocates of our boyhood if the United States should be converted by the cogent arguments of these orthodox heretics to some such scheme as this for an intelligent political-mathematical control of the money supply and the price level, instead of leaving the whole matter in the hands of God—or the devil.

To criticize a book of this importance within the limits of a review is even less easily possible than to state its argument adequately. In the judgment of the reviewer, the fundamental position of the authors is well taken. Economists and monetary theorists will have to take account of their proposal, to say nothing of its value for business men and legislators, provided they can be induced to do the hard reading the book demands. Notwithstanding the authors' explicit and repeated recognition of the importance of monopoly in current business life, however, they no less specifically decline to build it into their scheme. The beauty of their theoretical structure is perhaps enhanced thereby, but it may be doubted whether its foundations are rendered the more secure, and it is not impossible that some of their practical deductions are laid open to attack. Nevertheless the book deals with a fundamental problem of social well-being in a manner uncommonly stimulating and suggestive. It is highly realistic, well thought out, and clearly presented. The best service of a reviewer in such cases is perhaps simply to urge everyone to read, mark, and inwardly digest. HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

New Unionism for Old

Labor's Money. By Richard Boeckel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

THE traditional methods of trade unionism—collective bargaining, the strike, the boycott, and other forms of economic coercion—have failed in any satisfying measure to give the worker what he wants: "increased purchasing power, decent working conditions, more leisure, security against unemployment." The traditional aim of trade unionism—an organization strong enough to wring advances in money wages from the employers—no longer satisfies the worker. Therefore new methods and new aims are rapidly taking the place of the old. Labor is now seeking the control of industry. Through such control it intends to secure that higher standard of life toward which it has so long been struggling. Aims so radical call for new and radical methods. Chief among the new methods of this new unionism is the entrance of labor into the field of banking and investment. But labor banks are only the surface waves of the movement; forces of incalculable might, in whose keeping the whole future of society rests, are surging in the deeps. In all his discussion of the details of this phenomenal development, Mr. Boeckel never loses sight of the close relation of the labor banking movement to the new unionism.

The modern trade union, with its system of dues, its huge strike benefit funds and insurance departments, is the custodian of enormous sums of money. Such funds have been deposited in banks where as ordinary savings deposits they have received a low rate of return. These very funds have often been loaned by the banks to anti-union employers. Faced with this situation, it was natural for the more far-sighted labor leaders to organize banks of their own, where union funds would receive a fair return, and where the power behind those funds would be expended, not in union-breaking campaigns, but in productive enterprises. This idea has spread to the ends of the country, and has touched every phase of the labor movement.

Mr. Boeckel has given an admirable account of the causes leading up to the advent of labor in finance and has resisted the temptation to paint too highly the possibilities of the newer methods. Throughout, he emphasizes the problems of technique involved in transferring the control of industry. But labor's most serious problem is not one of technique; it is something far more subtle. Labor is trustee of the "Humane Ideal": it is dedicated to the task of making industrial life less savage, more considerate of human desires and needs—needs not capable of expression in the vocabulary of the economist. If labor loses sight of this ideal in its search for a technique, its ultimate assumption of control will be a fruitless victory. In a failure to point out this insidious pitfall in labor's path lies the major (and almost the sole) weakness of the author's book.

In discussing the labor banks, it is customary to refer to them as "cooperative" enterprises: Mr. Boeckel says the "workers' banks . . . are operated along cooperative lines"; the largest bank of all is called "The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers Cooperative National Bank." This is a misuse of the word, unless indeed all its meaning, acquired through long usage by the English and continental movements is extracted, leaving only a loose, flabby term. This is not the place to go into detail. It must be sufficient to point out that in a true cooperative bank a union holding 51 per cent of the stock would have but one vote, no more than the holder of a single share; that not only stockholders but depositors and borrowers would have a voice in management; that the loan service would be extended chiefly to depositors and stockholders, which is not at all the case in the banks under discussion. Present-day labor banks are simply corporations which have imposed upon themselves certain extraordinary restrictions, such as the limitation of dividends to stockholders, and the division of earnings with depositors and borrowers. But they are still traditional corporations—corporations with a soul perhaps—but corporations nevertheless.

Mr. Boeckel's book comes at a strategic time. If widely read it will doubtless be very instrumental in spreading an intelligent understanding of the new unionism, not only among unionists themselves, but also among that increasingly large group of the amorphous "general public" who see in the labor movement the hope of a sorely vexed society.

After "La Garçonne," "Le Compagnon"

Le Compagnon. By Victor Margueritte. Paris: Ernest Flammarion. 7 francs.

THE echoes of the tumult and the shouting which greeted the appearance of "La Garçonne" last year having hardly subsided, Victor Margueritte has followed it with "Le Compagnon," a book no less likely to provoke vigorous disagreement. In publishing "Le Compagnon" Victor Margueritte makes a gesture of defiance and of affirmation, the affirmation of the right of the artist to write as he thinks and of whatever he sees, and he does more than this. He carries his exposition of feminism as he sees it a step further; to the point, as he indicates in the preface, where man himself suffers from the laws he has made. In this respect also "Le Compagnon" is the logical sequel of "La Garçonne." Monique Lerbier, the heroine of "La Garçonne," revolting out of blind suffering and disillusionment from the ugly world she lived in, and driven by that suffering into excesses in which she found no happiness, is a victim of circumstances. Annik Raimbert, the "Compagnon" of the later novel, is the product of a sane education. She is not a drifter like Monique but a conscious rebel, and going much further in her rebellion does so knowing and choosing her path. While the later volume deals no less frankly and crudely, though at somewhat lesser length, with the unsavory customs of certain Parisian circles, its chief interest lies in the story of Annik, the emancipated woman of the future as Victor Margueritte conceives her and with the marriage of the future as it will be when women like Annik have a part in shaping it.

Annik is not a "garçonne" in the same sense as Monique. A woman lawyer, a radical, living and working independently in Paris, she enters into a free union with the man she loves, Amedée Jacquemin, a Socialist deputy and theoretically a convert to equal rights and complete freedom for women. She and Jacquemin are happy in their union until her pregnancy, when convention reasserts itself in her lover and he insists on marriage and the legitimation of the child. Annik refuses. She feels that marriage and legitimation can add nothing to their happiness or to the welfare of the child, but she knows that it would rob her of her freedom. It is not for nothing that she is a lawyer and knows the rights which French law gives to husbands and fathers, or has seen the slavery to which an unhappy marriage has reduced her weaker convent-bred sister Paule. Failing to convince her lover, she succeeds, at the risk as she fully realizes of their happiness together, in frustrating his intention of declaring his parenthood simultaneously with hers, which formality under the Code gives the father control even of an illegitimate child. It is this incident which is the climax of their struggle and of the book. With great skill and sympathy Margueritte has shown this struggle and the suffering of two people loving each other sincerely and finely, but hopelessly divided as it seems by the allegiance of the one to the conviction of tomorrow and of the other to the convention of yesterday. In the end, however, Annik's steadfastness triumphs over the conventionality of her lover and Amedée comes slowly to accept and even to rejoice in the situation which gives her complete control of their child. Annik's right to herself and her children being established their union continues and their happiness grows and deepens. Annik to Victor Margueritte represents the wife of the future, the "compagnon" of man and mistress of her own destiny, whether her mating be accompanied by a legal formula or whether, as he apparently hopes, she chooses to dispense with it. That her vision transcends that of most of her sisters today, however, he is well aware, as he has shown in the tragic figure of her sister Paule, and other feminine characters in the book who bow more or less submissively to the yoke of present-day marriage.

Such a book will, of course, be denounced as immoral in certain quarters. It is inevitable that a book so candid, so generous, so scathing in its attack on recognized institutions, so fearless and unashamed before natural phenomena (though curiously somewhat savage and uncomprehending in its condemnation of any unusual form of sexual satisfaction), so severely moral in fact should fall foul of censorship in any land. Its candor will probably stand in the way of its being translated into English or freely circulated in this country, which will be particularly unfortunate if its effect is to add to the legend of Victor Margueritte as the author of pornographic books, rather than of social documents. Under our Sumnerism no other reason need be advanced to bar it. In Europe, however, there are apparently further reasons, whether avowed or not, why such a book is denounced and why a campaign of mudslinging is inaugurated against its author, culminating in the action of the Legion of Honor, which in spite of the plea of Anatole France not to make itself eternally ridiculous in this way, last January solemnly struck Victor Margueritte's name from the list of its members. The echoes of the controversy which reached our shores dealt mainly with Margueritte's supposed pornography, the charge being based on his convincing, brutal, and it was said wholly unnecessary picture of debauchery. But Margueritte's offense is not and was not that he describes debauchery but that he does not stop there. If he had, his books would probably have been no more interesting or important than any of the crop of post-war flapper exposés that have wearied us for the last three years. But Margueritte is profoundly concerned with what is back of that debauchery. It was his crime to be in passionate revolt against a greed-ridden, hypocritical, militaristic society, which made such debauchery possible at a time when it was still largely dominated by greedy, hypocritical, militaristic politicians. His feminism is only one aspect of that revolt. He is as much in revolt against the exploitation of workers in war and industry and against the tyranny and hypocrisy of church and state as he is against the subjection of women. Out of that revolt he dared even to attack the "war against war" and the makers and the profiteers of that war, and to put upon them squarely the responsibility for the conditions he described. Hence, no doubt, the scurrying to cover and the denunciation of Margueritte as pornographic, mercenary, and a defamer of French virtue and womanhood. Of the animus back of all this he is, of course, fully aware. He has painted the picture of a society, "such," in the words of Anatole France, "as never existed before in France," and of which, he says, that Margueritte's account is, if anything, an understatement. Out of his fierce disgust with this society Margueritte has imagined a utopian world in which men and women love and work equally and freely, in which all childhood is protected and all motherhood reverenced, and in which girls and boys receive from their mothers an education that will end war. He has made Annik the radiant spokeswoman of that world. One wonders if her voice, too, will be drowned for the many by those of the critics who will be able to see in this beautiful, wistful, uneven book only filth, pornography, and the defamation of French womanhood.

Spurious Anthropology

The Jews in America. By Burton J. Hendrick. Doubleday, Page & Company. $1.50.

IT is reasonable to expect that the writer who makes a startling, sweeping change in the arrangement of those items of information which the world accepts as its history should present some newly discovered facts, some authoritative documents, to support his own interpretation. The ethnologist or archaeologist who makes the claim that there are two distinct strains in the Englishman of today, an English and an Armenian strain, would back up his assertion with tables and measurements and probably a new cranial index.

But Mr. Hendrick, depending on the prevalent will to believe anything derogatory to the Jews presents his theory that the difference between the Polish and the Spanish or German Jew is almost as great "as that between an Armenian and an Englishman" without any more substantial evidence than a map he has drawn for the purpose—like the fisherman who proves the size of "the one that got away" by the missing bait from his hook. Dr. Maurice Fishberg, the only authority cited by Mr. Hendrick in the course of his historical narrative, has recently characterized the author as "the inquiring reporter . . . innocent of biology and anthropology."

Mr. Hendrick's theory is commendable for its simplicity. Once upon a time, he writes, there was a wild Tartar tribe called the Khazars which invaded and occupied southern Russia, then and there adopted Judaism, and eventually was driven out of the territory. What more natural than that it should have gone to what is now Poland since that was just across the western border? By this reasoning the Polish Jew is made kin to "the unspeakable Turk" to be equally shunned, despised, exterminated, or dealt with in whatever manner pious souls are now advocating as medicine for the sick man of Europe.

This theory, however, runs counter to a number of facts of which Mr. Hendrick was apparently in ignorance when he wrote.

1. Only the king of the Khazars and the governing classes professed the Jewish religion. Among the lower classes the three monotheistic religions were all represented, and in addition a considerable number of pagans still survived.

2. The Russian tribes invaded and destroyed the Khazar settlements in the Caspian region 966-969 A.D. The Khazars withdrew to the Crimean peninsula, which for a long time was known as Khazaria, but fell before the onslaughts of the Russians and the Byzantines in 1016. Tradition holds that the royal house fled to their coreligionists in Spain. The rest of the nation was scattered and lost while the few who professed Judaism were merged with the native Jews of Crimea.

3. The Jewish settlements in Poland were made by the hordes fleeing from Germany during the Crusades and enlarged by the refugees from Spain during the Inquisition.

4. The German Jews of today whom Mr. Hendrick holds to be of a different breed from their Polish coreligionists are, in the main, descendants of Polish Jews who returned to Germany about a century ago.

My data are gathered from the only three available sources, and, unless Mr. Hendrick sought a revelation from his inner consciousness to uphold the theory that the Polish Jew is a descendant of the Mongolian Khazar tribe, he must have turned perforce to the same sources of historical information. They are the early Arabian and Hebrew chronicles, "The History of the Jews in Russia and Poland" by S. M. Dubnow, and the later texts of those who have utilized the research material presented in Dubnow's definitive work. Each of these proves Mr. Hendrick wrong.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Hendrick refused to be enlightened. For when the chapters of this book appeared as articles in the World's Work, they called forth a mass of challenging and protesting letters, among which was an offer of Bernard G. Richards, secretary of the American Jewish Congress, to procure for the magazine a refutation of Mr. Hendrick's assertions by any reputable historian the editors might choose to name. So that when the book appeared, five months later, the author was aware that many considered his map worthless and misleading, his distinctions spurious and vicious, his conclusions false and libelous.

The author's failings are not confined to a miscitation of records. He betrays in his general discussion that psychopathic trait of a bigot, the desire to beat his victim with both ends of the stick at the same time. Thus he criticizes the Polish Jew for lack of patriotism and for his tenacious love of his people, customs, and religion; for monopolizing all business and for playing an insignificant part "in the great tide of American business and finance"; for being poor and clannish and for trying to be rich and break into society; for working eighteen and twenty hours a day in sweatshops and—most damning sin of all—for radicalism in demanding shorter hours and decent working conditions. He cites some of the least creditable names as examples of the Polish Jews and for many of the noted members of the race that he mentions he presents a fictitious Spanish or German ancestry. It is surprising that so keen a journalist as Mr. Hendrick did not recognize that by piling up his contradictions in so gross a manner he has made the indictment self-defeating.

The author's purpose seems eminently laudable: he has sought a goat for the accused members of his race and found one in the Polish Jew.

Books in Brief

The Little Tigress. By Wallace Smith. With drawings from a field sketchbook. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Smith is a brave man, and a better artist than writer. His uncompromising and unvarnished condemnation of the ignorance and stupidity that make up the average American's conception of Mexico proves him brave; his strength as artist is shown in the drawings which, though too painstaking and refined in technique to be completely in accord with the rough spirit of his material, capture and communicate the individual mood of his subjects. They succeed in making the unusual natural. But his stories and written sketches fail at just this point. They make the unusual also unnatural by the author's overemphasis of the elements of suspense and humor, by his straining after effects, in short, by his attempt to make these "tales out of the dust of Mexico" like the romantic sentimentalities of Richard Harding Davis. When, as in Nocturne and Greaser and Gringo, Mr. Smith writes most naturally, we have convincing narrative, clear, honest, and interesting.

A Mid-Victorian Pepys. Annotated and edited by S. M. Ellis. George H. Doran Company. $7.50.

A collection of rather dull gossip, extracted from letters sent by Sir William Hardman, an English lawyer of convivial tastes, to an Australian friend between the years 1859 to 1863. It by no means fulfils the expectations aroused by the title, but it may incidentally be of service to historians of our Civil War by furnishing them with specimens of the virulent hatred then felt toward the North by some English Tories. A curious feature of the book is the extraordinary conception of an editor's functions held by the compiler, who interpolates unnecessary explanatory passages of great length; e. g., a mention of the death of the Prince Consort provokes a whole page of editorial comment on his character.

The American Jewish Year-Book. Volume 25. Edited by Harry Schneiderman for the American Jewish Committee. Jewish Publication Society.

The new edition of this invaluable year-book adds to its usual compilations, statistics, and summary of Jewish history in the past year a fascinating series of colonial Jewish portraits, including several Gilbert Stuarts and Sullys, and an exquisite Malbone miniature of that Rebecca Gratz whose beauty is said to have stirred Sir Walter Scott to name the fairer heroine of "Ivanhoe" after her.

Muted Strings

THE light of the mind is flickering. Let us save it before it goes out. Galsworthy despairs of it; Molnar and Pirandello disregard it. "Follow your instincts," counsels the admirable Mr. Bly in "Windows" (Garrick Theater). And that is, as a matter of fact, very good advice if it means follow your instincts rather than your prejudices or your superstitions. But cannot the instincts be, well, not restrained, but tempered and guided a little by the reason? Pirandello and Molnar are, apparently, beyond any such question. They give us studies in pure pain—the pangs of despised love, the woe of a woman who loses an old self for another and can endure neither continuance nor return. I am not asking for the trumpets of action, the falseness of decisions and solutions. In Schnitzler, too, for instance in "The Great Domain," in "The Lonely Way," we have the minor-keyed chronicles of subtle and wavering souls. But these souls know, at least, that they are living and experiencing. The self, in them, still surveys experience; the mind, however powerless, is vigilant.

It is that, at least, always in Galsworthy. There is always an intellectual fineness about his work. If he is never fine as flame, he is never less fine than lace. The threads are delicate. But they are strong and visible. You watch that precise and thoughtful weaving with admiration, with respect, though sometimes with a touch of impatience. The impatience, in the case of "Windows," arises from the fact that one suspects in the conclusion both a touch of condescension and of rigidity. Why cannot such a girl as Faith Bly be saved? Largely because she is supposed, by this moral and social order, to need "salvation." She, like the Frenchman in "The Pigeon," belongs to the "wild ones of earth"—seekers of mere beauty, mere delight. But society denies these and, by denying, degrades them. It is the social stigma which eats into these fluttering hearts. Mr. Galsworthy feels that; he does not see it. Hence he dismisses Faith with a gesture of elegant despair. It is the elegance of his despair that is a little troubling. If Faith could not indeed be saved, if her end was, unescapably, painted cheeks and draggled skirts and upon her the dead eyes of fat men in club windows, then we had a right to demand not a louder but a firmer judgment of a world and an order in which such things can be.

Molnar in "Launzi" (Plymouth Theater) takes faint memories of Juliet, Ophelia, Hannele, and melts them into a futile pathos. Launzi loves Imre who loves her subtle, morbid, beautiful mother. And that mother plays with Imre because her soul cannot in reality love the ruthless industrialist. Here, in the first act, strong and credible motives are set in action. Imre is of the pure, poetic, pacifist youth of Central Europe. In his passion for Claire blend many passions—among them a passion of revolt against a world of steel, business, blood. But with the end of the first act all these motives are abandoned. What follows is a study in regressive insanity, probably dementia praecox. Launzi's soul is too wounded to endure reality and withdraws from it. She thinks she is dead; she thinks she is an angel. There follow scenic pictures which approach more and more the level of Christmas cards that show cherubs with very pink cheeks and warm yet forlorn looking little houses in drifts of gritty and slightly gleaming snow put on with paste and warranted to move the simple heart. The Christmas legends are duly printed across the top—all of them. The world becomes pure lithograph. Village children sing carols. I almost suspect that Claire became reconciled to her first husband, Launzi's father, a "music master," and settled down in his mother's cottage. And, in the first act, she was—Hedda, Hedda with more passion and more goodness.

In Pirandello you never get such playing to the gallery that exists in the heart of the pit. "Floriani's Wife" (Greenwich Village Theater) is imagined with a certain meticulousness, almost with a faint doggedness. It may be true; it is not important. Vanna never lets us know her inner processes except through tortured hints. Thus her actions remain obscure. Her tragedy is precipitated, moreover, by her daughter's rigidly Catholic temper. Would Vanna have accepted that tragedy? Would she not have faced Livia with the accusation of her human experience, wisdom, suffering? In Italy perhaps not. But the strain remains, for Luigi Pirandello is not strong enough to universalize the concrete, to project his parish into the world.

The Guild production of "Windows" is by far the most steadily intelligent and finished of the three. The casting of Phyllis Povah does not satisfy me and the cook is a trifle low comedy. The others are admirable. Helen Westley has a remarkably deep, clear, and imaginative moment, and Henry Travers gives one of the most veracious, concrete, and memorable performances one is likely to see. Mr. Hopkins's production of "Launzi" is so hushed in the first act that it is almost a dumb show. The best part of the play must be inferred. This is the more to be regretted since Miss Millay's English phrasing is a source of pleasure in itself. Mr. Jones's scenery, especially in the last act, is lovely and suggestive as usual; Miss Pauline Lord's fine modulation both inner and outer of the long note of wistful yearning and utter defeat which she has to sustain cannot easily be praised too highly. In "Floriani's Wife" all that is notable is Margaret Wycherly's acting. She is a little gesticulatory at first. Later she becomes quieter and intenser. She has moments then that I shall long see. But she cannot, of course, emerge from the obscurity in which Pirandello has left the character itself.

International Relations Section

Republican Prisoners in the Irish Free State

IN an editorial comment on the Irish elections in a recent issue, The Nation criticized the conditions of Irish prisons in which thousands of Republicans are at present incarcerated. We have received various protests from official Irish bodies and we take this opportunity in the International Relations Section to present in documentary form the testimony of the parties to the controversy and of the Red Cross Commission which made an investigation.

An Official Protest

A reply to The Nation is contained in the following statement from the Irish Government Publicity Department, which protests against the wide-spread reports of brutality and shocking physical conditions.

In your issue of September 12, 1923, commenting on affairs in the Irish Free State, you declare that the prison conditions here "are so shocking as to impugn the humanity and decency of the Free State Government." It would be difficult for any newspaper to glean the truth from the statements of Irregular propagandists, which must at the very least be one-sided. We therefore inclose for your information the report of the International Committee of the Red Cross on the subject. You will note that the committee says that the treatment of the prisoners "is devoid of all hostile spirit," and that "the Government refuses the status of 'prisoners of war' to the prisoners, but in reality treats them as such." You will also note that the delegate nowhere found "a wounded or sick prisoner left without medical treatment. On the contrary he found everywhere a carefully organized medical service." Finally the committee declares that "the complaints regarding the prohibition of correspondence with prisoners' families, sanitary conditions, and food in the camps are unfounded." The reason for the continued detention of the Irregular prisoners is not political. Though the active Irregulars have to a large extent ceased their hostilities against the National Government, they have not surrendered, but merely "dumped" their arms, presumably for use as opportunity may offer. That the Irregulars regard the present cessation as a mere breathing space is amply proved by the declarations of some of their leaders and by letters published (after capture) by the Government. In one of these Mr. Frank Aiken discusses the possibilities of poison gas in the impending conflict. In another, written on July 8, 1923, he orders his subordinates to "send in a report at least weekly" on such subjects as "Enemy posts—description with view to attack; transport; possibilities of buying arms and ammunition, etc." On June 11 Miss MacSwiney, speaking at Kilkenny, said: "The men that were fighting were getting ready to fight again, and would fight if the Irish people attempted to turn down the Irish Republic. . . ." The Government's first duty is to safeguard the lives and properties of law-abiding citizens; and to release the prisoners in a wholesale manner under these circumstances would be a flagrant dereliction of that duty. In the meantime they are detained under conditions which are as humane and considerate as any government similarly situated could grant. In a few cases, where prisoners have done malicious damage to prison property, disciplinary measures have had to be taken, but the vast majority of the prisoners have no complaints against their treatment.

It may be added that over 500 prisoners were released last month.

The Red Cross Inquiry

AS the result of complaints directed against the Irish Free State Government for its treatment of Republican prisoners, the International Committee of the Red Cross decided to make "an inquiry of a purely non-political and technical nature into the position of the said prisoners." M. Schlemmer and M. Haccius were appointed as delegates. The former secured the consent of the Free State Government and then M. Haccius conducted a personal investigation. We quote below those sections of the committee's report which give M. Haccius's findings:

M. R. Haccius was delegated to visit the prison camps from the point of view of their organization and accommodation, and of the sanitary conditions of the internees. We give the following extracts of information from the report submitted by our delegate:

The total number of prisoners and internees is about 11,500 men and 250 women. Our delegate visited the principal camps comprising a total of 7,369 prisoners. The treatment of these prisoners is devoid of all hostile spirit and the general principles adopted by the tenth International Conference of the Red Cross are observed. The Government refuses the status of prisoners of war to the prisoners, but in reality treats them as such.

The delegate particularly draws the attention of the committee to the fact that nowhere did he find a wounded or sick prisoner left without medical treatment. On the contrary he found everywhere a carefully organized medical service. The serious accusations made on this subject appear to him unfounded.

The delegate was not able to visit the prison at Kilmainham where 250 women are detained, but has no reason to believe that the treatment there is different to that adopted at Mountjoy. Thirteen of those prisoners had been on hunger-strike since the day of their arrest to obtain their release or immediate trial, and not as a protest against the prison regime. This fact is moreover verified by their written statements. The delegate did not consider it his duty to insist on getting into touch with these prisoners, fearing that his intervention, misinterpreted, would only encourage them to persist in their attitude, and give rise to a new case of strike. During his sojourn three of these prisoners were released.

The buildings of the old North Dublin Union are in the course of alteration for the reception of those detained in Kilmainham. These buildings with the surrounding garden will fulfil all desirable hygienic conditions.

The instructions given by the International Committee of the Red Cross to its delegate exclude certain representations and sworn inquiries bearing on individual complaints. It is a fact that searches have taken place in various private hospitals, but the working of these hospitals has not been interfered with. There are grounds for the complaints of overcrowding in Mountjoy Prison.

The complaints regarding the prohibition of correspondence with prisoners' families, sanitary conditions, and food in the camps are unfounded.

A VISIT TO THE INTERNMENT CAMP AT TINTOWN

April 20, 1923

This camp adjoins the barracks of the Curragh Camp at about twenty-five miles from Dublin.

Number of prisoners 3,200 men (average age 16 to 25 years).

Habitation. A series of barracks made of corrugated iron (each containing about fifty prisoners), in good condition, with French casement windows and stoves. Work is being carried on actively on the enlarging of this camp, where the prisoners at present interned in prisons will be concentrated. Each prisoner is supplied with a bed, a wire-mattress, mattress, sheets, and three blankets. W. C.'s at thirty meters from the corresponding barracks. Wash houses with water supply in the inclosure of the camp. Baths with hot-water supply (baths and douches) in a special building, open at all times, and working at the time of my visit. Soap supplied. I was surprised to see that in spite of these facilities many prisoners neglected their own personal cleanliness.

Food. The kitchens are well run (one kitchen for four barracks), with a concrete floor. A dining-hall with tables and benches adjoining each kitchen. I was informed about the ration by the Q. M. of the camp. I was able to see for myself in the stores that the provisions are of good quality. Judging from the remains on the table after the mid-day meal, it is evident that the quantity of food supplied is amply sufficient.

Sanitary Situation. Sick, seventy-two men in the infirmary, twenty-five men in the surgical hospital. There are six wooden barracks used as an infirmary; these buildings are in good condition and well heated. The sanitary staff is composed of three medical doctors (Head Dr. Comdt. Maguire) and army nurses. A medical visit daily, which anyone wishing to see the doctor can attend. There are no epidemics. A certain number of men who arrived lately are affected with scurvy, and have been isolated from the rest while being treated. The sterilizers are installed in a stone work building and function permanently. The wounded who are submitted to surgical treatment are nursed outside the camp in a pavilion isolated from the barracks hospital. The rooms are fitted with every comfort and contain from four to five beds. The patients seem to be very grateful to the doctors for their devoted care and attention.

Correspondence. The prisoners are authorized to send two letters weekly to their families; these letters are censored by the camp authorities. The parcels addressed to the prisoners are delivered to them. I have seen several men open their parcels; and it is thus they receive tobacco, which is not supplied by the camp authorities.

Organization and Complaints. The prisoners themselves organize the interior service of the camp, kitchen, fatigue-duty, etc., and are responsible for material, which is not replaced in case of wilful destruction. I have not had any complaints to register concerning the food, medical care, or treatment, not having been authorized to question the prisoners. The men are not obliged to do any compulsory work, and are at liberty to walk about the inclosure of the camp. I was present at a football match.

Observations. My visit of inspection to the camp made a favorable impression on me. The conditions correspond with the normal treatment of prisoners of war, in conformity with the principles which inspired the convention of Geneva.

A Visit to the Internment Camp in Gormanstown, County Meath

Number of prisoners, 1,500 (average age 16 to 25 years).

Habitation. The aviation camp was built during the war. The barracks are built of concrete, with double wooden walls, French casement windows, and means of heating installed. The whole is in good condition. There are about 500 prisoners in each barracks; in the old officers' barracks there are two or three beds in each room. Each prisoner is supplied with an iron bed, a mattress, and three blankets. Flush W. C.'s in the center of the inclosure. Wash houses and baths with hot-water supply.

Food. The kitchens and dining-halls in a special building. Same rations as the army.

Sanitary Situation. Sick, seven men in the infirmary. The infirmary and hospital in two special buildings. Medical doctors and army nurses. Medical visit daily. No epidemics.

Correspondence. One letter sent out weekly. Parcels and letters through the post are delivered.

Organization and Complaints. No compulsory work, except duty-service in the kitchen, etc., organized by the prisoners themselves. Large ground for recreation attached to the camp, surrounded by an iron railing.

Observations. Same observations as in the Tintown Camp. (See report of April 20, 1923.) Treatment of prisoners of war.

A Visit to the Iternment Camp at Newbridge, County Kildare

April 18, 1923

Former cavalry barracks and eleven wooden huts. Number of prisoners, 1,969 men.

Accommodation. A large two-story building with dormitories containing twenty to thirty beds; a large two-story building (non-commissioned officers' quarters) with three to four beds in each room; stables transformed into dormitories of fifty beds and eleven wooden huts. Some of the doors and windows have been intentionally destroyed by the prisoners. Each prisoner is provided with an iron bed, pillow, mattress, sheets, and two blankets. Latrines are situated in all the buildings and in the center of the principal yard. There are lavatories with water installation (partly destroyed), hot-water baths, and douches always in working order. Soap is supplied.

Food. Three well-regulated kitchens with refectories containing tables and benches. The rations (see annex) were made known to me by the governor of the camp. The stores are well kept.

Sanitary Conditions. Patients, thirty men in the infirmary. The former recreation hall has been converted into an infirmary. A special apartment is set aside for the treatment of those suffering from the itch. The medical staff consists of two army doctors and several army nurses. There is a daily medical visit. No epidemics. Two disinfecting rooms are in working order.

Organization and Complaints. The same as Tintown (see report of April 20, 1923).

Correspondence. Reception and dispatch, one letter each week. Parcels are distributed regularly, but must be opened under supervision.

Observations. Same as Tintown (see report of April 20, 1923). Surveillance in the small rooms is difficult. There is a great difference in the neatness of the rooms. I remarked on this to the governor who replied that this depended entirely on the prisoners themselves.

A Visit to Mountjoy Prison, Dublin

Number of prisoners, 700 (average age 30 years).

Habitation. Three longitudinal buildings looking out on a central square. Each building is composed of three stories, the cells opening on to an iron gallery. The cells are left open during the day; it is possible that the airing of the rooms may be insufficient when the doors are closed. The dimensions about two by three meters, occupied by two or three internees. Each prisoner is supplied with a mattress, and three blankets. In each building there are six flush W. C.'s. Wash houses and baths (about twenty baths) in the basement with hot and cold water.

Food. Kitchens in a special building situated in the inclosure. The rations (see annex) were communicated to me by the commissariat officer.

Sanitary Situation. Sick, fourteen men being treated in prison hospital. The sanitary staff is composed of a doctor and the Sisters of Charity. There are no cases of epidemics nor contagious diseases. Three sterilizers in the basement.

Correspondence. Authorization to send out two letters weekly, and to receive parcels, newspapers, and books.

Organization and Complains. The interior service of the prison: kept clean by the prisoners themselves. Soap and materials supplied. There is a vast difference in the cleanliness of the cells. Some internees scour the floor, and keep their blankets well beaten, while others take no care to keep their cells clean. Near the door that opens on to the inclosure (central building) there is a heap of rubbish that no one thinks it worth while removing. I have had no complaints to register concerning the food, medical care, or treatment, not having been authorized to question the internees. The prisoners are not obliged to do any compulsory work, and during the day are at liberty to walk about the corridors, galleries, and the square (thirty by forty meters) attached to each building.

Observations. The central building as well as the one on the right seem congested. The cells should not have more than two internees, and should be better ventilated. I was assured that as soon as the enlarging of the camp at Tintown was completed (in about two weeks) the prisoners would be transferred there. Treatment of prisoners of war, except as regards habitation.

R. A. HACCIUS,
Delegate of Commission of International Red Cross

An Answer to the Red Cross

THE following analysis of the Red Cross Report was prepared and sent to us by Albinia Brodrick, an Irish Republican who has herself suffered imprisonment, has carried on a small hospital and dressing station for the wounded, and is associated with Mrs. Despard, president of the Prisoners' Defense League.

The report of M. Haccius, delegate from the International Committee of the Red Cross, sent to Ireland in response to many complaints on the subject of the treatment of Republican prisoners in Ireland, has produced consternation among those cognizant of the true state of affairs in our Irish prisons and internment camps.

That delegation was sent to conduct an inquiry, "completely non-political and technical," into the position of the said prisoners.

These prisoners were all under the control of the British Free State Government in Ireland, without exception. They were in military custody of the acknowledged army of that Government. Of the actions of that army, Richard Mulcahy, speaking in the Free State Parliament on June 1, said there was nothing that the Free State army had done that he was not fully and completely associated with. Mr. Mulcahy is the Minister for Defense in the Free State Government, and by that statement admitted his Government's responsibility for whatever treatment the army, or the Government itself, had dealt out to their prisoners, whether good, bad, or indifferent.

1. The report gives figures. These figures were furnished by the one party only, and that the party accused of maltreatment. They are incorrect. M. Haccius states the number of women imprisoned in his report as 250 for the whole of Ireland. There were, at the time of his visit, 325 women prisoners in the prisons of Mountjoy and Kilmainham alone, who were immediately afterwards transferred to the North Dublin Union, where I met them. Eighty other women prisoners were then transferred to Kilmainham, chiefly from provincial prisons, while an unknown number were still retained in provincial prisons. There was thus a known number of between four and five hundred women prisoners, at a time when the figure furnished to M. Haccius was 250.

2. The report states that the "Government" gave the delegate all facilities for visiting the prisons and internment camps of the country and for making a report on the treatment of those detained in them. Despite their general permission, the delegate visited three only of the internment camps, those of Gormanstown, Newbridge, and Tintown (he does not mention which of the Tintown camps), and the male portion of one prison—that of Mountjoy. He visited no female prison; and he left unvisited prisons such as Tralee, Dundalk, Killarney, Ballybricken, Kilkenny, Maryborough, Templemore, the basements of the Cork Courthouse, the Victoria and Custume Barracks, Athlone, and others of similar reputation throughout the country.

3. M. Haccius was authorized (apparently by the International Committee) to visit the prison camps solely from the point of view of their material organization and the sanitary condition of the prisoners. Very grave complaints had been made to the committee of grievous mishandling and of the murder of prisoners in the prisons. Why was not this included within the scope of the inquiry?

4. M. Haccius did not question the prisoners. Without doing so, how could he hope to arrive at any clear idea of facts? He depended for his "facts" apparently on the statements made by the "Government"—the party most interested, as the accused party, in proving that the condition alike of prisons, prisoners, and camps was satisfactory. Why did he not question the prisoners? Again, what value can be attached to statements repeated by him from the mouth of the one interested party?

5. M. Haccius especially calls the attention of the committee to the fact that he nowhere found a sick or wounded prisoner left without treatment, and that on the contrary he found everywhere a carefully organized sanitary service. He specially states as regards Tintown that the sick seem to be very grateful to the doctors for the devoted manner in which they care for them. How came M. Haccius by this information without questioning the prisoners? How does he judge of whether men are sick or wounded? Is he qualified to tell at a glance as he passes by the 7,369 prisoners that they are all in good health and unwounded? In the absence of conversation with the prisoners even a well-qualified medical man would be in no position to say as much. How was he aware of the prisoners' gratitude? Did he see it in their eyes? As regards the medical service, did he ascertain whether the gentlemen employed were medical men? Did it occur to him that the hospitals in Tintown, with ninety-seven patients, should have been properly staffed with fully trained nurses? How did he know that the sanitary service was properly carried out? What about the dung-heap which he saw near the door of the principal building in Mountjoy? In one of the places he inspected he gives figures from which it is obvious that there is but one latrine to every one hundred and sixteen men. Is M. Haccius not aware that this is a gravely inadequate number?

6. M. Haccius did not visit Kilmainham. He however tells us in spite of this fact that he has no reason to suppose that the treatment is different from that in Mountjoy. He adds that there are 250 women imprisoned there—that is, the full number said to be imprisoned in all Ireland. Was M. Haccius not informed that there are women prisoners in Mountjoy? If so, why did he neglect to visit that part of the prison? If he was not so informed, what was the reason for concealing the fact on the part of the Free State Government? What value can we place on the report—without investigation—that M. Haccius "has no reason to believe"? His duty was to deal with facts, not suppositions. B. Wing, of Kilmainham, condemned long since as unfit for British tommies, is notorious.

7. The delegate did not visit the North Dublin Union. This does not prevent the International Committee from reporting that the buildings are in process of being prepared for the reception of the female prisoners from Kilmainham, again omitting any mention of those in Mountjoy. He adds that those buildings and the adjoining garden will fulfil all necessary hygienic conditions. I was a prisoner in the North Dublin Union. One bath per hundred women, a gross insufficiency of water for personal hygiene, and an almost impossibility of washing underclothes through want of water, did not appear to me, as a trained sanitary inspector, to fulfil all necessary hygienic conditions. It may be added that the floors were filthy, the lavatories wet, and the huge dustbins left for weeks unemptied. As a matter of decency it may also be noted that the young sentries had a full view of all that went on both in the prison hospital and in the dormitories, through the windows, bare of blinds or curtains.

The dormitories were overcrowded, in spite of which the girls had no other room in which to sit by day when the weather was bad.

8. The delegate states that raids have been made on private hospitals, but that the normal functioning of these hospitals has not been interfered with. That is possibly true—but how does he know it? He records no visits to these or any but the actual camp prison hospitals. He also makes no allusion to the results of these violent cataclysms on the condition of the patients, many of whom were recovering from surgical operations, recently performed.

9. The delegate definitely states that the stoppage of correspondence and the complaints as to food and sanitation are unfounded. Whence does he get this information? It cannot, as regards the correspondence, have been supplied by the prisoners, whom he did not question and whose families have suffered grievous anxiety from the frequent stoppage of letters and the inability to send parcels of much-needed food. Even the fact of his seeing parcels does not preclude the suspicion that he may have chanced upon a fortunate day. The matter of constant stoppage of both letters and parcels is widespread and notorious. I was unable while in the North Dublin Union to send or receive parcels or letters, as were the remaining 325 women. This state of affairs continued long after I left.

10. As far as food is concerned, M. Haccius tells us frankly that he repeats the list of rations given him by the governor, superintendent, and quartermaster responsible for the camps. He did not question the prisoners, and could not therefore ascertain whether the amounts noted on the list reached the prisoners, nor yet whether they were of the right quality. If they were not (and there have been many complaints) this might account for the amount left over which he noted in one instance.

11. As to sanitation. Considering the single latrine noted to each 116 men in the one case, without comment from the delegate; considering that in the remaining cases the number of latrines is not mentioned and that there is only one allusion to their condition, it appears unwise to accept his conclusions as regards the sanitary condition of the camps. At Newbridge M. Haccius notes of the latrines "partially sabotaged by the prisoners." Is this another unsupported statement of the accused, or did he obtain information also from the prisoners whom he did not question?

12. M. Haccius maintains that the spirit of hostility in the treatment of prisoners is conspicuous by its absence. From what grounds does he draw this general conclusion? Not from the prisoners, with whom he did not converse. It can, therefore, once more have been only from the accused party, to whose interest and advantage it would be to make the matter appear thus.

Every sane person who has even an elementary knowledge of prisons and prisoners in Ireland—much more those who have experienced the difficulties attending an independent investigation into any alleged misconduct by government officials, under direct government authority, must necessarily feel that the Red Cross International Committee is on its trial as a consequence of this so-called investigation and report.

Admittedly there were difficulties. If they were of such a character as to prevent honest investigation, it was open to the Red Cross delegate to withdraw, stating his reasons. More, it was his duty. He did not withdraw. He visited out of the whole of Ireland three camps and half a prison. He took evidence from the accused party only, although the accusing party desired nothing better than to bring their evidence before him. The president of the Prisoners' Defense League was not informed of his presence in Ireland. The Consul of the Irish Republic in Paris was left equally ignorant, although both had sent in requests for the intervention of the Red Cross. The evidence of no person was taken which could have borne out the complaints.

Notwithstanding this, definite conclusions are stated, both by the delegate and by the International Committee, conclusions based on the evidence of the accused party alone. As such, they are worthless.

Does the statement of the committee on page 608 of their International Review for June: "We extract from the report presented by our delegate the following statements," mean that we have not even now got before us the full report? It looks very like it. If not, why not?

The credit of the Red Cross is at stake. Neither at Gormanstown, nor in Mountjoy did the prisoners by their own account see any Red Cross delegate.

The difficulties, frankly to be acknowledged, attending inspection and the taking of evidence under such circumstances, should have made the delegate doubly careful. Has he been misled by the accused party? We hope so. But he will need to prove it, and to admit it. In any case, the Red Cross International Committee will be wise to investigate the matter with care and openly, if they are to escape with credit from a painful situation.

THE best there is to say of the pow-wow in Washington between President Coolidge and the State Governors in regard to prohibition is that the meeting and its recommendations will soon be forgotten. It was a fine exhibition of unctuous claptrap which apparently satisfied nobody except the official stenographers who were paid for reporting it by the word. Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, who fathered the whole movement, says it got nowhere; Governors Parker of Louisiana, Ritchie of Maryland, and Smith of New York think it got too far; and Governor Blaine of Wisconsin asserts that the only result was to boost Governor Pinchot as a Republican Presidential candidate. Even these mild estimates give an exaggerated importance to the meeting. The speeches and resolutions reek with "cooperate," "coordinate," and other words whose use we discovered during the war when we were trying to express in a high-sounding way something we didn't in the least understand or mean. Mr. Coolidge himself was not a little muddled about the duties of States toward Federal laws. If he meant to say that in general States have a direct duty to enforce Federal laws, he announced a doctrine not hitherto accepted. If he referred to the "concurrent power" to enforce prohibition which is specifically given to the States by the Eighteenth Amendment, he forgot that the fun of that has been destroyed by the Supreme Court's ruling that no higher alcoholic content can be fixed than in the Volstead law. The fact is that in prohibition the United States is undertaking a great radical experiment. Successful enforcement will come only if eventually the law commends itself not to a large minority or a small majority but to an overwhelming proportion of our citizens. In the meanwhile we are in for rather a nasty time of it.

THAT staunch old democrat, President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia, must have twinged when he read the comparisons in the Paris press between his visit to the French capital and that of the Czar of Russia some years ago which sealed an alliance that began with a loan and ended in a war. For he too is concluding a loan and sealing an alliance, and he is too experienced in the ways of diplomacy not to know and regret the possible implications of his and his country's action. Henceforth, apparently, the French army of more than 600,000 men, the French-trained Polish army of 400,000 men, and the French-trained Czech army of 300,000 men will form one military unit. We shall soon see published in the League of Nations Treaty Series, as the Covenant of the League requires, the text of some innocuous "defensive" treaty; but the accompanying military treaty will be styled "agreement" or "convention," and kept secret. As a matter of fact this new treaty marks the completion of another chapter in the development of a system of alliances which makes Central Europe virtually a province of France. That empire of Mitteleuropa of which pan-Germans dreamed during the war has been realized—but by Germany's ancient enemy.

AN intricate network of post-war alliances binding the new nations of Central Europe to each other and to France perpetuates the hates of war time. Belgium is bound by treaty and loans to follow France. Political, commercial, and military treaties between France and Poland, signed during Marshal Pilsudski's visit to Paris in February, 1921, gave the signal for the "Little Entente." Czecho-Slovakia and Jugoslavia and Rumania, moved by a common fear of mutilated Hungary, signed military agreements in June and July of 1921; Rumania and Poland made an agreement directed against Russia at the same time; and before the end of the year Czecho-Slovakia and Poland composed their disagreements. Czecho-Slovakia moved toward including ruined Austria in her orbit in December, 1921, but Austria's subsequent adoption as a ward of the League has left her out of any scheme of alliances. Poland sought, just before the Genoa Conference of 1922, to sweep the Baltic states into the Polish military system, but they resisted. Meanwhile a series of loans and commercial agreements has cemented the dependence of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Rumania upon France. Jugoslavia's future remains uncertain; she may settle her differences with Italy and swing into the British system, or follow the easier path of French domination. In any case an enormously powerful military system has been established in Europe, and Germany, facing disruption, sees an alliance of enemies reaching greedy hands at her from every side. Outside the system stands one Power—Soviet Russia; and toward it too Poincaré is now extending feelers.

CONTINUING unemployment brings in England, as everywhere, talk of money inflation as a remedy. Even the Conservative Spectator and so sound a financier as Reginald McKenna, former Chancellor of the Exchequer, seem to be flirting with the thought; and less cautious thinkers are boldly proposing that the government issue paper currency to the value of a hundred million pounds, and use it to put the unemployed to work. It is an alluring prospect—it all sounds so beautifully simple. Print money and pay your debts—the harassed statesman need not even resort to taxation to meet the obligations of his government. Unfortunately the game has other consequences. For England particularly, burdened with the American debt which must be paid in gold, the prospect of a debased currency has obvious drawbacks. But there are always some men who, like Hugo Stinnes, can find means to profit by a falling currency, and such speculators will always find hungry crowds ready to accept any glistering hope. It remains true that, as Francis W. Hirst once put it,

> No more severe reflection could be passed upon the moral and political capacity of the human species than this: Five thousand years after the invention of writing, three thousand after the invention of money, and (nearly) five hundred since the invention of printing, governments all over the world are employing the third invention for the purpose of debasing the second; thereby robbing millions of innocent individuals of their property on a scale so extensive that previous public confiscations of private property through the adulteration of money . . . seem pigmy frauds in comparison with the present vast inundation of counterfeit paper money.

FRANCE naturally is watching the British move toward inflation with eager interest. The steadiness of the French note circulation—it is actually a trifle lower today than in 1920—has been the chief argument of those who have sought to bolster the waning credit of the franc. The utter financial failure of the Ruhr invasion has not yet had its due reflection in the market rating of the French unit of currency. Note circulation has been kept low by resorting to internal loans and other camouflaged forms of inflation, but these have their limits. Further issue of paper money would under present circumstances seriously damage the credit of the government at home—although some politician-financiers such as M. Loucheur are already advocating inflation—for it would involve an open parliamentary vote raising the legal limit of note issue beyond the present 41 billion francs. If, however, the canny financiers of Great Britain should take the lead, the task of the French politician in explaining such a policy to the people would be enormously simplified. Inflation gives a temporary relief, even though the after-effects be harsh—and after the elections next spring the politicians will be safe for another four years.

THE folly and futility of preparedness were never better illustrated than in the storm raised by Britain's proposal to build a great naval base at Singapore. Before the first load of cement had been dumped the old, old story began again. Holland feels menaced—the Dutch East Indies seem threatened. The Dutch Government, which feels the need of economy so keenly that it is reducing civil employees' salaries 10 per cent, proposes an enormous naval budget to build a base at Tanjung Priok as a defense against Singapore. The Philippines are also near; and when our Congress reassembles there will not be wanting Senators and Representatives to plead for scrapping the Washington treaties and building a base in the Sulu Archipelago or on Palawan Island, even if the British proposal should fall through. Japan, in the long run, will never let such a fort go unmatched, though earthquakes and Washington treaties enforce a present prohibition. The Singapore plan has done more to excite distrust of England in the East than the return of a dozen Wei-hai-weis, even if faithfully executed, could wipe out—and the Englishmen who like Ramsay MacDonald are fighting it are, even from an imperial point of view, the true patriots.

TO all those who are losing sleep over the influence and position of the Ku Klux Klan we suggest a look at the American Legion. Three and four years ago the Legion, with its lawless attacks upon individuals, its campaign against our foreign population, and its effort to dictate the policies of public officials, occupied much the same position on the first pages of the newspapers that the Klan does today. But the Legion did not succeed in holding its position and neither will the Klan. Today the Legion has almost completely abandoned its former violent and offensive tactics, and at its recent national convention it passed a resolution aimed at the Klan (though not by name) which sounded much like censure of the Legion's old self. In regard to a soldiers' bonus, too, the Legion has shifted its ground. For the first time in the Legion's history there was an organized opposition in the national convention to the usual resolution in favor of the bonus, which for a time deadlocked proceedings. If even the Legion, which has been the mainspring of bonus propaganda, now finds itself divided on the issue, what justification is there for the plan to put a bonus bill through the forthcoming session of Congress? We agree with the Legion that care of the disabled is the nation's first duty; and we think it has no other financial obligation toward the ex-service men of the World War.

HOW the shortage of homes in New York City had torn down the constructive efforts of a quarter of a century toward protecting the health and comfort of tenants was described by Frank Mann, the Tenement House Commissioner, when he appeared before the State Commission on Housing. Mr. Mann frankly admitted that the requirements of the tenement-house law were not enforced unless his department believed there was a fire hazard. Only four apartments out of 1,000 are vacant at the present time, said Mr. Mann—almost precisely the same situation as in 1920 when the emergency rent laws were enacted. To enforce the tenement-house law would be to put some 30,000 persons on the streets without expectation of finding new homes. "If we consider it is a case where no danger of fire exists, we don't prosecute," he said, "on the ground that there are times, and these are the times, when a public official charged with enforcing a certain duty must close one eye and sometimes both." Obviously the emergency rent laws of 1920 should be continued, but that meets only part of the need. As the New York Evening World puts it:

> Increasing sense of social and State obligation has steadily sought to mitigate the harsher workings of economic law in crowded cities. The present rent laws in this State, with the exception of the tax-exemption law, are only the restrictive part of the program urged when they were passed. The constructive part of that program proposed State aid for housing. If private initiative fails to provide decent homes for families of modest income, public initiative must take a hand, as it has in other countries.

IN a period when labor newspapers are finding it hard to live, it is pleasant to observe that labor banks multiply and grow fat. New York City already has two and is about to add a third. The first of the trio, the Amalgamated Bank of New York, only six months old, increased its depositors from 800 in the middle of April to 5,613 on October 14, while its total resources expanded in the same period from $747,000 to $2,514,000. The progress of the Federation Bank, sponsored by the New York State Federation of Labor and the Central Trades and Labor Council of New York City, has also been rapid. All of which promises well for the forthcoming International Union Bank of the International Ladies' Garment Workers, the opening of which is now definitely set for December 1. It may be objected that while there is a clientele in New York City for one or two labor banks, there will not be enough business for three. But the opportunity lies in creating new business, not in taking it away from other banks. The creation of new banking services and the gathering in of new groups of customers among people of moderate and small means are open fields for labor banks.

THERE is frank amazement in Great Britain over the fuss Americans are making over the visit of Mr. Lloyd George. The British newspapers cannot understand why his visit is attracting such attention, is receiving so much publicity. But for America Mr. Lloyd George personifies, as does no other individual, the epic of the World War; and that holocaust still has much more romance for the people of the United States than for those that had more of it and learned to understand it better. Besides that, America can hardly fail to respond to its first direct contact with so vital and keen a personality. There seems to be another consideration too. For the British Mr. Lloyd George is only an ex-premier; shorn of power, he is shorn of interest. In America—never much concerned with his precise political status—Mr. Lloyd George continues to be a public official on the basis of his reputation. Something similar happened when, after the last presidential campaign, James M. Cox visited England. Here he was regarded as a spent bullet, and Americans could not fathom why he was received abroad with virtually official honors or how his words could be taken so seriously. As runner-up in the presidential contest, Mr. Cox was apparently rated as the second most important political personage in the United States. Which reminds us that a Buenos Aires newspaper once gravely described the official position of William Jennings Bryan as "ex-Presidential candidate of the United States."

IN these days of almost universal folly and insufficiency in politics it gives one a glad jump of surprise to read of one region which is reputed to have a model governor and an almost ideal government. One's surprise is greater because the region in question is in a country whose national government has all but collapsed. The region is the province of Shansi, China, and the man is General Yen Hsi-shan. General Yen became the boss of the province of Shansi when only thirty years old and has been on the job for eleven years. Although a graduate of a military school, his first act was to propose a general disbandment of troops, setting an example by reducing his own soldiery from 50,000 to 20,000 men. Nevertheless, according to a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, banditry is virtually unknown in Shansi and it is the one province of China that has effectively put down the opium traffic. Nor is General Yen asleep in constructive measures. He has built roads, has started a forestry school and a scheme of reforestation, and has introduced sheep from Australia with a view to breeding a strain suitable to the Shansi hillsides. All of which sounds too good to be true—and maybe it is. Anyhow it is so far away that it can have no unhappy influence on our own politicians, and as most of our critics—a few of whom are also our readers—say we ought to publish more that is optimistic, we present this picture of political perfection for such as are able to believe it.

MOST of the spectators of the Zev-Papyrus race seem to have missed its most novel and spirited aspect. We came near missing it ourselves, for we saw the race at second hand through the columns of a New York Sunday newspaper, whose account began on the first page but, before getting fairly warmed up, skipped not only to another page but to another section—one which we had already read and thrown away. Eventually we recovered the missing section and thus the threads of the plot. The officials of the Jockey Club, not satisfied with the gate receipts from 45,000 spectators, sought to sell the exclusive privilege of making motion pictures to a single company. The first company approached declined to be held up in any such manner, saying that the race was a public spectacle and the company would get pictures of it anyway. Two other firms took the same position; a fourth accepted the offer, paying, it is said, $50,000. The outsiders then arranged to instal cameras in various nearby houses, built a "crow's nest" in a handy tree, and arranged for airplane pictures from above. But just before Zev and Papyrus lined up before the starter's gate, the photographers with the concession put in position some huge mirrors and sent up a screen of smoke to spoil the plans of their rivals. The outsiders say they got their pictures just the same and some "close-ups" besides, the latter made by two actresses in the grandstand who carried small motion-picture cameras camouflaged as hand-bags. We hope so.

CANADA, it is reported, plans to shoot two thousand bison this year, because her protected herd has grown so large that it runs the risk of starving on its range. Tanganyika Territory—née German East Africa—finds lions and leopards such a pest that it puts a bounty on their scalps, as we do on the skins of rats and other petty rodents. In the first half of this year rewards were paid for the destruction of 300 lions and 800 leopards—and in return the lions of one district killed 67 natives. From India we hear that snake-bites cost 20,000 human lives in a single year, while tigers killed 1,603, leopards 509, and crocodiles 255. A collector has just arrived in New York from Australia with 58 camels rounded up 800 miles from a railroad in the Australian desert, whither they had fled from civilization—all our present-day camels are the offspring of domesticated stock; except possibly in Siberia the wild camel became extinct in pre-scientific days. After all, despite the water-power companies and the missionaries and mandaters, there are still great open spaces, utter wilderness, in the world.

Monarchy, Communism—or Mere Starvation?

THE strangulation of the Ruhr and the Rhineland, which the editor of The Nation so vividly describes elsewhere in this issue, is one part of the process of decay which is going on in Germany. As rats desert a sinking ship the monarchist Bavarians are asserting their independence of Berlin and the more material-minded of the Rhinelanders are seeking a safe harbor in the shelter of the French franc, while the federal government itself is kicking Saxony in the hope of appeasing Bavaria.

If Poincaré desired the destruction of Germany he has his wish, perhaps more thoroughly than he expected; but if he desired reparations he must at last realize that the English were right when they warned him in terms of the nursery fable against killing the goose that laid the golden egg. There will be no more reparations for France—that is surer today than the future of the puny infant republic of the Rhineland, of the monarchist movement in Bavaria, or of the workingmen of Saxony. Frenchmen who think will hardly rejoice at the turn of events.

In Germany, too, there seems to have been a woeful absence of statesmanship. It is difficult to understand the state of mind of the Bavarians who talk of their German patriotism while they sabotage German unity, or of the Berlin officials who give the order to the Reichswehr to advance against the Saxon workingmen while the empire is crumbling about their ears. Yet in these crucial days Bavaria has not only continued to mobilize her own guards but has defied Berlin, refusing to recognize the right of the federal government to name the commander of the national army unit in Bavaria, and actually going so far as to kidnap a whole regiment and force it to swear a special allegiance to Bavaria. This is separatism with a vengeance. Saxony, fearing precisely such disloyalty as the Reichswehr has shown in Bavaria and knowing its record of reactionary control, some time ago established working-class defense units, and when the local army commander called upon the Saxon Government to dissolve these it refused, at the same time sending a flaming protest to Berlin. Berlin, however, only gave the Reichswehr commander authority to go ahead, and while Bavaria and the Rhineland are falling away from Germany we are treated to the spectacle of triumphant communiques issued by this general as he marches victoriously through the factory villages of Saxony.

There is between the present rulers of Saxony and Bavaria almost as wide a gulf as there was in the early years of the soviet revolution between Russia and the Western world. Bavaria is today ruled by men who trace the downfall of Germany to the revolution of 1918, and look to the restoration of monarchical dictatorship for any possible salvation. When they denounce "Marxism" and the "internationalists" of Berlin they mean to denounce mere democracy. They hate the republic, the Weimar constitution, the parliamentary governments which have had to recognize the fact that the Social Democracy was the largest single party in Germany. Ludendorff and his Fascist dummy, Hitler, and von Kahr, von Knilling, von Lossow, and Rupprecht of Wittelsbach, Crown Prince of Bavaria as they call him, may fight on internal Bavarian issues, but they agree in wanting a return to the pre-war kind of rule. It is one of the ironies of history that old Munich is today the center of Germany's grimmest reaction, while Frederick the Great's and Wilhelm's capital has become in its way a symbol of liberalism.

Industrial Saxony was called the Red Kingdom in the Kaiser's day. Since the war its Socialists have been unable to stomach, like their Berlin comrades, alliance with the Industrialists. The course of events has driven them into alliance with the Communists, and the mere existence of a Socialist-Communist Government, regardless of its activity or inactivity, seems to have excited the Munich superpatriots to frenzy. Presumably the willingness of the Berlin Government to send the Reichswehr into Saxony was in part due to a vain hope of placating the Bavarians. The insubordination of the Saxons has been far less than that of the Bavarians—it seems to have been confined to unwillingness to order dissolution of the proletarian self-defense organizations—but they are weaker, and they are suffering the fate of the weak in these post-war days. One of their cardinal offenses, in Bavarian eyes at least, was that their ministers predicted the failure of the passive-resistance campaign in advance of its abandonment, while every official voice in Germany, Bavaria included, was still proclaiming solidarity unto death.

What will be the outcome of this internecine strife? It is difficult to believe that the parliamentary leaders of the Social Democrats will long support a government which surrenders to the Bavarians while sending troops against poor Saxony. But if their ministers withdraw from the Cabinet, what then? They have voted Stresemann almost dictatorial powers. Presumably, even in the absence of a parliamentary majority, he—or those whom he represents—would continue to govern without them. The Socialists are not strong enough, even allied with the extreme Communists, to rule Germany against the Industrialists. Their weakness may be in part the fruit of past mistakes, but they are today, despite their numbers in the Reichstag, almost powerless. They have exhausted themselves in struggling against the Left. If a great civil war comes between Left and Right in Germany, the Communists will lead the forces of the Left. The decay of the middle parties, which has been noted by every intelligent observer throughout the period of French pressure upon Germany, seems to be reaching its climax. Monarchists and Communists face each other, alike ruthless and scornful of democratic principles. If it comes to a struggle the Communists will have numbers with them, but the monarchists will have the troops and the arms, and the rural food-producing sections.

It is still possible that the threat of the Rhenish republic will draw distracted Germany together. There have been so many steps to the French invasion, however, that it seems probable that the effect of this latest stage will be no more striking in Germany than it is likely to be upon the outside world. If the collapse comes we shall have another great people forced, as Austria was, to beg alms upon any terms from the victorious peoples who fought to make the world safe for democracy. It may then be that the League of Nations, which thus far has so carefully averted its gaze from the Ruhr, will feel called upon to act as it acted in Austria in the interest of the business life of the world. Before that happens some hundreds of thousands of German women and children will probably have starved to death.

Mr. Hughes Admits Everything

WHEN the attention of the Secretary of State was called by Washington correspondents to the editorial in last week's Nation, entitled Mr. Hughes Makes a Secret Alliance, he issued a statement which, as sent out by the United Press, follows:

> The attention of the Department has been called to statements both in the advertising of the recently concluded loan to Salvador and in the press which created an erroneous impression regarding the relation of the United States Government to the loan.
> It has been stated that a secret agreement has been made by the Department of State. This is a misleading statement as the agreement was negotiated between the Government of Salvador and the representatives of the bankers concerned. It is in no sense a treaty.
> The Department of State has no relation to the matter except with respect to facilitating the arbitration and distribution of disputes that may arise between the parties, and the appointment of a collector of customs in case of default. It is manifestly to the interest of peace and justice that there should be an appropriate method of deciding such controversies as might arise, and at the specific request of the Government of Salvador and the interested bankers the Secretary of State has consented to use his good offices in referring such disputes to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or if he is unable to act, to another member of the Federal judiciary for appropriate arbitrament.
> Also, at the request of the Government of Salvador and the interested bankers, the Secretary of State consented to assist in the selection of a collector of customs, who, according to the loan contract, is to be appointed in the case of default. This was simply for the purpose of facilitating the choice of an entirely competent and disinterested person. The contract also provides that the collector of customs, if appointed, will communicate to the Department of State for its records such regulations relating to the customs administration as may be prescribed and also a monthly and annual report.
> The Government of the United States has no relation to the loan except in these particulars.

We understand this statement was called a "denial." It would be a tribute to our accuracy if all our writing were denied in a similar fashion, for Mr. Hughes confirms all the important points which we made against him. He admits having agreed to refer disputes between Salvador and the Wall Street bankers who are making her a loan to the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, thus taking it upon himself to lay extra and unauthorized work upon an independent branch of the government. He admits making the American Government a further party to the loan through promising that the Secretary of State shall "assist in the selection of a collector of customs" in case of default by Salvador.

Mr. Hughes says that the agreement in regard to the loan "is in no sense a treaty." We have not said that it was; indeed we were at special pains to point out that the secret diplomacy with Salvador had eventuated in what are nowadays called "agreements," negotiated by the executive power alone, although their substance is more important than that which when classed as "treaties" requires the consent of the United States Senate.

These agreements, of which the highly important Lansing-Ishii agreement with Japan is an instance, have become notoriously frequent of late years, and an inquiry by Congress into their legitimacy would be timely. The same questions in regard to loans which Mr. Hughes has cavalierly disposed of alone were submitted to the Senate in the form of treaties in Mr. Root's days as Secretary of State and even in the golden age of Mr. Knox's "dollar diplomacy." The Dominican customs agreement did not take final shape until the Senate passed it, in somewhat amended form, in 1907. In 1911, again, when American bankers were considering a loan to Honduras, which would have involved the United States only to the point of approving the collector general of customs, President Taft sent the project to the Senate for ratification; and the Senate, as a matter of fact, did not pass it. In the same year a similar convention for a loan with Nicaragua was presented to the Senate; it also failed to go through in that form, although a loan was eventually made. Mr. Hughes could have found the detail of all this by taking down his red book "Foreign Relations of the United States" for 1912. Instead he negotiated without the consent of the Senate an arrangement with Salvador substantially the same as those proposed with Honduras and Nicaragua, and he threw in as an extra a promise of the services of our Federal judiciary to settle disputes.

Mr. Hughes's explanation of the part played by the Department of State in the Salvador loan differs in no essential from the fuller presentation given in the pages of The Nation except when he refers to our having given an "erroneous impression regarding the relation of the United States Government to the loan." Naturally we do not expect Mr. Hughes to put the same interpretation upon the facts as we do. If so, he would not have consented to the negotiations. But we beg to remind American citizens that all we maintain in regard to the danger of such arrangements as promoters of imperialistic aggression and foreign war is supported by the bankers who are floating the loan. These solid men of affairs, assaying at its business worth Mr. Hughes's promise of our Federal judiciary in settling disputes, say, to repeat our quotation of last week:

> It is simply not thinkable that after a Federal judge has decided any question or dispute between the bondholders and the Salvador Government, that the United States Government should not take the necessary steps to sustain such decision. There is a precedent in a dispute between Costa Rica and Panama, in which a warship was sent to carry out the verdict of the arbitrators.

Beer and Bigger Things

WHEN his beer is taken away from him—even by his own action or his own inadvertence—the American citizen knows how to raise a shout of protest calculated to make the high gods tremble on their thrones. But when his other freedoms and his wages and his goods are taken from him by the more devious processes of big business his voice is very small. And this is natural, for beer flows directly down the gullet and creates, they say, satisfying sensation on its way, and its absence seems to be marked by a direct and painful sense of loss. But a man's goods and chattels and even his rights as a citizen and his children's education may be taken from him in so indirect and piecemeal a fashion that he is none the wiser during the process. He will cry out, "My beer is gone; a curse on the blue-nosed blackguard that stole my beer!" But about his other goods he cannot shout, for he does not know what to say.

And so he goes on being robbed.

It is time, however, that he learned that the economic afflictions of life have causes that can be named and that these causes deserve some of the interest that he is spending so lavishly on his apparently more intimate woes. In three illuminating articles, the last of which appears in this issue of The Nation, Amos Pinchot has described the network of power and ownership that dominates the life of America today. Put briefly, his argument is this: A group of big-business men and financiers own the great railway systems of the country. This ownership gives them several sorts of power; they can charge freight rates that directly increase the prices of the things we buy, and they can distribute illegal transportation advantages to their own industrial concerns, thus unfairly driving out of business their competitors and developing their own concerns into great monopolies. These monopolies, free from the threat of competition, can fix prices where they want. More than this, they can dominate legislatures and universities and the cultural life of the people; and this domination, which everyone feels, can be traced directly back to the illegal favors that are sucked out of the railroads. A general impression has got abroad that rate discrimination and other transportation favors are a thing of the past. Mr. Pinchot cites the eminent testimony of industrial magnates and engineers to prove that transportation differentials are the common weapon of the trusts every day in the year and continue to be so. Various sorts of rebates are devised to elude the eye of the government; cars are refused to competitors or service made ruinously bad. The government will never be able to protect independent producers under a system of private ownership of the railroads.

The simplest logic in the world would seem to demand that we take the railroads away from the men who use them to dominate the country, and begin to acquire some control over the prices we pay and the sort of lives we lead.

We need not pretend that Utopia will be ushered in with government ownership; we need only admit that a vicious circle of control will be broken, and that many evils will automatically right themselves. We may expect lower rates and lower prices; equal treatment of all business concerns, resulting in real competition in steel and coal and oil and meat; lower prices. We may expect that monopolies will be broken up and that those institutions and men who pay tribute to monopoly will be freed.

The relative success of government and private ownership of railroads has been subjected to endless dispute and almost no experiment. Mr. Pinchot's consideration of the facts seems to us almost unanswerable, but it is worth suggesting to those who doubt the government's capacity to run anything efficiently that even inefficient railroading is vastly preferable, from a public point of view, to railroading that delivers the welfare of all of us into the greedy pockets of a few.

It is this robbery on the grand scale, intangible but complete, that the American citizen must come to think and talk and protest about. We doubt if government ownership of railroads will ever be the sole issue of a national campaign. Too many people will always worry about how to get beer or how to prevent people from getting it or how to keep out of Europe. But it must certainly be made a chief issue, and every labor and farmer group in the country must be made to realize that there will be no real prosperity —no prosperity which can be translated into food and clothes and leisure—and no real freedom while the railroads are in private hands.

Pavlowa

AMERICA is the happy hunting-ground of dancers, and in many a revue on Broadway you can see dancing that takes from you, as fine dancing should, the inner sluggishness and inertia that tie you to the earth. A superficial observation may not at once yield up the secret of the difference between the best of these dancers and Anna Pavlowa. But the difference exists—a difference at once exquisitely fine and enormously important.

Pavlowa's art is pure; it is purged of all dross. It is beyond the impulse of display. It has divine ease, self-confidence; it has piety—pietas—toward its own spirit. It has not the lyric lift, the romantic magic of the dancing of the Duncan girls. It is quite serene, quite alien in spirit to any modern experiments. It is pure dancing, as Bach is pure music. It has nothing to say that is beyond itself; it expresses nothing but the loveliness and restrained rapture of rhythmic motion. In brief, it is classic.

It is all that despite the music, which is not natively or naively Russian but is Russian music trying skilfully but not convincingly to sound like Gluck and Mozart. More essentially right than this sounded a once famous and thrice-hackneyed waltz by good old Johann Strauss, because one felt there a last echo, at least, of the tradition in music to which Pavlowa's dancing is so closely akin. We do not quarrel with all this. But we cannot help imagining an evening of Pavlowa dancing, with all pantomime eliminated, to the music out of which her art has really come.

She clings to her tradition and mood in every respect, wearing almost always the classic garb of the ballerina with no concession either to modern eccentricity or modern nakedness. She is effortless, too, as the classics are, and floats—all other dancers leap, with whatever marvelous agility—toward the shoulder of M. Novikoff. It is in that floating that you can estimate her. She has transcended the heaviness of earth. The body has become the dance.

What she adds, what betrays her period and sensibilities in the end, is the eloquence of her hands. They are morbidly fine and flexile, never pantomimic in their motions yet never still. They are very speaking hands. But what they say is nothing that can be set down in words. Here, as elsewhere, she shuns the mimetic. But they communicate yearning and even such touches of strange passion as deny the inner stillness which one would otherwise suppose at the core of her art.

She dances "The Fairy Doll" without much participation in the pantomime or in the grave, quaint humor. She leaves the expression of these to her associates whose work shares this with her own, that, in its possible measure, it has the perfection which is peace. After "The Fairy Doll" comes "Dionysus," which is not of the modernized Greece of white placidity, but of the ruggeder Hellas of the severer gods—severe even in orgiastic moments, sad with the intent sadness of primordial aspiration, desire, ecstasy. After this the "Divertissements" seem a little trivial and a little shallow, and even the pleasant, quick, bird-like poetry of the Rubinstein "Valse Caprice" is in the nature of something faded and spent. What one remembers longest and most fruitfully is Pavlowa, the immemorial ballerina, poised as if for flight, poised yet still, giving that lovely and peaceful moment a touch of strangeness with the light eloquence of her incomparable hands.

The End of the German Empire

(Special Radiogram to The Nation)

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Essen, October 21

THE great German Empire founded by Bismarck is collapsing. It has all but ceased to exist. Not only is it flouted, ignored, and rebuffed by Poincaré, who is seeking to destroy its authority in a hundred ways. Not only is there a Stinnes imperium in imperio compelled to negotiate separately with the French as if Berlin were not concerned. Not only are Bavaria and Saxony almost at war with the Reich. The Palatinate, the Rhineland, and the Ruhr are now lost to Germany, perhaps for fifty years.

The French political policy, so absolutely contrary to the Versailles Treaty, has triumphed. The dismemberment of Germany is at hand, and the Balkanization of Europe as well. What we are seeing mortal eyes have never witnessed in our industrial age. Stark naked military power has triumphed as never before in peace. France cares little now what Berlin does, whether Bavaria secedes, or if England be angry. She has cut the heart out of Germany, seized the left bank of the Rhine (which Wilson prevented at Paris), and has done it by theft, chicanery, brute force, expatriation. Her representatives gloat over their triumph, ignorant or unaware of the lessons of history or of the absurdity of the idea that such a monstrous human wrong could go unpunished.

They make no concealment of their purpose. Their official press representative at Düsseldorf was brutally frank on Friday, saying that France will give the Ruhr workers the absolute choice of working for them or starving; that they will work as, when, and how the French want, for fifteen years to come. He declared that what the German people might think or feel was of no consequence. The French wanted their money, proposed to get it, and would continue to deport everybody whose conduct or bearing they did not like. Asked why the Palatinate and Rhineland were so much more harassed and subjugated than when I was here last year he said it suited his country to govern that way. As for the German railroads seized during passive resistance, he declared that they would never go back to the Germans—at least, he added, for sixty years, being governed meanwhile by an international commission. Germany, he said, would never be able to utilize them for mobilization again.

No honest American could have listened to his utterly cynical, cold-blooded presentation of a plan to dismember a nation and despotically enslave millions of its citizens, and still pretend that our intervention in the war had had any other result than to transfer militarism from Berlin to Paris, and in a more dangerous form—for where that of Berlin was stupid and inevitably self-destroying that of Paris is diabolically clever. I am not basing this on the word of one official. For his one frank avowal of policy there are a thousand facts visible here on every hand. It is an even more startling fact that the French can carry their policy of ruthless subjugation through unless an internal or financial upset causes her to desist. The Ruhr labor leaders say nothing can prevent the German laboring men being driven into absolute despair by the deliberate French policy of delaying the resumption of work and the approach of vast unemployment. The endless exactions, harassments, extortions, thefts of the conquering soldiery are in complete contrast to the British at Cologne. The truth is that the French are ruling as Napoleon did. They have learned nothing. They believe that you can reduce and humiliate these people as if they were Cochin-Chinese.

I am writing with no love whatever for the German Industrialists. It is true that their means are now exhausted. They did receive large sums from Berlin during the period of passive resistance, putting it chiefly into plant betterments to occupy the workers and prevent the loss of that money by the lightning-like fall of the mark. Trustworthy bankers say that unless the French reverse their policy there will be absolute collapse within two weeks. The French reply that this is all humbug, and point to the rise in the values of Ruhr shares. They quote Otto Wolff as saying before their staffs are dismissed the Industrialists will shake large sums out of their sleeves.

Meanwhile plants are daily shutting down; unemployment is menacing; shooting down hungry men and women is a daily occurrence. The local officials are at their wits' ends. Sometimes, as at Düsseldorf, they are allowed no police to uphold order. Sometimes they are aided by the French troops in cities where there are many French women and children. Sometimes there is deliberate incitement of the Separatists, the Communists, and the unemployed. There is no sign how far the French mean to carry their vindictive policy. It looks as if they meant both to rule and ruin, destroying what they cannot use, compelling the complete yielding of every German birthright of freedom and manhood. There has been the utmost delay in reinstating the railroad workers, half of whom will be discharged and their places filled by French workers now here, resulting inevitably in inefficiency and further delay in the resumption of work in the Ruhr. The postal men in Essen were summoned yesterday to go to work and then after much talk were told that everything was off and were sent home. All officials of whatever rank not born in the Rhineland or the Ruhr have been permanently dismissed, also all the higher officials, and their places have been filled by carpet-baggers from France. The French are blocking the resumption of huge plants by refusing to return great amounts of completed products which were seized, and by preventing export of coal, iron, and steel. Every possible obstacle has been thrown in the way of resumption. If what is being done here were done by Italians or Turks to Greeks or Armenians the heavens would ring with the protests of the world. This week is absolutely critical. The French must show their hands or a general collapse will follow. It is impossible to believe this was planned by Germans or that Germans have large sums of foreign currency. German labor leaders say this is not true. All groups are too badly scared. Even Krupp and the small companies are printing their own money. A cup of coffee at Düsseldorf costs a billion marks.

The terrible fact for the Germans is that the passive battle need not have been lost, at least not so soon. The people here were eager to go on indefinitely. The government lost the fight through inadequate preparation, by not planning for a two years' struggle, by throwing away resources, by waste and extravagance, careless and often corrupt management. Germans admit freely that that part of the passive battle was as big a disgrace as the other was honorable. The principle is unaffected by its defeat. What is happening is that between the upper millstone of incompetent political government at Berlin, beset by party squabbles playing politics, failing to put their own house in order and to convince the world of their honesty of purpose, and the lower millstone of French rapacity and utter ruthlessness the German people are being crushed and broken down until their only thought is how they can keep body and soul together with the dollar at twenty billions.

What form of government the French will give the stolen provinces is not clear. It is no longer necessary for them to promote a Rhenish republic, despite Aix. They expect the distracted, starving people voluntarily to ask their conquerors for anything that will enable them to live in peace without starvation and constant military despotism. Outright annexation will of course not be attempted.

We are witnessing hour by hour the fall of a great empire in a way to make inevitable a future war, filling Europe with hatred of an intensity never before dreamed. The French are unable to realize that their policies are certain to lead to their own ruin and to cause a coalition against her. Any temporary gain will be as nothing to the future ill-will of the whole world. No structure founded on such inhumanity, cruelty, and gross materialistic selfishness can endure any more than could Kaiserdom.

Pinchot for President?

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

PINCHOT is what is called an "anti-machine" politician, but he is a politician, thank God, never forget it. He is not a butcher or baker or candlestick-maker who in his spare moments and with his left hand is willing to be good enough to steer the ship of state for a while. Albert Lasker, after a few months of Washington, remarked to this writer "This public life is a business too." It is.

Pinchot in office under Roosevelt and Taft gave his time to public affairs; and then, out of office, subsequently, he still gave his time to public affairs and to deep thought on how to get back into office. People say: "Does he want to be President?" To a political reporter that question seems about as sensible as if a diligent inquirer were to go to a young man in the Harvard freshman football squad and say to him: "Can it be—can it be—that the thought has crossed your mind that you would like to be captain?"

Of course Gifford Pinchot wants to be President. A distinguished rival of his for the next Republican presidential nomination said to this writer last spring: "I am going to sit in the presidential gambling game; and if I win, I win; and if I lose, I lose; and when it is all over, well, anyway, I shall have sat in a game for the biggest stakes in the world."

What is the use of pretending that the public man lives who if he has even one white chip of presidential gambling currency will not edge his way to the table of that game?

Pinchot has several chips—of several colors. Some he acquired while in office under Roosevelt and Taft and some he acquired while out of office by active deliberate cultivation of certain issues and certain electoral elements.

Quarreling with President Taft and thereby forfeiting office, and quarreling during the Great War with Food Administrator Hoover and thereby again departing from office, Pinchot proved indeed that the holding of office is not the total of his temperament or ambition. His temperament, his ambition, is to deal with public questions, but to deal with them his way.

He is a stubborn, wilful, conscientious, bigoted, charming, laughing, sweet-tempered, smooth-mannered, hard-mouthed, stiff-necked, intractable person, who is congenitally interested in problems of state and who wants to hold an office—any office—but the bigger the better—in which God and Pinchot can solve those problems as they should be solved.

Out of office, and seeking the electoral resources with which to return to office and to resume the hunting and killing of wrongs, Pinchot explored the territories occupied by the labor vote and the farmer vote. Defeated for the United States Senate by Penrose, he did what few ex-Rooseveltians were wise enough to do: he dug trenches extending from the general moral issues of the Progressive Party to the specific economic issues of the rising farmer-labor groups.

He made his big house in Washington the organizing center for groups of representatives of farmers. He and Mrs. Pinchot gave parties for farmers as dazzling as any parties they gave for diplomats. Their hearty and straightforward manners served them as well in the one case as in the other. Simultaneously he made his way deeper into the labor world and came to be personally better known to the leaders of labor at Washington and in Pennsylvania. When his anthracite coal conference met this year at Harrisburg it surprised the reporters from afar to observe that for at least one of the miners' conferees the Governor was just naturally "Gifford."

Farm support, labor support, plus the echoes of "Onward, Christian Soldiers" made Pinchot Governor of Pennsylvania. He ran on the platform of honesty and efficiency at Harrisburg and of dryness throughout the State, but his platform would never have carried him into the gubernatorial mansion if underneath it there had not marched the new quiet confidence felt in him by farmers and by trade unionists whose acquaintance he had sought and whose organized intentions he was known to have studied and known to be capable of understanding.

He is, in a sense, a farmer-labor governor. He goes against much of labor in being so dry. He enjoys being dry. Enforcing the Volstead law is with him a labor of love. He talks about it as his duty. Roosevelt used to talk about the duty of hunting wild animals for fear that otherwise they might overcrowd the earth; Pinchot hunts bootleggers for duty and pleasure both. If much of labor would rather be wet Pinchot nevertheless will always be dry, bone-dry, dust-dry; and the American Federation of Labor could make him President and then ask him for Heaven's sake to show one slender streak of humidity, it would not appear.

If people are going to make Gifford Pinchot President, they will have to take him, previously and subsequently, exactly as he is. He is sympathetic toward the toiler, whether on farm or in factory; he finds in the toiler an ally against his old enemies the capitalistic grabbers of the forests and ranges and mines and water-power of the public domain; he gives himself to public questions and will climb the ladder of public offices to the highest rung within his reach; he will spread his issues before the public with all the craft of the experienced manipulator of political publicity; he will denounce the political "machine" and create in some minds the illusion of his being a political amateur; he will all the time be an absolutely accomplished professional political player of the lone-hand type; and the sum of him personally and politically is a consistent sum. It is this: he is an inveterate public man whose technique of playing over the head of the "machine" to the "people" is just as competently and professionally managed as if he were playing directly to the "machine." Incurably a public man, he is also nevertheless incurably his own man; and in so far as he acquires political power in this country it will strictly technically resemble to the last line the political power now owned by Robert Marion La Follette. It will be an absolutely professional but absolutely personal possession.

Israel Zangwill

By JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

WHO is this Israel Zangwill?

In the two little libraries to which I have access there is one—and only one—book, "The Melting Pot," by the man. The English "Who's Who" furnishes a list of some twenty volumes; novels, plays, essays, sketches, stories, and verse. On the shelves of these libraries stand the works of Spinoza and Heine and Brandes, some in the original, some in translation, and the catalogues disclose commentaries, textbooks, and chapters on them scattered here and there.

Who is this Israel Zangwill?

If you accosted the Jews of my town with this request for information, you would listen to biographical details, true and imaginary, to opinions of truly oriental eloquence and exaggeration, to dissertations on Zionism, assimilation, Ito, Uganda, and other catchwords. But if you inquired concerning the three sages whom the Gentile world justly considers the glory of modern Israel, not one in ten, possibly not one in a hundred would recognize the names. Nor would the percentage be much greater if the names were exclusively contemporary. Neither Bergson nor Schnitzler nor even a Yiddish writer like Sholom Asch is known by the rank and file of Jewry. Indeed, there is no one, be he statesman or scientist, philosopher or financier, artist or soldier or physician, who can vie with Zangwill for a place in the hearts of his people.

Who then is Israel Zangwill?

Zangwill, the average Jew will tell you, is a great English writer who by virtue of his position has been able to render invaluable service to the Jewish race. It is the famous novelist and playwright whose aid Theodore Herzl seeks when he wishes to present the idea of Zionism, whom the Jews of Warsaw consult on the advisability of voting for certain candidates to the Russian Duma, into whose office Joseph Fels enters "unannounced and unheralded" with an offer of a hundred thousand dollars, and at whose request the American Jewish Congress, the most important Jewish organization in the world, changes its designated place of meeting from Baltimore to New York. And finally, it is Zangwill, "the foremost Jewish literary figure of his time," to quote the New York Evening Post, who is asked by this organization to awaken the conscience of mankind and the consciousness of Jewry to the problems the Jews are facing.

Now the irony of the situation—so completely crystallized in the solitary copy of "The Melting Pot" at our provincial libraries—lies in the fact that Mr. Zangwill is invariably ignored by critics of English drama and fiction, even while they solemnly study the piddling of Pinero, the baroque of Barrie, and the raucous novels that betray the teething of our youngest generation.

Yet I venture to say that the Jew-in-the-street is right and the critics are wrong. Zangwill's political activities, though they threaten to absorb, cannot shut out the artist any more than those of Paderewski and Lamartine. He is first of all an author, then Messiah or Devil's Advocate or what you will. More than that, Zangwill's work as much as any man's—I do not refer here to foreigners like Joseph Conrad or Hilaire Belloc who have miraculously acquired an astounding command of the language, but to Thomas Hardy, John Galsworthy, and Arnold Bennett—bears the unmistakable English stamp. England of the Ghetto? Yes. And of Essex too. The English of the King James's version? Yes. Also the precieux English of Oscar Wilde.

In fact, during those early days which might be called his pseudonymic period Zangwill as editor of Ariel and as the most successful practitioner of the "new humor" was even more responsible than his associate, Jerome K. Jerome, for the fantastic philosophy of topsy-turveydom that spiced English writing with the salt of sophistication so obviously lacking in the Victorian brew. The sketches that appeared as "The Bachelors' Club" and the "Old Maids' Club" carry on the tradition of Pistol and Pickwick. Yet at the time that "J. Freeman Bell" was writing these sketches, "Marshalik" was discussing with insight and detachment the position of the Jew, and satiric studies of Jewish life were appearing from the pen of "Baroness von S."

Luckily the Jewish Publication Society of America enabled Mr. Zangwill to achieve a synthesis of the humor, the wit, and the judgment—wit, said Locke, is chiefly conversant in tracing resemblances; the business of judgment is rather finding differences—displayed in these pieces by requesting him to write a novel of modern Jewish life. The result was "Children of the Ghetto."

Here he found his reputation and here lie the foundations of the critical fallacy. For "Children of the Ghetto" is not a Jewish book written in English but an English book about London Jews. It has more in common with a Wessex novel like "The Mayor of Casterbridge" than with a translated study of the New York Ghetto like "Uncle Moses." To be sure, when dealing with Jewish subjects Zangwill gives ample evidence that man unconsciously reacts to the genius of his mother-tongue. The characteristic Jewish cadences, the sing-song, and the involved iteration of the Talmudic dialectics are reproduced in the beat of his prose just as truly as in this intentional imitation from "The King of Schnorrers":

> For what? For two things in the very least. . . . In the first place . . . compensation for not eating the salmon myself. For it is not as if I offered it you—I merely intrusted it to you, and it is ordained in Exodus that if a man shall deliver unto his neighbor an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast to keep, then for every matter of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, the man shall receive double, and therefore you should pay me six guineas. And secondly . . .

But as the non-Jewish work has proved, Zangwill can change the very flow and inner rhythm of his writing to suit his subjects and scene. In "Jinny the Carrier" he boldly attempts—and succeeds—"to seize the essence of Essex."

I am not prepared to say that "Jinny the Carrier" is Zangwill's best novel but there can be no doubt that "Plaster Saints," the last "English" work to date, is his best play. Yet "Plaster Saints" is ignored and "The Melting Pot," his worst drama, is the piece that cemented his reputation. Verily the irony of inversion pursues him. "The Melting Pot" made a Zangwillian of every sentimentalist in America, from that apostle of romantic claptrap, Theodore Roosevelt, to so disillusioned a humanitarian as Jane Addams. This idealization of the United States as "God's Crucible" for the manufacture of the superman captured no one as much as himself, however, so that he who had opposed single-handed the "irreflective idealism" which made light of the difficulties of Zionism hymned hysterically the mirage of a Utopia.

Mr. Zangwill's last two plays, though they complete the trilogy begun by "The Melting Pot," are closer kin to "Plaster Saints." In one respect they differ from both. The scene is no longer laid in an existing land but in the imagined Voldania whose adventures as a militarist nation are told in "The Cockpit" and whose life under Communism is described in "The Forcing House," "ideal history which has not occurred literally, and yet is essentially a summary of historic realities." Otherwise, like "Plaster Saints," they are problem plays, broader in scope and better executed than most of this genre. These plays and "The War God," a tour de force in blank verse, make up the bulk of Mr. Zangwill's creative work since his last visit to America. The group would have been considered more respectfully a quarter of a century ago. During the Ibsen obsession a shock was "God's message to set what shocks you right" by writing a drama about it; today melodrama with a moral thesis is melodrama still.

But if these plays represent little growth in Zangwill the artist, they indicate most clearly the change in Zangwill the Jew. Fifteen years ago Mr. Zangwill's interest in the Jewish question was confined to the humanitarian desire to alleviate exiled Israel's tragedy and pain. As "The Melting Pot" showed, he favored assimilation as much as, if not more than, the establishment of an autonomous Jewish state, whether in Asia Minor or in Africa or in South America. Believing that the solution to the problem of the "Jewish trinity: patriot everywhere, Jew everywhere, anti-Semite everywhere," lay in the hands of the Jews, he addressed his prophetic fulminations solely to his own people.

Today all this is changed. As Blum declaims in "The War God":

> Had Christians handled us with Christliness,
> There would not be a single Jew in Europe.
> We should have melted in your love . . .

Such not being the case, Mr. Zangwill is disillusioned and militant. The world owes the Jew a hearing, he insists, and so Blum and Baron Gripstein are dragged into the alien plots of his plays, bearing out Mr. Lowenthal's contention that if a Jew were asked to write a treatise on the Great Auk, he would immediately publish a pamphlet entitled, "The Great Auk and the Jewish Problem."

In his volumes of essays, especially in "The Voice of Jerusalem," he sets down argumentatively what is illustrated in the dramas. Pitilessly, even quixotically, he analyzes the un-Christ-like conduct of the Christian peoples. And when he attacks the chutzpah, the "nerve," the iridescent impudence of assuming superiority to "the race that supplied Christendom and Islam with their religions, European art with its subjects, Western oratory with its phrases and images, socialism with its ideas, and America with its puritan foundations," his comparison of Jewish and Christian civilizations is not a paean to the "Rabbi-ridden folk" but a scathing condemnation of the latter.

Indeed, Mr. Zangwill, in general "a democrat with a profound mistrust of the people"—"the people's heart is sound, but its head is wood," says one character—is in particular contemptuous of contemporary Jewry, "clever as individuals, but as a people . . . rank below the Hottentots." "Mine is not in the racial sense anima naturaliter Judaica," he confesses. There lies the explanation of his humorless championship of Israel. He is interested in justice rather than in the Jew, and therefore he writes a running refutation of all taunts and libels the Jew is subject to, giving almost equal weight to each. He defends the Mosaic law from the attack of an anonymous contributor to the London Times, Samuel's prescription that Saul smite Amalek from the generalizations of Sir Charles Bruce, Shylock from Shakespeare, and so forth.

Now it is right and proper to have a Jew boldly challenge the anti-Semite. The question arises, however, whether Mr. Zangwill ought to devote his talents to pouring cold logic on the odorous embers of war propaganda. He who has seen the brilliant, limpid stream of Zangwill's creative genius turn murky through agitation can answer only in the negative.

Mr. Zangwill knows his Bible—none better—yet he does not profit by the lesson Elijah was taught at Mount Horeb; there are more then seven thousand in Israel who are equally jealous for the Lord and equally anxious to slay his enemies. But even were he left alone as champion of the Jewish people, his duty would lie elsewhere. That duty he owes to English letters. His contribution, though ignored, has already been generous and great. The struggle, the suffering, and the maturity which these last ten years have brought, have prepared him for greater achievement, an achievement in which we may see welded the peculiar genius of Englishman and Jew—the power and detachment of Shakespeare to express the wisdom of Solomon and the passion of Isaiah! To persist in his present course will but fit him to the epitaph he has written for another Jew, "That so much . . . time, which was not money but treasure for the race, should have been frittered away by the res angusta domi seems to me the real tragedy."

FLORIDA: The Desert and the Rose

By CLARA G. STILLMAN

A FLAT, sandy, sun-bathed plain sprinkled with a sparse monotony of pine, punctuated here and there with vague swamplands and thick, rich forests intricate with interlacings of hardwood, scrub, and vine, and jeweled with thousands of sparkling lakes, streams, and fountains—such is Florida, a paradise for invalids, sportsmen, and naturalists. To the east the far-flung coast line harbors still other waterways, great salt rivers and lakes formed by shallow sandbars and peninsulas lying parallel with the mainland. To the south stretches the vast region of the Everglades, eight thousand square miles of swamp and partly submerged prairie bristling with rapier-edged saw-grass eight feet high, a panoplied wilderness only recently penetrated by white men, through which Indians have traveled swiftly from time immemorial. The west coast, curving widely around the gulf, crumbles away at its southern end into the archipelago of the Ten Thousand Islands, a land of mystery, a labyrinth of woods, swamps, mud flats, beaches, bays, and fierce tidal rivers that has never been completely explored. Most of the southern shore, too, is a little-known wilderness. Florida preserves for us, though probably not for long, our last remnant of virgin soil.

No other State thrusts down into the Tropics. No other contains so many kinds of climate and soil, such an elongated and diversified coastline, such a widely distributed and easily tapped water supply, such varied luxuriance of native and naturalized vegetation. As a final unique gesture there are the Keys, that exotic flourish beyond the mainland's southern tip, of coral and limestone reefs and prickly island jungles, swept and sculptured into jagged grotesqueness by wild tropic tides, eternally being built up and dissolved away by wind and sea—remote repositories of curious and entrancing forms of life.

In 1513 came Ponce de Leon seeking the fabled island of Bimini, its fountain of youth and its mythical treasure far surpassing the known splendors of Mexico and Peru. Then for three hundred and fifty years the smiling region remained a wilderness, tossed from Spain to England, from England back to Spain, from Spain in part to France, finally from France and Spain to the United States. It became a territory distracted by Indian wars, then a State entering the Union only to secede a few months later, then a State once more, enfeebled by civil war and racked with war-born hatreds and maladjustments. In its history there has been little continuity or coherence. Of British and Spanish occupation hardly a trace persisted. During the Revolution the State was a base for loyalist plots. Seven thousand Tories fled there. The wilderness beyond the frontier became a refuge for fugitive slaves and other outlaws. To the more accessible regions there was a trickle of immigration from the North, from Alabama and Georgia, mainly a low grade of white squatter, but conditions were not such as to attract wealth or culture. Such germs of social life and refinement as existed at all were concentrated in the great cotton plantations and the few small towns in the north. Here were some magnificent homes and such wealth and fashion as the State could boast. The least-developed territory admitted to statehood, Florida was at the outbreak of the Civil War the poorest of the Southern States, with the fewest towns, plantations, and slaves. It had no social, political, or religious traditions such as went to the founding of Massachusetts, Maryland, Virginia, or South Carolina, and no homogeneous group of citizens bound by common ideals to develop it in any particular direction. Immigration for the culture of oranges and the taking up of land for homes began seriously about 1870. In the eighties were discovered the great potash fields of the southwest. And long before that St. Augustine and the St. Johns River had been centers of winter travel.

But it was in the nineties, with the beginning of the great railway systems, the East Coast of which Henry M. Flagler was the presiding genius, and the Atlantic Coast Line carried down to Tampa by Henry B. Plant, that Florida's history as a modern State actually began. As they pushed south the railroad companies built the huge, elaborate hotels so well known to all tourists, at least from the outside, which were to be the last word in comfort, elegance, and expense. Plant died before completing all that he had planned, but the Flagler system pushed on, passing beyond the last small pioneer settlements to tame wildernesses and plant palaces in lonely deserts and jungles. Palm Beach arose to snatch from St. Augustine its social eminence as the Winter Newport. By 1896 the railroad had reached Miami, dropped another hotel into the wilds, and proceeded on its way to perform one of the most appealing of modern engineering feats—the Overseas Route that joins Key West and the intervening keys to the mainland, snaring wild islands and binding turbulent seas with concrete and steel, and stopping finally only because there were no more keys to conquer.

Now began a period of sensational economic development. Tourists overran the State. East coast, west coast, and center sprouted resorts like mushrooms. A thousand and one agencies sprang up to cater to their needs. A huge floating population of invalids and pleasure-seekers that had to be housed, fed, clothed, doctored, nursed, entertained. A secondary throng of floaters arriving to help serve the first. A great stock-taking and overhauling of regional resources. A hectic competition of road-building and developing schemes. Great swamp areas drained and turned into fertile farm and fruit lands. The most ambitious of these projects, the draining of the Everglades, has been going on for some eighteen years, and is not yet completed. While tourists continued to be enthusiastically cultivated, settlers and investors were and still are a greater need. For in spite of the large volume of immigration from other States, there are still only 17.7 inhabitants to the square mile, and planned improvements are constantly outstripping taxes and bond issues. Hence an endless, vociferous campaign of real-estate enterprise, of building and boosting, of speculations and bonuses and invitations to free trips with luncheons and eloquence thrown in.

Perhaps because of an inferiority complex due to her long history of frustration and her lack of traditions, Florida has suddenly discovered an unlimited pride and faith in herself, an enormous appetite for wealth and power. Her climate is unrivaled, her soil unsurpassed. She can produce three crops a year and some that can be grown nowhere else in the country. To her long list of products and manufactures—fish, sponges, cigars, lumber, turpentine, potash, tobacco, citrus fruits, peaches, pineapples, potatoes, tomatoes and other vegetables, sugar and forage grasses—items are constantly being added. For her growing commerce she is busily deepening harbors. Nothing less than everything that any other States has, with a few slight exceptions such as mountains and glaciers, and as many things as possible that other States have not is her economic ideal. A great world playground. But this is not enough. A great agricultural commonwealth unrivaled in the quantity, quality, and variety of its products. But this is not enough. A great focus of world trade with opulent cities strewn along its splendid coasts, cities that shall combine 100 per cent industrialism with 100 per cent American home atmosphere and 100 per cent opportunities for luxury and pleasure. If anything has been omitted let the reader supply it and be sure that Florida includes that too in her vision of greatness.

Material greatness, of course. For Florida, mixture of infant prodigy, spoiled prima donna, and nouveau riche, has the engaging and disheartening qualities of all three. Forced into adult ways beyond her years, what wonder that she frequently lapses into corners to play with dolls or make faces, what wonder that like the slattern beautiful only for company she decks herself gorgeously according to her lights, in her tourist centers and rich agricultural regions, with wastes of slovenly, burned-out, swamp-gutted rural destitution and decay between. Nothing can exceed the forlornness of some of her aspects, with windowless cabins and crazy lean-tos in the midst of a sandy waste containing a few stricken pines, anemically sharing a bog with weedy, undaunted razorbacks and discouraged cattle mournfully nosing among inhospitable cypress roots. Then there are Florida's beautiful schoolhouses—for her white children—which she has scattered about with a prodigal hand. Only the best is to be good enough for them. And naively to her the best is always something to be seen, touched, and financially rated. But school terms are short, teachers few and poor, and money for their salaries not always forthcoming. Here is the antithesis of the little red schoolhouse of New England tradition with its meager equipment dedicated to high purposes.

Nothing distinguished has yet emerged from Florida, whether in statesmanship, scholarship, letters, or arts, and whatever comes in the future will have to struggle through a pall of American provincialism, economic ruthlessness, and Protestant obscurantism. Florida took William Jennings Bryan to her bosom with the instant mutual recognition that they were made for each other. But Florida is a melting-pot of all the States. So what one finds there is after all not only typically Southern but a composite of small-town and rural Americanism with an infusion of pioneer crudeness and youthful bumptiousness. The States and sections of the country are, however, not equally represented. The Southern cracker type still rules in politics, which are narrowly local and unprogressive. Florida, after years of agitation, still retains the antiquated open range for cattle, still finds in abuse of the Negro the master key to political office, and would still be farming her county prisoners to the highest bidder had not recent sensational disclosures, made by another State, of the murderous brutalities practiced upon her unhappy convict slaves forced her only a few months ago to abolish the lash and sweep the leasing system out of existence.

There are in fact many Floridas within the boundaries of the State, and some of them know little of some of the others. There is, for instance, the proposed political division along geographical lines which frequently comes up for discussion. The northern part of the State was settled long before the rest, the center is but of yesterday, the south barely of today and partly of tomorrow. United only in their common jealousy of California, whose minutest blizzard, seismic tremor, or other liability or peccadillo are enthusiastically featured on every Florida newspaper's front page, these parts are jealous of each other. The north has the State capitol and all the public institutions. In 1885, when the present constitution was established, representation was according to population which was much denser in the northern counties, and no change in the ratio has since been made in spite of strenuous efforts of the southern counties to bring it about. In the last twenty-five years the increase in population in the southern half of the State and in its political and economic consciousness has been phenomenal. South Florida feels that it is different, unique indeed among all parts of the Union in climate, aspect, agricultural and structural possibilities. It is developing a regional self-consciousness and dreams of a regional culture. So one hears talk sometimes of a separation into two States—North and South Florida—and even into three—part of northwestern Florida to become part of Alabama so that Alabama may have a larger access to the sea and the north gulf coast a better representation.

The jealousies of Florida, however, exist not only between north and south but between east and west coast and individual resorts in the same or different regions. Miami and Jupiter "merely cling to the outer skirts of Palm Beach," a booklet informs us, which compares Palm Beach to Egypt, Venice, Honolulu, Algiers, Mandalay, Constantinople, Greece, and Mecca, "the Mecca of the pilgrim with his face turned toward Society, and perhaps praying equally as fervently as his Bedouin brother," a Mecca, moreover, to which one does not merely travel in a Pullman but makes "a journey of de luxe idealism." But tourist Florida is not all extravagance and fashion. It may be a small room with a kitchenette in which a Northern farm couple are passing a thrifty and comfortable winter. One sees them mainly in the center and on the west coast—for the east goes after bigger game—but actually they are everywhere, strong, ungainly, weather- and work-worn, or cadaverous and pale, sitting about on park benches, pitching horseshoes in shirt sleeves, or forcing huge fists to guide treacherous pens over the gay stationery provided by paternal boards of trade. They are from Vermont, New Hampshire, Iowa, Michigan, Kansas, from everywhere where farmers in winter sit by the stove behind the snowdrifts. They have found a better way to wait for planting time. "Like it? Wall, I guess I do. Four feet o' snow to hum," and they smile, crinkling little red eyes, sharing with you the picture and the subjective shiver in the rosy well-being of sun-warmed blood and appeased "rheumatics." Yes, they'd like fust rate to settle if they was twenty years younger. "But there 'tis. Ma 'n' me's too old to start fresh." Sometimes they do settle, fail wretchedly, and are fortunate if they can return to their frost-bound Northern haven. Sometimes with efficiency and luck they reap a golden harvest in spite of the real-estate man. For these and for the many others who need the sun Florida is all golden.

Then there is the naturalists' Florida, far different from that of the railroad folder and the realtor's snappy blurb, unimproved, unmanicured, devoid of sleekness and comfort, full of hardship, danger, adventure, and beauty, now being pushed ever farther south and fast disappearing. The stories of these men are hidden from the public gaze in the journals of museums and scientific societies. Only one that I know of, Charles Torrey Simpson, a veteran explorer of thirty years' standing, has emerged into the open with a delightful book, "In Lower Florida Wilds," which is at once a paean to the wild life he knows so well and a protest against its passing. Through its pages one may come to see in the vanishing tropic and semi-tropic forests, the rich, wild hammocks, Florida's unique treasure, whose like is not in any other State, and will soon be little more than a memory in this. His is a voice crying for the wilderness fast turning into tomato farms, pineapple fields, and cocoanut groves, and with him one learns to mourn the departing mangrove, most human of trees, whose primitive methods of land building are giving way before the concrete sea-wall, the dredge, and the suction pump; the flamingo, the roseate spoonbill, the gentle, colorful race of tree snails, and other wild things that die in the presence of civilized man.

Still another Florida, least known of any, through which most travelers and natives walk blindfolded or upon which they bestow the cursory attention and facile generalizations of the "car-window sociologist." This is the colored man's Florida which differs more from all the other Floridas than they do from each other. What does Florida mean to its Negro inhabitants? It is "the best of the bad States," one will tell you. On the whole it used to be better before there were so many people and so much competition. Of course this means some increase in economic opportunity, but also increased discrimination and bitterness. In Miami, the wonder city, pride of South Florida, where some of its citizens dream a new culture is to be born, we have this extraordinary situation, extraordinary even for the South: a curfew regulation. No Negro except those needed as night bell boys, porters, and the like by hotels, allowed out of the colored section of the city after 9 p.m. No Negroes permitted to act as public chauffeurs, or, in the winters at least, in any but unskilled jobs connected with building. In winter, when building is at a standstill in the North, northern workmen, "snow birds" or "white doves" in Negro parlance, flock south. Work must be found for the white doves, so out go the blackbirds. It is hardly within the power of any builder to retain his colored workmen, even if he wishes to. Pressure is too strong. In summer when pressure relaxes one may find Negro workmen again on the job, but the uncertainty and seasonal character of the work discourage them, as it is intended they shall. Miami is proud of its "solution" of the race problem. They "keep them down" and "You must hand it to the Southerners," remarks many an admiring Yankee, "they know how to treat the niggers." Odd this, for Miami is anywhere from 75 to 85 per cent Northern. What becomes, then, of the pleasant myth that the presence of so many Northerners in Florida has perceptibly lightened the Negro's lot? It continues to be a pleasant myth.

Miami is of course the extreme. As everywhere in the South the Negro's condition varies greatly in various sections. Places are "good" and "bad" from the Negro point of view, and it is not always easy to know why some should be one and some the other. Thus Miami is bad, Tampa is good. St. Augustine is good, Jacksonville less so. In the northwest there is a certain amount of peonage—white peons as well as black, caught in the net of tenant farming with all its attendant evils in remote rural districts where conditions are always at their worst. If the white schools throughout the State are poorly developed except architecturally, colored schools have not even architecture to boast of. Brick buildings are rare and matter for some pride. In all the State there is not a single standard colored high school. In all South Florida there is only one high school, so called, for colored children, the one at Tampa, which shares a somewhat down-at-heel brick building outside the city limits and its principal with a grammar school. The equipment for this school did not include chairs. The money for these was recently raised by colored citizens. They still have no desks for some classes. They have themselves put in electricity, so they can use the building for evening meetings. Chemistry is in the curriculum, but it has to be taught theoretically because there is no apparatus. School terms are everywhere shorter than those of the white schools, which are themselves in some cases shorter than they should be. There are several counties that have no colored schools at all. The Florida Agricultural and Mechanical College, the State College for Negroes at Tallahassee has a Carnegie library, and at Jacksonville there is a Negro reading room in the Public Library building containing some eight thousand volumes, which cannot grow because there is no budget for its expansion. This is the only public library provision for Negroes in the State.

The colored public school system is supplemented by several large educational institutions supported by denominational and individual contributions. These schools are the soil for a certain timid and delicate growth of optimism that is beginning to raise a somewhat paradoxical head among Florida Negroes. It consists of the feeling that although racial conditions are growing worse, they are also growing better. Violence and lesser forms of oppression have of late years increased, but there is also an increasing number of Negroes technically and intellectually equipped to improve the primitive social conditions under which most of the race lives. There is the rising financial status and the growing spirit of racial responsibility and self-help, so much needed, which is fostered by these schools. If increased education and prosperity sometimes bring with them an increase of persecution, this is to be faced and overcome with still further progress.

Taking it all in all, Florida is physically and spiritually both the desert and the rose, and, strangely, when it appears to be one it often turns out to be the other. Its gray sands and malarial swamps are potential treasure houses of fertility and health; its bustling surface life, its expansive self-satisfaction hide a profound mental and spiritual sterility. There is no reason why we should expect it to be different from other States. Fine climates do not necessarily make fine peoples, and the best States in the world, like the most beautiful woman of the French proverb, can give only what they have.

Railroads and the Mechanics of Social Power

By AMOS PINCHOT

III. The Pools of Power

(This is the last of three articles which explain how the control of transportation by a unified group has resulted in its domination of the politics and culture of America.)

POWER is the chief desire of men. From the earliest times, it has been their principal preoccupation. It is strange, therefore, that, in a world whose history has been the story of a continuous race between individuals, classes, and nations for the possession of power, we should take so little pains to inquire into its nature.

In the last thirty years we have watched the balance of power gradually shift from the hands of the public into those of an industro-financial hierarchy composed of a few hundred persons, representing our trusts, railroads, banks, and insurance companies. And, while these persons are neither better nor worse, nor more intelligent or stupid than the rest of us, they are, nevertheless, for the most part, narrow men, mainly specialists in money making, and actuated by a rather unreflecting instinct of acquisition. For this reason, we cannot accept their control of the country as either inevitable or beneficial. To change this control, to relocate power, is the paramount problem of the people of the United States.

In the last two articles we have seen that, despite much propaganda to the contrary, we are justified in expecting that the railroads will be better run under the government than they have been in private hands. We have also seen that there is another and more vital line of argument for government ownership; to wit, that private railroading provides our industro-financial inner group with a powerful weapon which it uses effectively in destroying competition and putting the major basic industries on a monopoly basis, with the result that the consumer is robbed, the opportunity of independent capital curtailed, Sumner's "equal chance" wiped out in the larger industrial fields, and vast reserves of wealth, well in excess of what is necessary to conduct business and pay generous dividends, are concentrated in the hands of a very few people. In this article I will outline how this concentrated wealth, which is but another name for concentrated power, shapes education, public opinion, and politics, and through them controls conditions and events.

As things stand now, it seems almost a sheer waste of time for liberals to go on fighting for the various superficial reforms which seem to occupy their attention. With the dominant power in the hands of the industro-financial interests, nothing goes through without these interests' consent. If, by a lucky chance, the liberals succeed in putting a progressive measure on the statute books, it is usually reversed, or turned against them, as was the recall, for instance. If they elect a candidate to Congress, he is generally defeated at the next election. Should he be returned, he finds himself pocketed in a group of vociferous but powerless protesters. Some time, somehow, the liberals of America must unite their forces, now engaged in a hundred separate little wars against the effects and abuses of concentrated power, and make a concerted attack upon the power itself. If they do not, they may as well acknowledge the defeat, not only of liberalism, but of democratic government as well.

How and by what power the United States is today controlled may be shown by a few commonplace examples from the writer's experience—examples which any person who has looked behind the scenes of politics and business can easily duplicate.

During the war, I presented to a member of the legislative branch of the government a brief outlining a plan for raising revenue, modeled on that then in use in England. I was courteously received, and the legislator expressed the belief, first, that the plan had merit and would actually raise revenue; and, second, that there seemed no reason to fear it would work less well here than abroad. Later in the day I learned from reliable sources, one of them the legislator's close associate, that, though the legislator approved the plan, he could not present it to the appropriate committee owing to the absence of a man, not in public office but a friend of the legislator's, who had gone to California for a six weeks' trip. This friend headed an industrial monopoly that controlled the principal newspapers and the political machine in the legislator's State, and through them every nomination of importance; and the legislator felt that to approve, without his friend's consent, such a measure might jeopardize his chances of renomination.

As his colleague pointed out, the legislator was not a young man. He had been scrupulously honest in money matters and, after years of public service, found himself still dependent on a slender salary. No doubt, he would have preferred to tell the gentleman in California to go to the devil; but he was not in a position to raise the flag of revolt. On the whole, it would be unjust to criticize him. He was at once the beneficiary and the victim of a profitable monopoly that made more money than it needed to do business, and used a modest part of its surplus in purchases at strategic points. Besides, he could truthfully say that rebellion would be useless, since it would merely mean that the trust would nominate another legislator who might well prove less honest and public spirited than himself.

There are certainly not over a handful of senators at Washington who have not taken the proverbial King's shilling and been inducted into service in a manner similar to the foregoing. And you may generally measure the extent of their unfreedom by the eagerness with which they espouse unimportant reforms that at once satisfy their altruistic impulses and commit them to no action unwelcome to the interests they serve.

Not long ago a professor in good standing wrote me that in his university, one of the larger ones, no one could teach up-to-date economics, i.e., economics dealing with existing conditions, and feel comfortable in his chair. To be sure, he could instruct his students on the more classic aspects of economics, the theory of rent, the Ricardian acre, and the relation of gold production to prices. But, when it came to such subjects as the relation of railroads to monopoly, and the nature of the foundations of economic and political power, one ran into an area protected by an invisible but appreciable taboo. No professor, he said, would expect to be removed, whatever he might teach. Indeed, it was improbable that the trustees would quiz him on the content of his lectures. But a building, practical and very pleasing to the eye, had recently been erected by a family whose money came from a monopoly supported by illegal transportation differentials; and the trustees were not without hope of a similar building on another part of the campus. Under these circumstances, it would be in questionable taste for a professor to discuss the origins of the fund from which his college had profited, and might profit again.

A not unstriking instance of the power of surplus wealth, flowing from private railroading and monopoly, is found in the story of the Progressive Party. It will be remembered by some who were at Chicago in 1912 that Colonel Roosevelt did not decide to leave the Republican fold until two men rose from the conference table and, each putting a hand on his shoulder, said: "Colonel, we will see it through." One of these men was a director and ex-chairman of the finance committee of the Steel Corporation; the other, a large investor in steel securities and for years an editorial supporter of the trust.

These two men did see the party through, financially and otherwise. Incidentally, one of them, before printing and distributing its platform, cut out the anti-monopoly clauses framed by the resolutions committee and adopted by the party's convention. Likewise, as chairman of the executive committee, he carried on, through a deluge of pamphlets and a campaign newspaper, a nationwide propaganda defending the trusts, which was brought to a halt only after an acrimonious controversy focused in the Outlook office. It was he who, in 1916, when the Progressives gathered for their last stand, brought the message from Oyster Bay in which Mr. Roosevelt declined to accept the nomination, but requested that Senator Lodge of Massachusetts be nominated in his place. This virtually finished the Progressive Party, though life flickered in it for a time.

It would be absurd to blame Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Perkins or Mr. Munsey for such episodes. Mr. Roosevelt was essentially an administrator. He cared nothing about economics; they bored him inexpressibly. Accordingly, he took his views from advisers, and soon became convinced that any one who objected to monopolies, that is good monopolies, was trying to reduce the steel industry to the blacksmith shop and the railroad to the stage coach. Mr. Roosevelt did not realize that monopoly raises prices, thus reducing the demand for things and lowering the volume of production; while competition has precisely the opposite effect. Nor did he ever pause long enough to note that huge money accumulations are rarely created except through monopoly; or that, when some genius like Ford makes his millions in open competition, they do not constitute a menacing power; first, because they are scattered when the genius that creates them dies, whereas the wealth concentrations of monopoly go on forever; second, because, since Ford's profits are due to ability and not, as in the case of the trusts, to illegal privileges, he does not have to join with others in order to control public opinion, education, and government for purposes of self-protection. Mr. Perkins, of course, was a still stronger believer in monopoly and so was Mr. Munsey; and it was the most natural thing in the world that, when these two men saw a new party in the offing, led by a powerful personality, they should seek to guide it into what seemed to them useful channels.

Some years ago the editor of the then largest monthly magazine asked me to write an article on government ownership. I agreed and, after a few months, the article was finished and turned in. The editors were kind enough to express their satisfaction and went so far as to say that it was the most important economic article their magazine had printed. The article was set up and the magazine went to press, when a message arrived from the owner advising the editor that the article must not appear, no matter what it cost to break the plates. Immediately, the editor telephoned me, explaining that, though he would be glad to pay for it, he could not use my article, which dealt, among other things, with the relation between private railroading and the steel monopoly. The editor explained that the owner's father had been a close friend of Mr. Morgan, Sr. The owner himself was heavily interested in various monopolies.

If these examples have interest, it is because they tend to shed light on one of the more usual methods by which an industro-financial hierarchy exerts control in a nominally democratic state. In America, we have, of course, no such thing as tyranny in the sense of an individual, a group or class forcing the government to do things that the people do not want done. Yet the hierarchy's power is none the less compelling. With its accumulated wealth, it takes charge of the agencies that form public opinion, and with public opinion properly manipulated, it dictates the action of the various agencies of government, thus accomplishing an undemocratic end through a seemingly democratic procedure. And this process of control is generally so uniform and fixed in its progressions, that it might almost be stated as a formula as follows: Private railroading, through unfair or illegal discrimination, creates monopoly. Monopoly, through destruction of competition and control of prices, produces concentration of wealth or power in the hands of a small minority. And the minority, following a natural instinct of self-preservation, uses this power to protect the sources from which its wealth and ascendancy have sprung. Here we have a vicious circle that can only be broken into when the public understands its elements. And this brings us to the hardest part of the problem.

It must not be expected that government ownership of railroads will bring in the millennium. It will do nothing of the sort; there are other kinds of privilege besides transportation differentials. Nor alone will government ownership destroy plutocracy and restore democratic control in the United States. Yet, it should effect a long step in advance. For let us realize the following point very clearly: When government ownership comes, it will only be (a) after the public has seen the far-reaching reasons for it, such, for instance, as I have tried to outline in these articles, and (b) after it has elected a congressional majority that is of the public's mind.

Now, what sort of men will a successful campaign for government ownership bring into office? Obviously, not the proteges of the interests that flood Congress now; obviously, not the representatives of the railroads, trusts, banks, and insurance companies. On the contrary, they will consist of a quite different type, of more thoughtful and truly patriotic men, who have seen the defeat of democracy involved in industro-financial sovereignty; and who, understanding the mechanism by which this sovereignty establishes and perpetuates itself, have decided that the time is ripe for a direct attack upon it. With a Congress of this kind, liberal ideas will have a fair hearing; progress will no longer find itself eternally fighting against crushing odds. And above all, the public will be spared the humiliating sight of two historic parties going, hat in hand, to Wall Street to report, gather funds, and take orders.

But how is the government-ownership issue to be brought to the public? There seems but one practicable way: by getting men who understand the question to run for office, with government ownership as the one outstanding issue. The press, as we know, will not ordinarily carry articles on government ownership. Aside from the Hearst papers, there has been no powerful newspaper organization that has, so far, had the courage to come out uncompromisingly on the people's side of the railroad question. But the speeches of important candidates, running for Congress or higher office, in such hard-fought campaigns as government ownership will precipitate, fall into a quite different category from mere articles. They are current news and, whatever the paper's economic background, it has to publish them. The political campaign thus remains as an avenue of publicity. It is a sufficient avenue, provided men of ability can be found, who will stake their future on a real fighting issue.

In a national campaign for government ownership, only one issue should be put before the public—the acquisition of the railroads by the government. Experience has shown that the attention of a nation of a hundred millions cannot be concentrated on more than a single political idea at a time. The method of acquiring the roads, whether by purchase or exchanging private securities for government securities netting approximately the same return, should be left to the future. The method of managing the roads after they are acquired should be left to Congress. But one single line of argument should be followed at every political meeting in every State: the government should do nothing that private enterprise can do as well. This principle is at the foundation of America's vigorous individualistic life. Nevertheless, the government should take over the railroads, for the very reason that private railroading is destroying individualism in industry and building on its ruins a monopoly system that robs the consuming public, concentrates power in the hands of a few people, and controls, not wisely, this nation.

In the Driftway

PRIVACY has always seemed to the Drifter one of the seven jewels in the crown of wisdom, and at the moment he cannot think what the other six are. He has spent the better portion of his life declining with as much grace as possible invitations to gatherings of more than two persons besides himself. He has become thoroughly hardened in the matter of teas; he issued a blanket refusal of all such invitations seventeen years ago and the refusal still stands. Yet his job compels him to see people on occasion; and the exigencies of impecuniosity demand it even more frequently. Privacy costs money; crowded tenements are not inhabited by the rich, and Coney Island on a warm Sunday is more populous than Deauville.

* * * * *

FOR a good many years the Drifter had been convinced that no one, indeed, was rich enough to buy solitude. Even Mr. John D. Rockefeller, he thought, would have been hard put to it to purchase this pearl beyond price. But Mr. John D. Rockefeller's daughter has made a gesture in that direction which commands only the warmest admiration. When Mrs. McCormick built a brick wall and a wire fence around her estate on Lake Michigan the Drifter murmured "Bravo!" When she recently offered to pay $200,000 to make a new public highway a mile from the edge of her property because she could not bear to have the rabble passing so near her house—which is a mile from the present road—he turned slightly green with envy and gave up eating entirely because he could not cook his own meals well enough to justify dining by himself. But when he read that Mrs. McCormick had not stayed overnight in her house for nine years he threw up his hands in despair! There was evidently no mortal use in competing with such a princely outlay of funds and principle. To live in a house and wish to keep out crowds is one thing; but not to live in it, and still to be unable to endure the thought of crowds coming within a mile of it, is so far beyond any of the Drifter's aspiration that he has given up the contest.

* * * * *

ACCORDINGLY, he wishes to announce that hereafter he will be available for dinner three times a week and for tea every other day. When he is not dining out he will be willing to attend public lectures, concerts, and even —three times a month—a debate. Tickets for football games, wrestling contests, chess tournaments, horse races, performances of trained seals and diving Venuses will be received with pleasure and positively used in every case. If the Knights of Columbus give an amateur rendering of "Seven Keys to Baldpate" the Drifter will be found in the front row; if the Ku Klux Klan stages a rally in Madison Square Garden the Drifter will not be among the eleven New Yorkers who will not attend. No, nothing will be refused henceforth—and yet—nothing? No! He will not, he positively will not, even at the risk of staying home entirely alone, attend the recital of a child pianist at Carnegie Hall.

Why the Negro Emigrates

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have found your journal so impartial in the discussion of all questions appearing in its columns that I am impelled to ask you to permit me to discuss the exodus of the Negro from the South to the North, from a Negro's point of view. Many prominent Negroes, and most Southern white men, are meeting in inter-racial confabs trying to work out a plan to stop the Negroes from leaving the South, and to keep them tied to the cotton fields at seventy-five cents a day, and to the lumber camps at a dollar to a dollar and a quarter a day, but in spite of these meetings, and the many tears being shed by their leaders and their good white friends, the Negroes are leaving by the thousands. The real friends of the Negro, who have no personal ax to grind, are glad to see him use his own judgment in trying to better the condition of himself and his family.

He has struggled heroically in this section ever since his emancipation to make himself a man and a citizen, but today his chances for a fair deal are worse than at any other period of his history since the Civil War. What is the cause of these conditions? Nothing but prejudice and race hatred. He accumulates property to have it burned when his white friends become offended with him, or to have to leave it when they find they cannot beat him out of it.

We have watched the growth of prejudice, and the growing tendency to oppress the Negro and rob him of every privilege for years, but the wave of hatred well-nigh reached its climax at the end of the World War when our Southern friends had to see Negroes in the uniform of our country. The Negro became so contemptible in the eyes of the South that many hitherto good white citizens were afraid to be seen in friendly conversation with a Negro.

These are a few of the things that are causing the Negro to leave the South. He has learned that there are places where he can get decent wages for his labor; where his dollar is worth a hundred cents the same as anyone else's dollar; where, notwithstanding race prejudice, he has the right to vote and take a part in the government under which he lives; where he has some consideration before the courts, and is not convicted and then leased to some big corporation to swell the revenue of the State; where he does not see in each morning's paper in scarecrow headlines some crime committed by a "nigger," a "black," or a "Negress." The principal cause of the exodus is the Negro's determination to give the little black boys and girls a chance to prepare themselves for life's battles. The schools in this section would not educate a Negro child in a hundred years. If you leave the cities you will find the schools for Negro children running three to five months, with absolutely no equipment. I began a three months' term in a school where there are supposed to be approximately two hundred pupils, last week. The county superintendent told me that these people have not had a school before in four years and now he is giving them a three months' term. I asked for equipment for the school and he gave me a register. I asked for a blackboard and a few desks, and he refused to give anything.

We accepted the principalship of the school at a country site where the white citizens have a nice brick school building, and are preparing to erect a high-school building. The Negro school burned four years ago, the Board of Education collected the insurance, and have been using it to run the white schools ever since. I succeeded in raising two thousand dollars to build a Negro school; we have the promise of fifteen hundred dollars from the Rosenwald Fund, and have been trying to get the Board of Education to put in two thousand dollars and build the school for six months, but thus far they have not done anything. This is not an isolated case. Free education for Negroes is a thing of the past in this section. Negroes are heavy taxpayers in this country, but they get no consideration. These are the things that are driving the Negroes out of the South.

An American Sailor Speaks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am an American sailor traveling through Europe, looking for an American freighter to bring me back.

I happened to be in Rome the day that the funeral of the Italian officers assassinated in Janina took place. I cannot describe the splendor of it: there were dukes and princes and all kinds of nobles; a wonderful display of gold and decorations and all the magnificence of the military order. The best orators of the country eulogized the dead officers. They died for duty, martyrs to the cause of civilization; the whole world took notice of it and grieved for such a great loss, for a general was killed!

Now, gentlemen, just about a week before the great funeral in Rome, another took place in the Island of Corfu. There were over twenty coffins. No princes or dukes to follow them; no guns to give them the last salute; no one to take care of the bereaved families. Very little did the outside world hear about it. No one took their case before the League of Nations, for they were merely human beings. I am referring to the victims of the Italian bombardment. Tomorrow there will be statues in Rome proclaiming to the world that those officers died while serving civilization and liberty. But who will care enough to put a wooden cross on the grave of those poor refugees? I doubt if any will, for they wore no gold on their shoulders nor crown upon their caps.

That "American Dinner"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your "Drifter" may have drifted through New England, but obviously he drifted through the hotels. We don't eat hot bread at dinner. At supper—yes; and not even the South can match our johnny-cake, but we do not eat baking-powder biscuit at dinner.

Justice to Chicago

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Does the estimate of the character and significance of Chicago, embodied in the article on Illinois in The Nation for August 22, meet the elementary obligations of fairness and propriety? It rigidly suppresses recognition of every thing which to the intellectual and large-minded Chicagoan is a source of just pride; and grotesquely magnifies the relative place of every area of barbarism and materialism. There is not even mention of the University of Chicago nor of Northwestern University; nor of the generously endowed Newberry and Crerar libraries, the great Public Library, and the magnificent University Library which combine to make Chicago one of the great library centers of the country. The existence is ignored of any other newspaper than the Tribune, not even the News, whose book-review pages hold a foremost place among the literary sections of American newspapers. The Christian Century of Chicago is our ablest religious journal. Robert Collyer, David Swing, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, and Frank Gunsaulus were among the great voices of the American pulpit. The miraculous White City, a revelation of intelligent public spirit and beauty on the grand scale, unexampled in America, belongs to 1893, only 30 years ago, but is not remembered. The wonderful Art Institute—for it is wonderful considering its youth—with its great art school is only the most conspicuous expression of Chicago's care for beauty. The St. Gaudens's Lincoln in Lincoln Park is the finest portrait statue in America.

The wonderful Chicago park system is rapidly encircling the entire city, but no one learns it from this article; nor does one learn how the dismal, old railroad stations are being supplanted by spacious modern terminals of commanding beauty and convenience; nor of the ambitious plans of Mr. Burnham and his associates, the most ambitious yet broached among American municipalities for the complete reconstruction of the city plan. The continuous support of grand opera, impossible in Boston and Philadelphia, is mentioned only with derogation. There is no notice of the great work of Jane Addams and Hull House, the most important and influential of all American social settlements, honored the world over; and so of a score of noble works to which a lover of humanity does not like to be compelled to refer. I am not a Chicagoan with wounded local patriotism. I am an American who loves fair play.

The Kuzbas Indictments

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to correct a possible misunderstanding of your paragraph in The Nation for October 10 dealing with the prosecution of the Kuzbas Organization Committee. You state that all but two of the series of indictments have been dismissed. There were five indictments issued against each of the committee originally. All of these indictments against each individual have been dismissed, except in the case of P. Pascal Cosgrove. In his case the judge dismissed three cases and declined to dismiss two cases. As you say, we will be fortunate if we are able to bring the case of Mr. Cosgrove to trial.

Understanding Mexico

The Social Revolution in Mexico. By Edward Alsworth Ross. The Century Company. $1.75.

President Obregon—A World Reformer. By E. J. Dillon. Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

The Mexican Nation—A History. By Herbert Ingram Priestley. The Macmillan Company. $4.

A SCORE of books about Mexico have been published in the United States since the fall of Porfirio Diaz. Mr. Ross's is the first to give a fair idea of the nature of the social changes that are transforming our southern neighbor. For one thing he chose the earliest opportunity to make such an estimate. He visited Mexico in the summer of 1922, two years after the accession to the interim presidency of Adolfo de la Huerta, when the revolution was showing some fulfilment. Mr. Ross rightly forestalls too searching criticism by confessing the limitations of his book: he spent just eleven weeks in Mexico, but was prepared by reading, by previous travel in South America, and by his experience as a sociologist and investigator. A remarkably graphic and faithful painting of the Mexican scene and its people is followed by chapters on politics, agrarian reform, the labor movement, the church, and education. The chapters on labor and land touch the quick of these essential elements in the Mexican revolution, penetrating the fog-banks of misconception and misrepresentation. "Small-bore business men," he comments, "shriek that the Mexican labor movement is led by puppets on wires pulled by Moscow. The truth is that it is well-nigh as indigenous as the cactus or the maguey. It responds not to foreign impulsions but to the situations and needs of the Mexican working class." And the land distribution he rightly calls "one of the biggest economic reforms of our time. . . . When . . . completed, it will take rank as one of the giant agrarian adjustments of history." As far as it goes his diagnosis of the "sickness of Mexico" is shrewd and discriminating. To those "who cackle 'bolshevism'" he retorts, "what confronts us in Mexico is not dictatorship of the proletariat but our old disreputable friend Democracy."

The other chapters are less illuminating. Inevitably in so short a visit Mr. Ross had to depend on hearsay and second-hand information. And nowhere are there more undercurrents and cross-drifts than in Mexican politics. The chapter on the church would be strengthened by specific instances from the conflict between the clericals and the government. The weakest essay in the book is that on education. The entirely explainable shortcomings of the present administration in this field loom to Mr. Ross out of proportion to its very considerable accomplishments. Had he visited the country a year later he might have written differently. As it is, not only this chapter but the book misses the spiritual renaissance, the artistic revival, and the cultural reemergence which center about the extensive educational campaign of José Vasconcelos and the intensive labor in anthropology and education of Manuel Gamio.

It is in this respect and its implications that Mr. Ross's book is inadequate. To compensate for the brevity of his sojourn he had to fill in the picture around a series of preconceptions. The essence of the new Mexico cannot be wholly extracted thus. Mr. Ross's subjectivity based on a vast experience in social phenomena apparently led him to miss those currents for which there is relatively little parallel or analogy today. Starting with a conviction of a proved racial inferiority as measured by a few American-made intelligence tests he forms his judgments in the terms and coinage of our own civilization. Nothing, he says, would so quickly clear away some of the country's false valuations and ideals "as a large immigration of bona-fide American farmers." Doubtless. And it is current among many Americans in Mexico that what the country needs is "to be dipped in the sea for half an hour," and among Spaniards that "Mexico's one misfortune is that Cortez didn't exterminate the natives the way you people did your Indians." And elsewhere Mr. Ross asserts: "Since Mexico is an undeveloped country in need of a continuous inflow of foreign capital, the flirting with policies which alarm foreign capitalists is economically suicidal." But is it? The quintessence of non-alarm for foreign capitalists was achieved by the Diaz Government. A regime which satisfies them 100 per cent will certainly be spiritually suicidal for the Mexican people and not economically beneficial in the long run.

Yet despite its sketchiness, a few minor errors of fact, and an occasional contradiction Mr. Ross's treatise is to date the best book on present-day Mexico in our language.

The central figure in Mexican reconstruction is Alvaro Obregon. Mr. Dillon's book is a biography which gives an unqualifiedly sympathetic and uncritical estimate of the rise of this patriot, into which is necessarily woven not a little that is new and interesting to Americans about the tragic nine years' struggle from which his country is beginning to emerge. "President Obregon—A World Reformer" concludes with some chapters on American imperialism which make the book in form somewhat of a repetition of the writer's previously published "Mexico on the Verge." These chapters are accurate. They are related to Mexico's problems, and the reiteration of these much-concealed facts is a service to the United States, where less is known about them than anywhere else on earth. Nevertheless one cannot help wishing that Mr. Dillon's past writings had given some evidence of opposition to his own country's imperialism. The discriminating note which made "The Inside of the Peace Conference" so helpful in following European events of its time is lacking in his latest evaluation of progress south of the Rio Grande. This is a pity. His half-century's study of world affairs coupled with his intimate acquaintance with Mexico would make his views if expressed without inhibition most valuable to the understanding of present-day Mexico.

For real understanding historical perspective is essential—more so in the case of Mexico than of almost any other country. Mr. Priestley's scholarly "The Mexican Nation—A History," the product of profound research, gives us the clearest record yet published in this country. Its judgments are carefully arrived at and the disparate views of other historians impartially weighed. The history is essentially political. The reigns and accomplishments of each of the threescore Spanish viceroys are detailed as are those of the various presidents, some of whose terms lasted but a few days or hours. The relatively slighter emphasis on social developments becomes more noticeable in the chronicling of the last half century. Especially, in view of Mexico's recent chaos, would more light on the factors that overthrew the Diaz regime seem desirable. As it is, one gathers that Diaz's fall was due to his having outworn his popularity by overplaying the game of self-perpetuation in office. There is but the most casual mention of the cruelty and oppression which ultimately brought about the revolution of 1911 and the subsequent turmoil. Such episodes as the massacre of workers in the Rio Blanco textile mills, or the engulfment of Indian villages by the Porfirist land-grabbers are omitted. There is mention of the great prosperity brought about by modern industrialism but nothing of its abuses and of its special effects on the peculiar conditions it encountered in Mexico. One misses also references to the still considerable part played by the church after the reform laws of Juarez. The final chapters dealing with Mexico since Diaz's fall appear to lack the authority and careful research that characterize the history up to that point and are presumably included to bring the book up to date rather than to express a final judgment. A second edition in which the chapters dealing with Diaz and after are expanded to bring them into consonance with the questions that are agitating the third decade of the twentieth century will add considerably to the value of this otherwise excellent work.

How to Make Wages Go Up

The Control of Wages. By Walton Hamilton and Stacy May. George H. Doran Company. (The Workers' Bookshelf.) $1.50.

MOST economists think that wages are fixed by God, though they call it His natural law, or productivity, or something of that sort. Most business men, when they think about the question at all, think the same thing. Messrs. Hamilton and May, on the other hand, think that wages are fixed by men, and that men can raise them if they go about it intelligently. They think that the trade unions are likely to raise them very little by the methods hitherto followed, and they have written an extraordinarily suggestive little book for the express purpose of pointing out to the unions possible sources of future wage increases and possible methods of realizing such increases. This is a new sort of wage theory. Old-school economists will probably denounce it as no theory at all, but thoughtful workers are likely to declare it not only more interesting, but vastly more useful to them, than the older speculations. If the sober and godly excoriate the authors for their frank attempt to put tools (they can scarcely be called weapons) into the hands of the unions, the "ists" of all sorts are no less certain to damn them for their sturdy rejection of every scheme of salvation by formula. It is a hard job to think, and most people would rather denounce seventy times seven than to think once, not to speak of thinking all the time.

The authors hold a highly dynamic wage theory. Denying the existence of a "rate of wages" or even of wage levels in the sense of determinate unchangeable standards, they maintain that every one of the myriad wage rates existing at any given time rests upon "many and varied pecuniary, industrial, and economic factors" of a changeable character. By taking thought for the morrow, workers through their organizations can continuously and cumulatively raise wages, but such a result must be accomplished by intelligent understanding and conscious control of the economic order. There are three possible sources of wage increase: (1) Money wages may be raised (a) through changes in distribution (trenching on interest, rents, or profits); (b) through technical improvements in production (better labor, management, or machinery); (c) through changes in the organization of industry. (2) The price of the goods and services that the laborer buys may be lowered. (3) The laborer's free income (free services of all sorts performed by the industrial corporation or the state) may be increased. In the past, unions have tried chiefly to raise wages at the expense of other incomes, a narrow and relatively barren form of effort. The gains that are possible by the other four methods above suggested are vastly more important, and an intelligent unionism will address itself to seeing that they go to swell wages instead of being diverted to other uses. For in this lively theory there is no inexorable economic law that fatally allocates the fruit of new productive power to this or that "economic agent." Men forever are in control, acting of course through the institutions they have developed, and there is no escape from the endless task of deciding who shall get what.

All this, of course, is in the sharpest contradiction to absolute theories of all sorts, orthodox and heterodox alike. Conventional economic opinion, in conformity with ordinary business opinion, has always assumed that wages and the other shares in distribution are more or less inexorably determined by "economic laws" beyond human control. If the laborer therefore asked what he could do about it, orthodox theory grimly replied: "Nothing, except limit your numbers" (in the days of the wage fund), or "except work and save" (in these more urbane modern days of productivity). Not so these cheerful theorists, who declare that economic laws are nothing more than the total workings of an institutional complex every one of whose elements is under human control: "Are your wages too low? Very well; what are you going to do about it? You can do this and this and this, with the probability of such and such results, but only if you know enough and act intelligently enough." Truly this is a rattling of the dry bones in the desolate valley of economic theory.

Though this is essentially a book of economic theory, its whole purpose is directly and eminently practical—which is to say that it has the first requisite of good theory. Offering no panacea, it is yet full of suggestions, not only of what to do, but of how to do it. One of the most interesting, both theoretically and practically, is the proposal for the "liquidation of ownership" by the device of buying out investments at their market value with a series of annuities running half a century. The plan is so simple and practicable that of course it will not be adopted; we greatly prefer to pay interest charges forever. Probably a no less unhappy fate awaits this whole stirring appeal to the workers to take control of wages. Yet even a hardened economist cannot forbear wishing the book a happier destiny.

By One of the Marchers

Marching On. By Ray Strachey. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

I HAVE been asked to review Ray Strachey's "Marching On" as one who was born in the midst of two of the great reform movements, anti-slavery and women's rights, which provide the unusual setting for this novel. The author declares that for the first part of her story, which is a vivid portrayal of the misery that always accompanies pioneer life, especially for women, she is indebted to the famous suffragist, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw. It is quite natural, therefore, that the second part of this most interesting historical novel should be devoted largely to the question of the right of women to higher education, followed, as a matter of course, by a plea for women's human right to the ballot. This section of the book seems to me to be less forcible in the presentation of its theme because for some reason the author chose to use a fictitious name for one of the Grimké sisters (Sarah and Angelina). It was the latter, not Sarah, who was married. These remarkable women really started the ball of the suffrage movement. When in 1837 the churches refused to allow them to speak from their pulpits on the horrors of slavery, their audiences having overflowed the limits of drawing-rooms, they appealed to the leader of the Abolitionists to be allowed to speak on the burning question of slavery on the same platform with men. He gladly welcomed them and gave them the desired opportunity, losing many of his small number of adherents in consequence. When remonstrances came he said: "I owe a greater duty to the women who are half the human race than I do to the slaves who are happily only a small portion of it, and I must be true to both."

Mrs. Strachey's delineation, admirable as it is, of the hardships undergone by the pioneer suffrage lecturers, for whom the door had been opened by the Abolition movement, does not begin to express what those women actually had to endure.

The novel gives in the main a true picture of some of the prominent Abolitionists, among them Frederick Douglass, whose imposing stature and oratorical gifts helped mightily to obtain freedom for his colored brothers and sisters. Mrs. Strachey also fittingly represents the impassioned eloquence of the former slave, Sojourner Truth, Mrs. Stowe's "Lybian Sibyl," and recounts the story of an anti-slavery meeting at which Frederick Douglass was giving way to despair when she dispelled the gloom that was settling over the meeting by asking in thrilling tones, "Frederick, is God dead?"

I became absolutely absorbed in the third part of the story which is devoted to "Bleeding Kansas" and the great conflict raging on its soil between the opponents of the extension of slavery and the Southerners who were determined to secure a safe foothold for the slave system. How this truthful narrative of that extraordinary character, John Brown, may affect present-day readers I know not, but to one who lived through that period it is perhaps the most exciting part of the book. As a non-resistant firmly convinced that human life should be held sacred and inviolable under all circumstances, I could have wished that the spiritual power of John Brown, disarmed and in prison, a martyr to his convictions, at last realizing the futility and the wickedness of shedding human blood for any cause whatever, could have been the climax of the story.

Louise Bogan

Body of This Death. Poems. By Louise Bogan. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.50.

IT is impossible to say what these twenty-seven poems are, and it would be difficult to say what they are like. The temptation is to speak of them only in images, for they are not susceptible to paraphrase; they take effect directly upon the imagination. One thing about them, however, seems plainly, prosaically sure. The thirty pages which they cover are packed as tightly with pure poetry as any thirty pages have been for a generation. The poet would be rare at any time who could achieve so much concentration and so unquestionably sustain it. Practically every one of these bare, stricken lines is suggestive of riches; the words dig deep, bringing up odors of earth and life that will live a long time in the memory. There is no rhetoric—hardly a phrase could be reduced by a word—but there is the sheer eloquence of passion; there is no tunefulness, but there is music "from music's root," "a fine noise of riven things."

Under a diversity of forms Miss Bogan has expressed herself with an almost awful singleness. Again, however, it is impossible to say what it is she has said; again one must resort to an image—or to her images. One can be certain that experience of some ultimate sort is behind this writing, that something has been gone through with entirely and intensely, leaving the desolation of a field swept once for all by fire. But the desolation is not vacancy or lassitude. The charred grass is brilliantly black, and the scarred ground is fascinating in its deformity. There still is life, hidden and bitterly urgent.

> "I burned my life, that I might find
> A passion wholly of the mind,
> Thought divorced from eye and bone,
> Ecstasy come to breath alone.
> I broke my life, to seek relief
> From the flawed light of love and grief.
> "With mounting beat the utter fire
> Charred existence and desire.
> It died low, ceased its sudden thresh.
> I had found unmysterious flesh—
> Not the mind's avid substance—still > Passionate beyond the will."

This poem alone would establish Miss Bogan's excellence in her art. There are twenty-six others, all of which ought to be read. There is A Tale, for instance, which says all that can be said on the subject of mutability, and says it in strains of music at once ancient and weirdly new. There is Medusa, with its perfect rendering of a world suddenly frozen:

> "This is a dead scene forever now.
> Nothing will ever stir.
> The end will never brighten it more than this,
> Nor the rain blur.
> "The water will always fall, and will not fall,
> And the tipped bell make no sound.
> The grass will always be growing for hay
> Deep on the ground.
> "And I shall stand here like a shadow
> Under the great balanced day,
> My eyes on the yellow dust, that was lifting in the wind,
> And does not drift away."

And there is Fifteenth Farewell, one portion of which pierces with quick genius exactly to the center of an important idea:

> "I erred, when I thought loneliness the wide
> Scent of mown grass over forsaken fields,
> Or any shadow isolation yields.
> Loneliness was the heart within your side.
> Your thought, beyond my touch, was tilted air
> Ringed with as many borders as the wind.
> How could I judge you gentle or unkind
> When all bright flying space was in your care?"

Miss Bogan has spoken always with intensity and intelligent skill; she has not always spoken clearly. Now and then her poetry comes too immediately from a personal source to mean very much to others. Nevertheless, this first volume places her near the lead of those poets today—Anna Wickham, Charlotte Mew, Genevieve Taggard, and others—who are passionately exploring the endless, narrow paths of woman's (and man's) experience. It is absolutely individual, yet it reaches toward the race. It may be a classic. Mark Van Doren

Paradox

Isles of Illusion. Letters from the South Sea. Edited by Bohun Lynch. Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

SPORTING an undergraduate outfit of Stevenson romance and Beardsley fantasy but with his stout English heart girded by the triple brass of insular prejudice, the anonymous writer of these letters from the New Hebrides went into a plague-stricken, volcanic, cannibal-infested bush to pit himself against his fate. He loved adventure, of course.

"Why weren't you here yesterday? I have had such fun," he writes, describing the zeal with which he punished some natives for shooting an "absinthe-drinking libéré." "We burned their village, cut down their 'God-tree,' and then found their gardens and uprooted and stole all their yams. That means that they will starve during the winter. . . . I feel no sympathy at all with the man [the libéré]. He sells the niggers grog and Winchesters and then wonders that he gets shot."

In the matter of race "Asterisk" is very sound. "I simply point blank refuse to sit at table with half-castes or niggers. Even at —— where the 'boss' is married to a Kanaka, I persist, and in consequence Madame feeds in the kitchen. . . ."

Why bother with him or his book, you ask at this stage. Because in addition to giving us shrewdly intelligent first-hand information, candor of this sort, if more often indulged, would soon destroy whatever rags and tatters are left of the White Man's Burden myth. Far more important, the book contains a great portrait. For eight years its subject defied disease, appalling loneliness, madness itself, in his effort to win through to a comprehension of things, being in search not so much of the illusively desirable South Sea Island as of his own soul. And in the end he finds the two together.

The same man who chortled over the notion of making natives starve repeatedly risked his life to save one of the children of a distant white neighbor. He loved his own half-caste son more tenderly than he had ever loved anything before, yet relinquished the child. His sacrifices to his code are as heroic as ironical. Although he suffers from the celibacy incurred by the break-up of his menage he feels that he might "fall utterly," go back to savagery like other complacent breeders of half-castes if he were to take another "Topsy" to himself, and he is "no Don Juan" who can go in for temporary affairs. In spite of his callousness toward things and people shut off from him by his prejudices he is keenly sensitive to those within the charmed circle of his sympathies. Of the Tahitians he says:

"Their stock of separate words to express the soul, its attributes, after-death conditions, night fears, joys and sorrows is perfectly bewildering. Then the number of separate words for describing wind, sunset, states of the sea, and other pleasant South Sea matters bespeaks a people who must have been artists in quite a Greek way . . ."

And gradually many of the prejudices are burned out of him. Here is material for an epic of the beef-eating, globe-circling Englishman, half-Caliban, half-Ariel.

"Your Own Personal View"

The Art Spirit. By Robert Henri. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

THE sweepings of an artist's mind, like those of the United States mint, may yield a modicum of precious substance, if they be sifted and reduced. The unparalleled fecundity and range of Leonardo Da Vinci's thought amply justify the publication of his notebooks in full. But Robert Henri's ideas, though vital, have no such scope, and the valuable discussions contained in this hodge-podge of students' notes, occasional articles, and letters could be given to the public in comparatively few pages. No one can quarrel with Robert Henri for not himself undertaking the task of reducing to order this repetitious mass of material. His energies are magnificently employed elsewhere. It is unfortunate, however, that his wholesome and liberating ideas should be lost to the general public for lack of an intelligent secretary.

These ideas are not new, but many of them are something better; they are true, important, and neglected. They unite in an unusual and salutary way the independence of the secessionist with the academician's respect for the past. They are expressed with vigor and cogency rather than with authority, for Robert Henri, unlike most successful innovators, wishes his students not to follow in his footsteps but to explore paths of their own choosing. Even in the early steps of the acquirement of a technique the student is urged to express himself rather than to copy even his model, to have "courage to go on developing this ability to see in nature the thing which charms you, and to express just that as fully and completely as you can. Just that. Nothing else. Not to do as any other artist does. Nor to be afraid that you may do as any other artist does."

Except in its emphasis upon the complete autonomy of the individual the book can hardly be said to have a point of view. But in this lies its chief interest and the proof of the artist's sincerity in urging his students to "blunder ahead with your own personal view."

Most of what Mr. Henri says has a wisdom applicable far beyond its immediate reference; for example, "You will never get form till you want it. And wanting to want it is not wanting it," or, "It will not do to have your fine thought yesterday, and paint your picture today." Upon nearly every page occur brief revealing phrases upon which anyone might well meditate; "the tremendous activity of a boy sitting still"; "All nature has power of response"; and the wonderful description of Velasquez's dwarfs contained in the phrase, "the groping of a puzzled heart."

Books in Brief

Untrodden Ways. Adventures on English Coasts, Heaths, and Marshes, and also among the Works of Hudson, Crabbe, and Other Country Writers. By H. J. Massingham. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

Able and devoted essays, with entirely too little of that unaffected nobility which Mr. Massingham, who is always conscious of writing well, admires in Hudson. The essay on Crabbe's observation of bird and field is particularly acute and valuable.

Feet of Clay. By Margaretta Tuttle. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

If this novel had appeared in the spring, one would dispose of it in a paragraph by suggesting its eminent fitness for vacation reading. Now, with a long—and possibly hard—winter in prospect, it can only be recommended to those who demand that their fiction shall be lighter than their blankets regardless of the season.

Out of the Past. By R. W. Postgate. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.50.

This volume comprises a series of footnotes to history, concerned with some of the minor figures of history who have been "agin the government." The author gives a graphic and well-digested account of various episodes related to modern revolutionary movements, fitting them into their proper niche in historical perspective.

More Lives Than One. By Carolyn Wells. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Miss Wells is a shrewd master of plot, and understands the value of a liberal injection of humor in the most feverish of mystery tales. She assumes that the average reader knows only what he is told, and she is careful not to get in advance of his mental processes. Thus it happens that "More Lives Than One" is a satisfying—but never a stimulating—story.

Americanism: A World Menace. By W. T. Colyer. The Labour Publishing Company, Ltd. 6/-.

This is a thorough indictment, designed to take all the starch out of the stiff bosom of American patriotism. It examines our institutions in logical order, and measures the exact hiatus between the ideals which are supposed to animate them and the methods which actually control them. The book would be a more devastating arraignment if one did not suspect that the same discrepancy exists between the ideals and the methods of other nations, which are—by that token—minor menaces of the same sort.

Drama

Importations

CERTAIN forces in our theater are fast becoming Americanizing agencies of a subtle but powerful kind. I shall not be accused of a lack of fondness for the great drama of the Continent. But in our immediate situation there is something false, there is something meretricious, there is something that will make us look foolish if we do not keep our judgment steady.

At the Frolic Theater a fashionable audience—an audience with occasional ropes of pearls—had gathered reverently to see the Grand Guignol players straight from Paris. Straight from Paris! (May I say that I have a reasonable acquaintance with the French language and that not a word of the well-enunciated lines escaped me?) A very praiseworthy, an almost reverential expectancy pervaded the audience. One rarely sees that hereabouts. The curtain rose and the players performed four one-act plays: "Sur le Banc," "Au Rat Mort," "Une Nuit au Bouge," "Le Court Circuit."

The scenery and the lighting effects had been brought from Paris, too. Straight from Paris. I knew that at once because I know that such scenery and such lighting no longer exist in the reputable American theater. You cannot buy it; I doubt whether you can rent it even from storehouses. That, I gladly admit, is a minor matter. I have seen great plays worthily presented amid bits of second-hand furniture and old-fashioned side-wings trying hard to make six pasteboard trees look like a mysterious garden. In itself that is less than nothing. But the acting of the Parisian players. It isn't bad; it isn't even bad. It is of a deadly and conventional mediocrity. You know exactly what everybody is going to do at every moment; it is of the theater, indeed—of a theater untouched by the traditions of a certain Antoine who was a Parisian too. Neither Antoine nor Brahm nor Stanislavsky have lived as far as this theater is concerned. Thus, undoubtedly, unless some exotic person of genius happened to be around, they acted in the days of the sainted Sardou. They are still at it.

The plays, granting their semi-popular character, are not good plays. They are not nearly as good as the better one-acters presented here years ago by the Washington Square Players or the Provincetown Players. They are not nearly so intelligent; they are not nearly so well wrought. Their ingenuity belongs to an uningenious age. The ghastly practical joke in "Une Nuit au Bouge," for instance, is drawn out quite beyond endurance; it is blunted and killed by mere length and deadly iteration. One felt like saying: "Yes, yes, we know; we see what you are trying to do; we passed any possibility of thrill ten minutes ago. Go on and get done." Similarly "Sur le Banc" is dreadfully obvious. Of course the old gentleman told just such an anecdote; of course the little shop-girl determined to remain "sage." Of course, of course. A little Dumas fils, a little Sardou, both drained of the vitality and timeliness of their day and character. . . . I am sure the Selwyns meant well. Mr. Gest brings great things from Europe. Why not do likewise? Excellent. But they should at least have insisted on the Guitrys coming in person. New York is the second theatrical city in the world. If Berlin is engulfed by civil war it will soon be the first. These players and their plays are not good enough.

It was pleasant to see the Neighborhood Playhouse reopen. Has one spent more truly agreeable hours in any theater? But here too, the foreign fallacy has made itself felt. Undoubtedly M. Boleslavsky is an artist and undoubtedly sketchiness and briefness of rehearsal are glaring faults of the American theater. But either I am obtuse where I have every predisposition to be enthusiastic or I have seen equally good if not indeed better ensemble acting at the Neighborhood Playhouse itself, at the Garrick, in isolated productions up and down Broadway, and at the Jewish Art Theater. And I am quite aware of the charming talent of Joanna Roos, Albert Carrol, Pamela Gaythorne, Aline MacMahon, John F. Roche, and others.

Of the two plays presented, the first, William Butler Yeats's "The Player Queen," is imaginative, beautifully written at moments of course, but not a little obscure. It is terribly overwritten and therefore terribly dull. The fallacy of "artiness," of the self-approbation that proceeds from the conviction of liking the right and beautiful and subtle and ultimate thing may warm the bosom of the Playhouse's audiences. Mine remained cold. Life and art are both difficult enough. To be so bored is the last indignity. The second play is Shaw's "The Shewing-up of Blanco Posnet," not one of his very great things. The roughness in this production was forced and conscious. Mr. Campbell as Blanco was inarticulate at many moments. The grouping and gestures of the women were admirable. It was both instructive and delightful to watch Miss Roos. But during the whole performance I thought, somehow, of Gilbert Emery's "Tarnish," of the fact that I could have gone, on this evening, to see a new American play by Maxwell Anderson, that I had deliberately come here instead, and that daily and almost hourly I am becoming more devoted, in the theater and out, to those aspects of life and art that a Middle Western friend of mine used to sum up in the inelegant but telling words —brass tacks. ## Indians in Kenya

THE position of Indians in the protectorate of Kenya, on the east coast of Africa, is being discussed wherever Indian nationalism makes itself heard. Opposition to the recent settlement of the question has become a fixed part of the Indian nationalist program and may well have important bearings on the political future of India itself. We print below enough of the documentary history of the Indian colonization and of the recent struggle for political equality to explain the sensational resolution of the Indian National Congress, meeting at Delhi September 15-17, which declared in favor of a boycott of all British goods and stated that India could no longer honorably remain a part of the British Empire. Several of the documents included come from the Oriental Research Library in Washington, D. C., through the courtesy of Mr. Taraknath Das.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE STRUGGLE

A memorandum submitted to Parliament on July 23, 1923, gives a summary of the history of the Kenya question, from which we take the following passages:

> The history of the position of Indians in Kenya up to the end of the late war may be summarized briefly. There have been Indian merchants established along the East African Coast for a long time, and, with the opening up of Uganda and Kenya, and particularly with the development of British administration in those countries during the last thirty-eight years, Indian traders have penetrated into the interior. Many Indian artisans and laborers employed on the construction of the Uganda Railway remained to engage in commerce, and at the beginning of the present century the number of Indians in Kenya was greatly increased by the arrival of artisans, clerks, and small traders. There is a limited number also of professional men and traders on a large scale who have come from India to the Colony. The agricultural Indian is, however, almost unknown in Kenya.
> It was the question of the ownership of land in the Highlands which first brought Indian and European interests into conflict. The Highlands, less the area in that region reserved for Africans, amount to about one-tenth of the total area of the Colony and Protectorate, and they are in climate unique in the great belt of Tropical African possessions of the Crown. There were a few European settlers from about 1897, but the encouragement of their immigration into the country as a matter of policy may be dated from 1902. From that time the influx of European settlers increased steadily. The policy of the reservation of the Highlands for Europeans was definitely laid down by the Earl of Elgin, when Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1908.
> At that time the unofficial element on the Legislative Council was entirely nominated, and in 1909 the experiment was tried of adding an Indian nominated member. This experiment did not prove entirely satisfactory, and the appointment was not renewed when the term of office of the Indian concerned came to an end.
> In 1913, a distinguished sanitation expert, Professor (now Sir William) Simpson, furnished a report on sanitary matters in Kenya, in which he advocated strongly a system of racial segregation, both in the residential and in the commercial areas of the large towns. His views were accepted, and when the time came for applying them after the war, this question of segregation formed one of the main points at issue between the European and the Indian communities.
> At the end of the war it was decided to give effect to the long-standing desire of the European community for representation on the Legislative Council by means of elected members. The grant of elective institutions was approved by Viscount Milner in 1919 and took effect at the beginning of 1920. The number of European elected unofficial members of the Council was fixed at eleven, but provision was made for maintaining an official majority in the Council.
> In 1918, the report of a local Economic Commission of Inquiry into post-war development was published. This contained disparaging references to the Indians then in Kenya, and advocated strict control of future immigration from India. Although the passages in question were repudiated by Lord Milner as not representing the view either of His Majesty's Government or himself, the report undoubtedly added to the feeling of bitterness among the Indians. . . .
> . . . The more general question of the position of Indians in the Empire came under discussion at the Imperial Conference of 1921. At the first meeting, the following resolution was adopted:
> > The Conference, while reaffirming the resolution of the Imperial War Conference of 1918, that each community of the British Commonwealth should enjoy complete control of the composition of its own population by means of restriction on immigration from any of the other communities, recognizes that there is an incongruity between the position of India as an equal member of the British Empire and the existence of disabilities upon British Indians lawfully domiciled in some other parts of the Empire. The Conference accordingly is of the opinion that, in the interests of the solidarity of the British Commonwealth, it is desirable that the rights of such Indians to citizenship should be recognized.
> The following observations were appended to the resolution:
> > The representatives of South Africa regret their inability to accept this resolution in view of the exceptional circumstances of the greater part of the Union.
> > . . . . . . . .
> > The representatives of India, while expressing their appreciation of the acceptance of the resolution recorded above, feel bound to place on record their profound concern at the position of Indians in South Africa, and their hope that by negotiation between the governments of India and of South Africa some way can be found, as soon as may be, to reach a more satisfactory position.

THE TEXT OF THE SETTLEMENT

The same memorandum then traces the course of the negotiations which followed the Imperial Conference of 1921 and prints the text of the Wood-Winterton report establishing an equal though qualified franchise for all "British subjects and British-protected persons" in Kenya. It also describes the general purpose of the British Government to protect against all infringements the rights of the African natives and states on the other hand that "His Majesty's Government cannot but regard the grant of responsible self-government as out of the question within any period of time which need now be taken into consideration."

The text of the final settlement is then printed and we publish below the most important sections:

> . . . 4. Representation on the Legislative Council.
> (a) Elective System. In no responsible quarter is it suggested that the Indians in Kenya should not have elective representation upon the Legislative Council of the Colony. The point at issue is the method whereby such elective representation should be secured. There are two alternative methods: (1) A common electoral roll. (2) Communal franchise. . . .
> Under the former system, Kenya would be divided up into a given number of constituencies, in each of which European and Indian voters on the roll would vote together at an election for candidates of either race, and the qualifications for admission to the voters' roll would be the same for Europeans and for Indians. Under the latter system, European and Indian constituencies would be demarcated independently, not necessarily coinciding in number or boundaries; the qualifications for admission to the voters' roll would not necessarily be the same for the two communities; and while Europeans would vote in the European constituencies for European candidates, Indians would vote in the Indian constituencies for Indian candidates.

(b) Qualifications for Voters. . . . Under the communal system His Majesty's Government are prepared to grant to Indians a wide franchise. It will be a matter for the Governor of the Colony to ascertain the views of the Indian community and to submit the necessary legislation to give effect thereto. The same procedure will be followed in the case of the Arab community.

(c) Qualifications for Candidates. His Majesty's Government are prepared to adopt a similar principle in regard to the qualifications for candidates, except that there must be a test which will insure that candidates have such a knowledge of the English language as will enable them to take their part in the proceedings of the Legislative Council. No system which would involve the use of two or more official languages in the Council will be contemplated; but His Majesty's Government have no ground for supposing that the imposition of this necessary condition will create difficulties or limit unreasonably the choice of suitable candidates.

(d) Numbers on Legislative Council. The question then remains of the number of seats on the Council to be allocated to each community. As matters stand, there are eleven elected unofficials (Europeans) on the Council, and as a provisional measure authority was given in 1921 for the substitution of four nominated Indian members for the two elected Indian members contemplated in Lord Milner's dispatch of the 21st of May, 1920.

After full consideration, His Majesty's Government have decided that provision should be made for five elected Indian unofficial members on the Council; while for the Arabs, it has been decided that there shall be one elected member in addition to the nominated Arab official member for whom provision already exists. The Europeans will continue to return eleven elected representatives. The number of nominated official members will be fixed so as to maintain an official majority on the Council. . . .

. . . No articulate expression of opinion can be yet expected from the African tribes in Kenya, and the time has not come to consider what should be their representation on the Council. The educational development of individual natives will undoubtedly precede the political education of the general body of natives; there are, indeed, signs of this already. . . .

7. Segregation in Townships. The next matter for consideration is that of segregation of the European and non-European races. . . . It is now the view of the competent medical authorities that, as a sanitation measure, segregation of Europeans and Asiatics is not absolutely essential for the preservation of the health of the community; the rigid enforcement of sanitary, police, and building regulations, without any racial discrimination, by the Colonial and municipal authorities will suffice. . . . They have therefore decided that the policy of segregation as between Europeans and Asiatics in the townships must be abandoned.

But for the present, at any rate, it is considered desirable, as in other native dependencies, to keep the residential quarters of natives, so far as may be practicable, separate from those of the immigrant races. . . .

8. Reservation of Highlands. . . .

After reviewing the history of this question and taking into consideration the facts that during the last fifteen years European British subjects have been encouraged to develop the Highlands and that during that period settlers have taken up land in the Highlands on this understanding, His Majesty's Government have decided that the existing practice must be maintained as regards both initial grants and transfers.

An area of land in the Lowlands which can be set aside without infringing on native reserves and without conflicting with native requirements will be temporarily reserved in order that it may be ascertained by experience what demand there is for agricultural land on the part of Indians who will give suitable guaranties of their intention to develop the land themselves. After the expiration of a limited period, the reservation of this area in the Lowlands will be reconsidered in the light of experience so gained. . . .

9. Immigration. . . . But the consideration which must govern immigration policy in Kenya is purely economic, and strict regard must be paid to the interests of the African. When the question is reexamined from this standpoint, it is evident to His Majesty's Government that some further control over immigration in the economic interests of the natives of Kenya is required. . . .

In course of time, as the natives progress intellectually, they will no doubt take the place which Africans hold in other parts of British Tropical Africa in mechanical and subordinate clerical work and in small trade, and it must be the aim of the British administration to further this development by all possible means. With this object the Colonial Government must weigh, so far as may be practicable, the effect on native interests of the admission to the Colony of would-be immigrants of any race. . . .

10. Conclusion. In conclusion, His Majesty's Government desire to record that the decisions embodied in this memorandum have only been taken after an exhaustive review of the several complicating factors which have led to the present unhappy controversy. Their constant endeavor throughout their deliberations has been to relate the principles which must govern the administration of a British Colony in Tropical Africa to the wider considerations of general Imperial policy as enunciated in the Resolution of the Imperial Conference of 1921. It is regretted that on certain material points it has not been possible to meet the wishes of the Government of India, whose views have received the fullest consideration from His Majesty's Government at the instance of the Secretary of State for India. It is not to be expected that issues so grave can be composed to the immediate satisfaction of the several interests concerned, but His Majesty's Government believe that the decisions now taken, resting as they do on the broad basis of the British trusteeship for the African, provide an equitable adjustment of those interests. It is the confident expectation of His Majesty's Government, that if the whole matter is viewed in its true perspective, decisions so based will be accorded general acceptance, and it is their earnest hope that a sincere effort will be made to restore in Kenya that spirit of cooperation and good-will so essential to its welfare and development.

How the Europeans Felt

The anti-Indian sentiments of the Europeans in Kenya, led by Lord Delamere, are expressed in a violent resolution, adopted by the Kenya Convention of Associations on February 26, 1923, some time before the final settlement, when the liberal proposals of the Wood-Winterton report were still supposed to represent the official British position:

That this Convention representing the entire European community in Kenya Colony solemnly affirms its unswerving loyalty to His Majesty the King and its determination to uphold his Empire.

But in view of the proposals of His Majesty's Government relating to the Indian franchise in Kenya, this Convention feels it to be its bounden duty to place on record that if in consequence of the ill-considered advice of His Majesty's Ministers his loyal subjects should be forced into action prejudicial to His Majesty's peace and abhorrent and ruinous to themselves, then the full responsibility for such a calamity must rest upon those advisers who, in their ignorance of or indifference to the true issues involved, shall have advised His Majesty to sanction a policy disastrous to the future of white colonization in Africa and to the welfare of millions of His Majesty's African subjects; and which this Convention believes to be calculated ultimately to endanger the integrity of the British Empire.

A Protest and a Threat

The attitude of Indians in India toward the terms of the Kenya settlement is revealed in the resolutions which follow, adopted by a mass meeting in Bombay on September 11:

> 1. Resolved that this public meeting of the citizens of Bombay under the joint auspices of (1) The Bombay Presidency Association, (2) Indian Merchants Chamber and Bureau, (3) British Indian Colonial Merchants Association, (4) Imperial Indian Citizenship Association, (5) National Home Rule League, (6) the Indian Progressive Association, and (7) the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee places on record its unanimous and emphatic conviction that the decision of His Majesty's Government on the Kenya question is, except on the point of residential and commercial segregation in the townships, in violation of the essential features of the pledges extended to the Indians from time to time by His Majesty's Government and responsible ministers of the Crown; and is, in the matter or restriction of Indian immigration into Kenya, in violation of the rights of free immigration into East Africa of Indians long before the advent of British rule in Kenya; and is utterly subversive of the principles of equality within the British Commonwealth, and establishes the dangerous and intolerable principle of white domination. This meeting, therefore, demands an immediate reversal of the decision inasmuch as it constitutes a denial of the right of India to develop as an equal partner in the British Commonwealth.
> 2. That this meeting agrees with the view of the Indians in Kenya that the decision of His Majesty's Government is unacceptable in most matters, and fully shares with them their grief and humiliation; and hereby declares its firm determination to support them in any legitimate steps that they feel called upon to take in vindication of their undoubted rights.
> That this meeting regards the scant consideration to the representatives of the Government of India on the Kenya question shown by His Majesty's Government as being due to its present subordinate character and declares its emphatic opinion that India will not be able to speak with the just authority due to it unless it is made fully responsible to the people of India and thus become the real mouthpiece of Indian sentiments and aspirations.
> III
> That, in order to bring home to the authorities in England and the Dominions, Colonies, and Protectorates of the Empire the feeling of indignation and resentment caused throughout India by the decision of His Majesty's Government on the Kenya Indian question this public meeting is emphatically of opinion:
> 1. That Dr. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and H. H. the Maharaja of Alwar should enter an emphatic protest against the injustice of the Kenya decision in the Imperial Conference and should withdraw from it, except in the event of their being convinced of a definite chance of obtaining a reversal of the decision of His Majesty's Government.
> 2. That India should not participate in the forthcoming Empire Exhibition and the Empire Economic Conference.
> 3. That in future all colonial non-Indians wishing to enter, reside, and serve in India be subjected to the same restrictions and disabilities prevailing against Indians in the country from which they come, including those relating to the right to trade and to hold properties and mining and navigation licenses in British India or in Indian States in alliance with His Majesty, or the right to vote under the present election rules.
> 4. That pending the abolition of all preferential rights still reserved for Europeans under the Criminal Procedure Code, these special rights in the case of colonials be immediately abrogated.
> 5. That as a retaliatory measure the different political associations and business bodies calling this public meeting be requested to appoint a committee of experts to prepare a scheme of a complete boycott of goods made in all parts of the British Empire except India, showing from time to time which goods should be boycotted and the method and manner of their boycott, according to the condition and requirements of the country.

A Liberal Protest

Even the so-called Liberals of India who have been supporting the Indian Government are revolting against the Kenya settlement. The most prominent among them, the Right Honorable V. S. Srinivas Sastri, contributed to Young India, in the issue of September 6, an article in which he said:

> . . . Let us look at Kenya. We have gone there for some centuries now. The British Government came there only to safeguard our interests. Not only did we furnish the occasion but we exerted our influence to establish the British Protectorate. The earliest British officers thought that the new territory could be a suitable outlet for the congested districts in India. Our coolie labor built the railway. In fact today not only railways but government offices are run by our clerical labor. The currency system was ours till it was supplanted recently to the ruin of Indian wealth. The Indian Penal Code was introduced; our armies fought on the soil of Kenya more than once to keep the Union Jack flying. We are the only people now that do anything to teach and train the native in the art of civilized life. Great numbers of Indians were born and bred there after many years during which we were invited, employed, and encouraged, to be now told at the bidding of a few narrow-minded whites that we are a danger to the native, that we are a moral and physical infection, and that our future immigration must be controlled and finally stopped. This is the refinement of ingratitude and tyranny, the thought of which still lacerates my heart though it has been my constant companion night and day during some months. It may not be pleasing to the Government but it is good for them to know that there is hardly an intelligent or patriotic Indian who does not consider the settlement as setting aside a long succession of righteous pledges in the direction of human brotherhood in favor of an unrighteous pledge made by incompetent authorities and in the face of earnest protests.

The Kenya settlement is a grave national humiliation. It shakes the foundations of our public life. Party interests and party shibboleths seem now irrelevant as well as a heavy handicap. I am happy to believe that members of the Servants of India Society are unanimous in their desire, while remaining true to their Liberal creed and that of its founder, to cooperate with men and women of all parties in the country trying to get their grievous wrongs righted and in the speedy achievement of Swaraj, which is the sovereign need of the hour.

The Indians Hit Back

The City Fathers of Madras, at a General Meeting of the Corporation held on August 27, adopted the following resolutions:

> That, in view of the unjust and humiliating treatment of His Majesty's Indian subjects by the governments of the Dominions and Crown Colonies of the British Empire, this Corporation resolves:
> 1. That, in future, no non-Indian born in those dominions or colonies be employed by this Corporation either as agent, contractor, or servant;
> 2. That, in future, no licenses, facilities, or concessions be granted to any non-Indian born in those dominions or colonies, including circus troupes, for any trade or other purpose;
> 3. That no insurance of the movable or immovable properties of the Corporation be hereafter placed with insurance companies registered in those dominions or colonies; and
> 4. That the commissioner and the standing committees are hereby requested to give effect to the aforesaid resolutions with strictness.

THE COMMUNIST VIEW

The aspirations of both Indians and Europeans are viewed from the lofty heights of Communist detachment in an editorial printed in the Vanguard, the Central Organ of the Communist Party of India.

> The representatives of Indian capital and their creatures, the politicians of all complexions within and outside the Legislative Councils, are up in arms against the recent decisions of the British Cabinet regarding the status of the Indian settlers in Kenya. Sir Fazulbhouy Currimbhoy, the president of the Bombay Indian Merchants Chamber, threatens that "India will refuse to identify herself with the Empire hereafter." Mr. Seshagiri Iyer, of the Indian Legislative Assembly, characterizes the action of the British Cabinet as a "tragic violation of solemn pledges" and gives a warning that India "will not observe her obligations of loyalty to the Empire." Mr. Srinivas Sastri, generally a model of constitutionalism, predicts terrible things as a result of this flouting by the British bourgeoisie of the interests of the Indian mercantile colony, some 22,000 strong, in Kenya. The whole Kenya affair, over which bourgeois political opinion in India is so much agitated, is a striking example of the developing competition of the English and Indian capitalists for the flesh-pots of the British Empire. Kenya is only one of such examples outside India. Within India itself, indigenous capital, in the hands of the Bombay financiers, is pledged to a rapid industrialization of India as a means toward a calculated encroachment, with the help of protective tariffs, on the monopoly of exploitation hitherto enjoyed by British capital, either from Lancashire or invested on the spot.
> The 22,000 Indian merchants settled in Kenya have succeeded in acquiring vast vested interests, a fact much resented by the 10,000 English colonists there. There has arisen between British and Indian capital a keen competition for the right to exploit the 2,500,000 native Africans in Kenya, as well as the natural resources of that colony. As political power is in the hands of the British, the Indian is handicapped in the expansion of his capitalist rights and privileges. The crown colony administration of Kenya, thoroughly alarmed at the audacity of Indian capital, sought to exclude Indians from adequate representation in the local legislative body, denies them the right to acquire land in the fertile and climatically favorable highlands, and proposes to enforce measures of segregation and immigration restriction on Indians which are extremely derogatory to Indian rights and interests. In the resultant fight for political power and commercial expansion between the two rival sets of exploiters, the Indian Government, conscious of the growing force of Indian public opinion on this question, constituted itself the champion of the Indian cause in Kenya, and made representations to the London Cabinet to settle the questions in favor of Indian sentiment.
> But the British ministers in London have not been able to forget that the British Empire exists principally for the benefit of British capital. The questions at issue have been decided in favor of the British colonists. . . .
> In this connection it is interesting to note that the Indian capitalist in Kenya has developed toward the exploited Africans a mental attitude curiously similar to that of the British capitalist in India toward the exploited Indians. Mr. Jivanjee, one of the richest Indian capitalists in Kenya, recently addressed a meeting of his compatriots in Berlin. He was shocked at the suggestion that such a thing as an African problem could exist in Kenya, apart from the question of dividing the Kenya riches between the British and Indian interlopers. He could not admit that the interests of the two and a half million Africans, who preceded both the Indians and the English in the possession of Kenya and whose labor power applied to the fertile soil produces the wealth of the country, had any bearing on the question. . . . Obviously, exploiters are of a class. There is little to choose between them, except the color of their skin.

Why Doesn't Washington Recognize the Russian Government?

Do You Know—

—That in March, 1918, the Soviet Government offered to resume fighting the Germans if we would furnish munitions and supplies and that our Government ignored the offer?

—That originally the Red Army was aimed at the Germans and that Allied officers helped organize it?

—That the "Sisson Letters," which in 1918 caused the American public to execrate the Soviet leaders, are now acknowledged to be forgeries?

—That our State Department has pigeonholed reports which, if given out, would have made impossible the poisoning of the American public with lies fabricated by Russian emigres?

—That the Russian Division of our State Department has become a nest of persons connected by birth, marriage, or fellowship with the Russian aristocracy?

—That the Yudenich drive on Petrograd was financed by selling the famished Esthonians at fancy prices food supplied by the American Relief Commission?

—That in Kolchak's flight from Omsk sixty train-loads of "Whites," mostly women and children, became stalled in the snow and froze to death?

Read E. A. Ross's "The Russian Soviet Republic"—

—Read the most amazing true story of modern times—how the Allied Governments dealt with the first socialist government in history. The contrast between what the documents show and what the officials and newspapers have lead the public to believe is astounding. These damning facts are not drawn from Bolshevik sources but from documents and non-Bolshevik sources.

—Professor Ross is not at all a socialist. He is an old-line economist who has never put faith in the economic experiment being tried in Russia, but he is determined to show up the deceit practiced upon his fellow countrymen.

—He exposes the failure of the Bolshevik land policy and nationalization policy as impartially as he exposes the crookedness of Allied diplomats and statesmen.

—He explodes the Bolshevik claims to have brought on the German Revolution as relentlessly as he explodes the 49 lies about Russia, given wide circulation in the American press up to the end of 1919.

("The Russian Soviet Republic" has just been published by the Century Co., 353 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is the third volume of Professor Ross's trilogy on Russia. The first two volumes are "Russia in Upheaval" and the "Russian Bolshevik Revolution." Each is a full-sized octavo volume of between 300 and 400 pages, fully illustrated; and each is sold by booksellers or the publishers for $3.00.)

A NEW YORK journalist some six years ago wrote an excellent article for a popular weekly about a man named L. Trotzky, a revolutionary agitator who had suddenly been whirled into prominence on the wings of the Bolshevist upheaval in Russia. The editor of the weekly refused the article, not, he explained, because of any social prejudice, but because the paper was printed in Springfield, Ohio, and by the time the issue could come off the press Trotzky would quite certainly be dead or out of the news. Well, the popular weekly has been dead now for five years or more, and the editor has gone into advertising, but Trotzky—well, Trotzky, by the strange workings of fate, is at the head of the greatest army in Central Europe, a member of the strongest government on the continent, in the country that may well control the fate of the world. The editor of that ill-starred weekly may be allowed to stand as a symbol for the attitude of the greater part of the world in 1917. The Bolshevik Revolution was a flash in the pan, a revolutionary spasm. And then later, when it refused to subside, it became a disease to be segregated and stamped out. And now in 1923 on its sixth anniversary—what is bolshevism? Modified and molded by outside pressure and by the logic of events at home, it has become a method of government and industrial management, a developing system of life. Even the enemies of the Soviet system realize today that a vigorous, stubborn spirit has pulled the Russian people and their government through years of war and famine and that the present situation has in it elements of strength and growth to be found nowhere else in Europe. In a world that is sick with the diseases that breed from capitalist-imperialism, the virility of Russia may hold out the best hope for civilization.

WHEN Henry Ford grants the hungry newspapermen an audience and imparts his views on prohibition enforcement, concluding that he is "for Coolidge—strong—if he dries up the country," it is a safe bet that there has been a change of gear in that non-political mind which Mr. Charles W. Wood so entertainingly described in a recent issue of Collier's. Ford's language about Muscle Shoals and his earnest yearning to relieve the farmer has always tuned in with the familiar political wave-lengths, and when he adds prohibition one ceases wondering whether Ford wants to be President. He does. Senator Samuel M. Ralston of Indiana, constantly mentioned as the ideal compromise candidate for the Democrats, is still coy. He will not admit that he is a candidate. Neither will William G. McAdoo, though McAdoo henchmen are very busy rounding up the boys from Washington to Florida. On the other side of the fence there is President Coolidge. He still deprecates public talk of his candidacy. Somehow or other, though, we cannot avoid suspecting that the topic may have slipped out somewhere between the soup and the nuts the other day when Mr. Coolidge invited to lunch with him at the White House Messrs. Fred W. Upham, treasurer of the Republican National Committee; James H. Stanley, a Colorado millionaire; Frank W. Stearns, Mr. Coolidge's Boston patron; E. T. Stotesbury, a partner in the House of Morgan; and William T. Wrigley, the chewing-gum king and trusted angel of past Republican campaigns. Or did they, perhaps, confine their conversation to the chicle market in Mexico?

MUCH as our two big political parties object to the injection of anything resembling a vital issue into an election, two questions of considerable import seem bound to get into next year's campaign, both of which the old-line leaders would prefer to see in Hades. Practical politicians, for the most part, do not want to get mixed either with prohibition or the Ku Klux Klan, but events are running too strong for them. Governor Pinchot is exultantly shaking prohibition in the face of President Coolidge and shouting so that he can be heard from Harrisburg to the Grand Canyon: "What are you going to do about it?" At the same time both pro and anti-Klanists are fractious. Through Hiram W. Evans, Imperial Wizard, the Klan has officially read Negroes, Jews, and Greek and Roman Catholics out of American life as "three powerful and numerous elements that do now, and forever will, defy every fundamental requirement of assimilation." In Texas the Klan is organizing to beat the Underwood candidacy, while the Senator from Alabama, on his part, is attacking the Klan. In Texas, also, an anti-Klan group is planning to carry the fight against the Invisible Empire into the United States Senate by contesting the election of Earle B. Mayfield. Certainly next year's election promises to be more interesting—if not more satisfying—than that of 1920.

HARRY F. SINCLAIR is a man who knows his way around in the world. He is the owner of the horse which beat the English Derby winner, and he is reputed to have made a barrelful of money out of oil. Either one of these things is enough to establish Mr. Sinclair as a "reg'lar feller" with the American public. But to us he has given a better proof of discernment: he contributed to the campaign funds of both the Republican and the Democratic parties last year; he has forgotten how much. Mr. Sinclair not only knows horseflesh and how to make money; he knows politics too. He realizes that Republicans and Democrats are the right and left wheels of one and the same axle, and as an expert in lubricants he has more sense than to grease one hub and leave the other dry. You never know which wheel is going to be on the smooth track and which in the rut. It pays to grease both; especially if you are an oil man with so much grease that you can forget in a year how much you put on.

WHEN Reichswehr troops, acting under orders from Berlin, took possession of the Saxon House of Parliament and arrested the Saxon ministers, a chapter in German history that began with the November revolution of 1918 ended. Fritz Ebert, ex-saddler and nominal Socialist, remains the titular head of the German republic, but the new spirit that swept through Germany in the revolutionary days is dead when the Weimar Constitution can be so defied and the government of a federal state turned out of office simply because of its politics. Kaiser Wilhelm himself would never have dared strike so mean a blow. Such arbitrary action at almost any time within the past five years would have called forth a general strike of the German workingmen, and the reactionaries, despite their military preponderance, would have been forced to yield to the economic strength of the working class. Today, with hundreds of thousands unemployed and mere existence almost a privilege, that strength is gone. The most significant thing about the Saxon coup d'etat is that the working class did nothing. It is not yet clear what dictated Stresemann's action. He was once leader of the Saxon industrialists; perhaps his ruthlessness is a mere incident in industrial warfare. Or it may be that the Bavarians are pulling the strings, and that the ousting of the working-class ministers in Saxony is the price exacted by the Bavarian monarchists for their non-secession.

MERE words are hardly adequate for comment on the French proposal to lend one billion, eight hundred million francs—more than a hundred million dollars—to Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Poland for the purchase of war materials in France. Senator Berenger, in reporting the bill to the French Senate—it has already passed the Chamber—comments upon the money as a protection to "France's military frontier, which is not only the Rhine but the Vistula and the Danube." Napoleon's dreams live again! At a time when France is constantly exhibiting her war wounds to the world, and pleading inability to pay for restoration, much less to pay her debts to her allies, there is a consummate indecency in this deliberate financing of the militarization of Europe.

EYRAM VAN TREZ—whoever he may be—writes to the New York Times: "With America a notorious and glorious fomenter of revolution in Panama, what license have we to crucify France for encouraging 'separation' in the Ruhr?" He recalls the Rooseveltian coup ("I did it," the Colonel frankly said) which created the independent Republic of Panama and facilitated the digging of an American canal. There is a very real parallelism which most Americans will prefer to forget. The Nation may be permitted, in view of its clean record of protest against Roosevelt's piracy twenty years ago, to say that the fact that piracy has existed in the past is no excuse for its repetition in the present. The French support of the Separatists, plainly reflected in the dispatches of the most sympathetic correspondents in the Rhineland, is even worse than Roosevelt's crime of 1903. Roosevelt encouraged, and then supported, a petty revolution which the people of Panama were quite ready to carry through; the French have hired professional adventurers and bribed thin-spirited Germans in an attempt to establish a republic which the Rhinelanders almost unanimously detest. Let Americans, however, take the parallel to heart. We do honestly abhor the present course of French and Italian policy; let us give it no new excuses. It was an Italian diplomat who remarked to an American observer at Geneva: "Why, what we did at Corfu was just what you did at Vera Cruz; why do you object?" We have no right to forget our own past or present; our marines still occupy Haiti.

HOW much more turbid world politics are today than a score of years ago may be judged from the hardly perceptible ripple caused by Mussolini's spring-board dive into the Moroccan pool. When in 1905 the ex-Kaiser unexpectedly precipitated himself into Moroccan affairs by his famous visit to Tangier, he set the whole world by the ears. In the present seething state of Europe Mussolini's insistence upon a voice in the British-French-Spanish powwow to arrange a new government for Tangier is taken as a mere incident in the day's news. The system of international control set up in Morocco by the Treaty of Algeciras in 1906 did not work, and was virtually superseded by the German-French and Spanish-French agreements of 1911 and 1912, respectively, which divided control—except as to Tangier and its environs—between France and Spain. But the Treaty of Algeciras is still nominally in existence, and as Italy was a signatory to it, that gives her a technical pretext to meddle in something which she ought to be thankful to be well out of. By the same right—the United States also signed the Treaty of Algeciras—Mr. Hughes sends a note saying that American economic interests must be protected. Morocco is a horrible example of an attempt by "civilized" nations to impose their rule on "barbarians" for the benefit of trade. For twenty years "Christian" armies have been "pacifying" with gunpowder and bayonets the ungrateful natives of Islam. Yet today we are still getting regular communiques of dead and wounded in the Spanish warfare on the Riff front.

THE New York Commercial does not understand why The Nation objects to the course of Mr. Hughes in tying up the Department of State and the Federal judiciary with an American banking house's loan to Salvador. "What, may we ask, is the United States Government for, if it is not to back up its own citizens in their dealings with foreign governments or individuals?" this newspaper inquires blandly. Well, we do not recall that as one of the purposes set forth in the preamble of the Constitution, and it sounds rather in conflict with the intention, say, to "establish justice" or to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Still the Commercial undoubtedly expresses accurately the view of government held by a part of our business community. It does not sense equally well the opposing sentiment when it continues: "We rather imagine that if American interests in Salvador were in jeopardy and the Government of Salvador showed a disposition to default on its obligations to American citizens, The Nation would be the first to rise up and demand that the State Department take the matter up." The Nation would not. On the contrary, we hold that American business must take its chances abroad, as it does at home, and that it is entitled to nothing from the Department of State except insistence that our citizens be granted the equal protection of the laws of other countries. Violation of this principle underlies our whole system of commercial imperialism.

WHEN we observe newspapers like the New York Commercial smilingly defending all the details of a loan like that to Salvador, we understand better some statements in the circular of the bankers in regard to prearranged publicity. In order to impress prospective investors with the excellence of the Salvador bonds the bankers promise "intelligent press propaganda, which will call attention in various ways to the safety and advantages of investing money in Central America, and also to the fact that the income of the customs house will be published weekly in the financial columns of American papers, the same as the earnings of railways, etc." The bankers' circular continues:

> The following item will appear regularly: "Custom-house receipts of Salvador for the week ended the 7th of the month were $———. From the 1st of the year to date the total amount collected was $———, being ——— times the amount necessary to pay interest and sinking fund on the bonds held in the U. S."

With our old-fashioned ideas of the freedom and independence of the American press we were at a loss to understand how the bankers could promise, in advance, that newspapers would print regular information about the Salvador loan and could even specify the wording in which the news would be presented. But we were forgetting the Commercial. Perhaps its pages contain the "intelligent press propaganda" referred to. Possibly in its columns we will find in due time the news of Salvador's custom-house receipts, as promised by the bankers.

NOTHING in all our war profiteering seems quite so callous as the graft, intrigue, and chicanery in the service specially organized to assist the broken and discouraged victims of the European conflict. The inquiry of a special committee of the Senate into the Veterans' Bureau has only begun, but details have already come to light which more than justify the complaints which The Nation has made against it. Colonel Charles R. Forbes, formerly director of the Veterans' Bureau, has not at this writing been heard in his defense, but almost incredible charges of jobbery, fraud, and waste have been made against him by various witnesses. A builder's agent told of one-third of the net profits on the construction of a group of Western hospitals going to Colonel Forbes, and another witness cited an architect's fee of $64,000 paid for plans that were never used. America has spent money enough on her war wounded to have cared for them adequately. For the fiscal year 1922 alone the Veterans' Bureau expended $467,000,000. Yet the wounded, the sick, the shell-shocked have been shamefully deceived and disillusioned. They have had to resort to political pull to get less than justice. For them the word patriotism must mean ghastly hypocrisy and greed.

OUR friend Mr. Christopher Morley suspects us of being pessimistic at times, but never have we uttered anything so gloomy as the prediction of two professors of Johns Hopkins University that by the year 2000 New York City will have a population of 29,000,000. We prophesy that it will have nothing of the kind, and as we shan't be alive then to be confronted with our words—if wrong—we feel we can be as emphatic about our position as we like. These two worthy investigators have doubtless spent many weeks in arriving at the figures whose validity we deny offhand; only, like many other statisticians, their arithmetic is good but their assumptions are bad. Their estimate rests on the assurance that New York is going on for seventy-seven years at the same rate and in the same direction as now—in other words, that it is not going to learn anything during the remainder of this century. We are more hopeful. We suspect that many people are already beginning to realize, however dimly, that the modern city is one of the monstrosities of an industrial age, and that as we approach a better economic system we shall also find a more rational, more human way of life

BUT while we refuse to believe in a city of 29,000,000 inhabitants, we sorrowfully concede the probability of another appalling estimate which has come to our notice. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace reports that to file such publications on the World War as have a claim to preservation as source material for the historian would require 200 miles of book-shelves. We not only admit this may be true but we fear that some American collector will one day insist upon bringing them all together in a single building. We don't know just how the future is going to deal with that 200-mile book-shelf. Perhaps it may perfect standardized processes which can be applied to intellectual quantity production just as we now apply such means to the material world. In that case it would be possible to mobilize five thousand of our college youth to read one hundred days apiece at the 200-mile book-shelf, each sorting out by mathematical formula a few primary facts which would then be mechanically put together in a 50,000-word one-volume outline of the World War, guaranteed by the United States Bureau of Standards to be free from prejudice or untruth. We should not, of course, read such an outline, but we should give it a place so prominent in our library that friends (who do not know us very well) would think we had. We should not read it because we doubt if this rarefied quintessence of the 200-mile book-shelf would give us any more light on the World War than two words—ignorance and selfishness.

Much Ado About Nothing

CAREFUL study of Mr. Hughes's much-touted aide-memoire concerning possible American participation in a European conference, and of M. Poincaré's remarks explaining what is called his acceptance of the proposal force us to the reluctant conclusion that, as a matter of fact, Mr. Hughes did not propose anything and that M. Poincaré did not accept it. Colonel George Harvey, who had just resigned as American Ambassador in London, and Premier Jan Smuts, who, after all, holds his office in the Union of South Africa, which is a long way from the Rhine, made excellent and impressive speeches, suggesting that it would be desirable if something should happen. Lord Curzon and Mr. Hughes then made public an exchange of notes in which they had indulged previous to the speeches, and the newspapers of the world, excited by the Smuts and Harvey speeches, proceeded to shout from the house-tops that the correspondence indicated that great things were about to happen. M. Poincaré then somewhat dramatically agreed to do what he had always been willing to do, and the newspapers humbly choralled Glory, Hallelujah! It is worth while, however, turning aside from the newspaper racket to study the documents in the case.

On October 12 Lord Curzon, stirred to optimism by an exaggerated report of what President Coolidge had said about Mr. Lloyd George's appeal for action, informed the Government of the United States, with that pompous gravity which only a diplomat can maintain, that "There does not appear to be among the European Powers that unity of thought which either renders common action feasible or will be successful in finding an early solution." This, even Lord Curzon may have suspected, had been observed by many Americans. He continued cautiously that "The co-operation of the United States Government is an essential condition of any real advance toward a settlement," and "United action . . . is the common desideratum." Then in a series of questions he suggested an immediate joint international inquiry.

Secretary Hughes replied no less cautiously, somewhat limiting the vague field to which Lord Curzon seemed to invite him. He began by saying that he still believed, as he had believed last December, that Germany's capacity to pay should be determined by a commission of experts. "Present conditions," he said, "make it imperative that a suitable financial plan should be evolved to prevent economic disaster in Europe." Therefore, "the Government of the United States is entirely willing to take part in an economic conference in which the European Allies chiefly concerned in German reparations participate, for the purpose of considering the questions of the capacity of Germany to make reparations payments and an appropriate final plan for securing such payments." Such a conference, he added, should be purely advisory and bind no government; and it must not touch the sacred cow of the Allied debts to America.

Lord Curzon, then, seemed to suggest, though his note was perhaps intentionally ambiguous, a general conference of the Great Powers. Mr. Hughes simply reiterated his New Haven proposal as made in December, 1922. He proposed a conference of experts named by the governments.

Poincaré did not accept even that. He graciously agreed to permit the Reparation Commission to do what it already had the power to do, and had done rather futilely once before—convoke a commission of experts of various nationalities, to be named by the Reparation Commission, on which the Franco-Belgian group now has a majority vote. The text of this so-called consent has not yet been published; we must deduce it from Poincaré's Sampigny speech, in which he specified first, that the experts must not be permitted to reduce the French reparation claim against Germany; second, that the inquiry must assume a continuing French occupation of the Ruhr; and third, that the experts must not demand new French concessions.

In other words, M. Poincaré agreed to the formation of an expert commission on two conditions—first, that he have a veto power in its composition, and second, that it be pledged in advance to do nothing.

We do not know why Mr. Hughes did not publish his correspondence with Lord Curzon when it occurred. His reply to Lord Curzon reached the public eleven days after it had been transmitted. It was in the intervening period that Mr. Harvey and General Smuts made their speeches. Colonel Harvey, it will be recalled, explained that "We are ready to come in, as the saying is, as soon as we are asked, but surely we cannot be expected to smash in the door." It can hardly be said that Mr. Hughes did more than try the knob; he certainly did not put his shoulder to it and shove. And M. Poincaré did not do much more than peek through the letter-slot.

In the light of this summary of the facts let us return to General Smuts's speech:

> Drift will be fatal. Half-measures, palliatives, expedients such as politicians resort to when hard pressed, will no longer avail anything. . . . The time has come for the convocation of a great conference of the Powers who are mainly interested in the reparation question, and at this conference the governments of the Powers should be directly represented. The situation is much too difficult and threatening to be dealt with by any subordinate authorities. Neither the Reparation Commission nor even the Council of the League of Nations should be called upon to deal with it. They have not the authority or the responsibility which rests on the governments of the Powers. It is a business for principals, not for agents.

General Smuts was right. The sickening decay of Europe was accelerating in those ten days before Mr. Hughes made public his note; it is accelerating while palaver continues about the meaning of M. Poincaré's conditions; men and women will be starving, and fighting each other in their hunger, while the experts are assembling, and more will die after the experts have reported, when the governments begin discussing the question in how far their purely advisory reports should be accepted. What General Smuts proposed is not being done—not at all. The French will stay in the Ruhr; the ruin will continue; the hullabaloo about the intervention of America has accomplished nothing. When it is all over we shall be asked to help feed the starving, and they will sorely need our help.

Some day we may be able to take a more realistic part in the European mess. But editorial-writers and statesmen waste breath in talking of effective American cooperation until this country acquires a more unanimous conviction regarding the French crime in the Ruhr, and until we make up our minds to use the inter-Allied debts not merely as a stuffed club but as a bargaining-counter.

International Missionaries

WHEN, as Mr. Robson recently testified in The Nation, American college students still ask "Do most people in England wear monocles?" and "Is Czecho-Slovakia a province of Russia and is its capital Vladivostok?" one should welcome every effort to rift the thick fog of ignorance which envelops foreign affairs. Yet one felt a certain reserve about last summer's attempts to inform American youth upon European manners, morals, and problems.

Columbia University's list of summer lecturers, for instance, while it did not include the names of Bakhmetieff, Admiral Rogers, and the benevolent British imperialists who preached their gospels in Williamstown, inspired scant enthusiasm. The emissaries of Poincaré and Mussolini and their English colleagues among the educational missionaries at Columbia were but exalted press agents, more interested in winning sympathy than in imparting knowledge. The thousands of young men and women who gathered for their courses learned less what makes up France and Italy and England than what serves as excuse for the questionable activities of those countries.

In lecture-halls and in newspaper interviews the professors substituted the stunts of war-time propaganda for academic instruction. Instead of explaining their people and their heroes, they dragged out far-fetched and insignificant national common denominators to serve as pleas for American favor; in place of interpretation of each nation's peculiar contribution to universal culture and civilization, they dusted off the catchwords and the popular prejudices that supplant rational thought. They defended Mussolini, Poincaré, and Curzon, rather than explained them.

In all true friendliness we may point out that this is not the way to achieve international amity and understanding. The American people are growing wary of catchpenny devices and they may become impatient at betrayed opportunities. It is nonsense to cry that the literary destiny of two great republics is one and inseparable because of the striking similarity in the coiffure of Whitman and Verlaine, Poe and Prévost; one might as well announce that the ideals of Italy differ not a hair's breadth from the aims of America because Grant and Garibaldi favored the same brand of Bourbon.

What we wish to know and what we should be taught without diplomatic evasion by French, Italian, and British representatives is the temper of a race which will bleed its dearest veins and suffer its leaders to sharpen the knife again and again, which possesses the clearest and the most humanitarian thinkers in the world and yet undertakes one of the most sottish adventures in modern history; the nature of a people that reconciles the ideals of national sentiment and intellectual enthusiasm with jingoistic pride and insensate passion, of love of humanity and worship of democracy with cruel egoism and despotic demagogy, paying equal homage to Dante and D'Annunzio, Mazzini and Mussolini; the character of a nation which is achieving at once peaceful industrial revolution and imperial aggrandizement.

Our international teachers should be men aware of their countries' virtues, but also recognizing their weaknesses and fighting for their highest ideals. It is significant that a student organization rather than a great and endowed university should have sought men of this character. Such delegates came to America last year as members of the European Student Mission. At the invitation of the National Student Forum students from Holland, Germany, and Czecho-Slovakia visited some thirty American colleges and universities lecturing on the plight, the struggles, and the aspirations of their fellow-countrymen. Last summer a group of American students returned the visit, seeing what the Youth Movement was doing on the Continent and coming home ready to report on the hopes and ideals, not of governments but of the coming generation. There is today a constant interchange of students between Scandinavian and American universities, and Latin American students are coming in increasing numbers to our colleges.

Here are the true international missionaries. More than the statesmen and professors these unofficial ambassadors of good-will are helping establish international fraternity. May the good work, unspoiled by governmental guidance and official propaganda, spread.

The Personality of Ships

OF all inanimate objects a ship is the most alive; of all things impersonal it is the most human. It is not, to be sure, the only inanimate object to which we attribute life and personality. A locomotive is commonly spoken of as "she," although with not the same universality and conviction. Nor does a locomotive inspire an equal amount or degree of affection. Such a splendid piece of machinery does, of course, beget respect and fondness from those who handle it, but who can say that it engenders the affection that a sailor is accustomed to lavish on a ship, or the sentiment that even the world at large is inclined to show toward almost any kind of a vessel?

And our more recent inventions—who ascribes to them any personality at all? An electric dynamo is a scientific wonder, but does anybody refer to it as "she"? An automobile is a marvel of mechanical perfection, but does it call forth a spark of affection? An automobile is not endeared to its owner with the years; age and service give it no claim on his affections. A new car is the only one that can command even the respect of its owner, who has barely purchased one model before he begins to plan to junk it for another. The peculiar attitude which a sailor takes toward a ship is commented on by David W. Bone in "The Lookoutman":

> To him, a seaworthy vessel is quite unlike any other structure fashioned by man. He sees her as a sentient creature with a decided personality; a spirited rover of wide seas, possessing qualities no less resourceful and adventurous than his own; a creature to be humored and admired (or perhaps forced and cursed) as her tricks and moods and tempers become revealed to him. For this belief, the circumstances of her birth are sufficient warrant. Conceived in the studious and creative mind of her designer, erected in patient exactitude by her builders, trimmed and riveted and fashioned into a complete and wonderful whole by the skill and craftsmanship of her artisans, she comes to the sea world with sponsors and guarantors enough. Surely, some intangible essence, some spirit of all these labors at her birth—the conceptive thought, skilled direction, the sweat and strain of toiling hammermen—must pass into her shapely hull as it grows upon the stocks. And when, at length, she is named and launched, and floats upon the river reach—a noble vessel, powerful, buoyant, inspired by the stir and circumstance of her baptism—the cheering shipyard workers must feel that a part of themselves goes out abroad with this wonderful product of their hands.

And yet do not the circumstances of her use, even more than those of her birth, give personality and character to a ship—inspire for her the tribute of human affection? A man is for long periods closer to a ship, more removed from other things, more dependent on her than is true of any other object. Is not this the cause of a sailor's peculiar and intimate affection for a ship? And this may explain, too, why a ship must always be "she." For even the liner, as Kipling says, is a lady. No matter how huge or powerful, a steamship is still feminine. No matter, either, what individual name the vessel bears. The President Grant and the Giulio Cesare are as inflexibly "she" as the Bonnie Kate and the Flying Belle.

Personal and feminine a ship is, and is probably destined to remain. So long, at least, as sailors survive. For a sailor is a simple and romantic soul—he would not go to sea otherwise—who despite mechanical progress in seafaring refuses to become an automaton. The modern steamship, it is said, has turned him from a skilled craftsman into a housemaid; and yet the net of skill, knowledge, and responsibility required of a ship's company is greater than ever. Today, as always, a sailor is a mystic who must have a religion. He will quarrel with an individual woman, but he adores the sex. He will curse a specific vessel, but he worships ships. Ships are his gods—and they are all feminine deities.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1923 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier that Saturday, December 1, and not later than Monday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 13, 1924.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

The Curse of Work

By WALTER N. POLAKOV

CHARLES P. STEINMETZ is dead. The big heart in the ill-shaped body has ceased to pulsate. Work killed the brain. Such is the symbol and the last lesson taught us by this engineering genius of the age.

"Work is a curse! The chief aim of society should be to abolish work." Such was the slogan of the "wizard of Schenectady," as the newspapers unfailingly called him, and it is indeed the aim of every engineer worthy of the title to reduce the drudgery of work, to relegate it to beasts and machines, and to emancipate man, placing him on the dignified level of a human being.

Steinmetz was known and loved far beyond the boundaries of this country. His name carried with it the implication of more than an "engineer." He was a man—therein lay his greatness. Because he was a man, he could not fail to be a socialist, and latterly he freely contributed of the treasure of his knowledge to building up Russia and its promise. Because he was a man and socialist he worked as an engineer. He often stated that the aim of engineering is to control the forces of nature for the well-being of mankind. What are these "forces of nature"? Are they limited to "non-human nature," or do they embrace as well the forces of "human nature"? On this point Steinmetz never wavered.

In interviews that were broadcasted across two continents he sharply defined the goal of success for the engineer—"to find out how human forces work." "For only then," according to Steinmetz, "can we expect any great human progress." That is why he became such a warm supporter of Korzybski's theory of man; that is why he was so persistent in his condemnation of a form of society which "is organized about property instead of human life."

His engineering work was clearly guided by this lucid vision of man liberated from the drudgery of daily toil. It was the system that considered men as "factory hands" that he indefatigably sought to discredit in the popular mind. It was the ideal of man as time-binder, as a creator of the world of ideas, as a director of the incarnate forces of nature which was the compass of his striving.

Mathematics and electricity were his tools. Mathematics, because it is the only natural method of thinking for mankind. It does not depend on fickle emotions and deceiving senses; no potentate or dictator can legislate the laws of mathematics and nature out of human life. Electricity, because its immaterial field so subtly penetrates our life, because its power is so serviceable to mankind, because it replaces with ease the ponderous mass of old, clumsy mechanical devices requiring so much human toil. With these tools he hoped to see the work-day reduced to four hours and to give to the man in the street and the man in the mill time to become truly human.

Steinmetz's achievements are many and mighty. Merely to enumerate them would be beyond the limit of this brief tribute. It may safely be said that at least one-third of the practical attainments in this branch of engineering within the last twenty years was directly or indirectly due to his researches or to his method of reckoning possibilities.

A beast may leave to his children a will: "Do as I did." A man like Steinmetz gives a command: "Do better."

Germany's Darkest Week

(Special Radiogram to The Nation)

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Berlin, October 29

SATURDAY ended the blackest week in the history of Germany with the indefensible ultimatum from Berlin to Dresden which, having been rejected, will now lead to additional dangerous complications, quite possibly to the retirement of Stresemann. It seems impossible that the Social Democrats can stand for the ousting of the Saxon Government determined on last night.

The International Puzzle: Who Has the Ball?

It is now perfectly plain that the alleged disorders in Saxony are the merest excuse to crush a Government devoted to the republican ideal and really representing the proletariat of Saxony. It is just as if Coolidge had sent a general to command Oklahoma because he did not like Walton and his associates. Whether the Saxon workers will submit without most dangerous manifestations is a question complicated by the presence of three hundred and fifty thousand Saxon unemployed. The general belief now is that Stresemann will eventually be succeeded by an extreme militarist dictator, which will probably precipitate civil war. Even now it is hard to believe that the Reds will quietly submit to the ousting of Zeigner, who has been moderate and by his influence has checked the violence of some of his Communist associates. Any action against him must be read in connection with the events in Bavaria which have become very threatening since the ultimatum ordering Bavaria to restore the Reichswehr. The Bavarians threaten to establish a new Reich government and believe themselves divinely appointed to purge Germany of all Jews and Socialists—having already expelled over two hundred Jews, some of long residence—and then to make war on France. It seems a curious time for Stresemann to be showering ultimatums on his countrymen when the Reich is collapsing and the Rhine provinces are lost—they are lost even before French recognition of that preposterous government of adventurers and traitors upheld by paid cutthroats which is everywhere rejected by the mass of the population. Already other disintegrating currents are noticeable. Strong influences are at work in Saxony and Thuringia to take them from the Reich and join them to Czecho-Slovakia.

Meanwhile the worst immediate feature of the situation is the almost complete unemployment in the Ruhr where the starvation of millions is inevitable unless work is resumed, of which there is no prospect today. America must save the innocent men, women, and children who are victims of these terrible forces by sending food and money. The Quakers must come in immediately. The situation in the Ruhr alone would make this coming week blacker than the last. An American correspondent said the other day at Düsseldorf that he "would not know a catastrophe now if it came through the door; it has been scheduled and announced so often and has never materialized." The truth is that the catastrophe here has not come suddenly like the Japanese earthquake to horrify the world but has come gradually. Hence it cannot be realized in all its magnitude even by us in Berlin. But the collapse is now here and is no longer to be avoided. A small ray of hope came from the move by England and America to call a new conference, but the limitations on this by France devitalize it precisely as the life was taken out of the Genoa Conference. Even if the conference were to be free it is much too late to prevent starvation.

Former optimists are now completely pessimistic and say anything may happen, but he is a fool who would prophesy one week ahead. There is no immediate danger of a Communist uprising. The Hamburg effort was abortive. If a Communist uprising should come it would be the signal for immediate aggressive action by Bavaria and reactionary East Prussia. The Russians here who supply the German Communists with arms, money, and leadership are not ready for a Communist uprising now. They prefer chaos and Right dictatorship for a while but realize that if French policy continues, together with the total collapse of Germany, Russia will herself be menaced by France.

America's duty is first to send food and aid to the perishing, next to arouse world opinion against France, the chief offender. As it looks now the German people are destined for suffering and civil war, and to lose millions by bloodshed and starvation. It is impossible to exaggerate the situation or to portray what may come. A large part may yet be averted if the Anglo-Saxons act.

The New Russian Women*

By MAGDELEINE MARX

I. The Working Woman

I HAVE often promised myself never to fall into the pretentious error of describing "the woman" of such or such a country. Nothing irritates me so much as the arbitrary generalizations which reveal here a faultlessly attired doll passing as the "Frenchwoman"; there the ponderous, matronly, sentimental figure of the "German woman"; or as the authentic product of the British Isles, a blonde, masculine, itinerant creature; or the American woman, symbolized simply by a tennis racquet, a shower of diamonds, or a billionaire husband. And yet . . .

I am in Russia, land of the white bear, the reindeer, and the tiger, land of monstrous tropical flowers and Polar lichens, land of Arctic and Oriental peoples, infinite land. In the streets of Sebastopol I encounter exquisite girls with eyes of black enamel and slender ankles who resemble our own girls of southern France. On the shores of Batum I admire, against an Alpine-tropical background, perfect, bronzed bodies stretched naked in the sun. In the cool shadows of Tiflis bazaars are Georgian girls reminiscent of the princesses of the "Thousand and One Nights." In Azerbeijan I find the furtive silhouettes of women in black charchaf. I come upon the savage descendant of the Kirghizes and the Tcherkesses, upon the Siberian peasant of the shy glance and Mongolian cheek, upon the lily-like girl of Archangel, of the thistle-blue eyes and hair too pale. The months go by. I live the daily life of the Soviet regime. And slowly I come to realize that I was mistaken; that what is superficial and false in other countries is true in this land where new social statutes, affecting the lives of all the women, give them access to full liberty, yield them new privileges and new obligations, give a new spirit to all of them.

In the midst of this complete rearrangement of life, what has become of the working woman, the peasant, the intellectual who in her youth knew only prison walls? What does the princess think who, only a short time ago, under the triple rod of rank, etiquette, and husband, made Russia the playground of her charms and caprices?

To understand any of these classes of women, it is essential to become familiar with the new marriage laws which now order the lives of the women in Soviet Russia. Before the revolution, the religious form of marriage alone existed in Russia. Today only civil marriage is legal. Nothing is more simple or more easy than the marriage formalities—a mere declaration of intention, a certificate of identity. The widest liberty is accorded to both: "If one party changes residence, the other is not obliged to follow." "The act of marriage does not imply community of property between the parties."

And definite security is accorded to both by the marriage act: "The needy husband or wife, that is, lacking in the minimum needs of subsistence, or the invalid husband or wife, has the right to demand the support of his or her partner, provided the latter is capable of giving assistance."

Regarding children: "The father and mother share their rights over the offspring." Who can forget the pages in which Gorki, telling of his childhood, describes the awe-stricken mother who helplessly had to watch the play of the knout which was lacerating the flesh of her unhappy child and see the blood spurt from under the whip plied by their drunken lord and master?

If it is an easy matter to contract a legal marriage, it is just as easy to obtain freedom. The act of divorce, like that of marriage, is a simple formality. "Divorce can be based as well on the mutual consent of the couple as on the expressed wish of only one of the parties." And since there are women who prefer to remain outside the pale of marriage entirely, the Soviet law takes pains to protect them in case of motherhood, making the father equally responsible for the care of the child.

Such a unique atmosphere must lead to the development of a new type of womanhood. Knowing this, we may be able to find, not "the Russian woman" but something at least of the spirit and mentality revealed by the working woman, the peasant, the intellectual, as well as the woman of the old aristocracy and the new bourgeoisie.

It is winter. Shod in the traditional valenki of coarse felt which, at a distance, gives them the clumsy, measured swing of plantigrades, wearing sheepskin with the fleece inside and rabbit-skin caps with long ear-flaps, two women are busily sweeping the court, the approach, and the doorway of the main building of the Goujon factory, an important metal works in the suburbs of Moscow.

They do not know the visitor who approaches, slipping clumsily on the icy pavement, and yet, from afar, they smile. Here I can safely generalize: this frank, cordial welcome is a characteristic of the women of the Russian masses. I visit the works—a gigantic cavern illuminated at regular intervals by great bursts of flame. After crossing a long shop in which the workers pass cubes of glowing iron from one machine to another with the swiftness and expertness of prestidigitators, I come to the women's section. Though their work is infinitely less difficult, it is nevertheless trying and unhealthy. In a heavy, oil-soaked atmosphere, among machine belts, greasy lathes, and grimy window-panes, amid the incessant panting of machines, black and grimy themselves, they file bolts and put the finishing touches to rivets and nails.

I have scarcely been among them five minutes when a sudden silence falls. It is eleven o'clock and work has ceased for the luncheon hour. The score of women in this part of the shop rise slowly, each draws from a hidden drawer an oxidized iron goblet or a chipped cup and begins undoing a little package or an old basket. One spreads before her a pickled herring, two huge slices of bread crammed with potatoes and a pickle; her neighbor lays out on her knee a feast of meat-balls, a piece of cheese, and a raw apple. "Would you like to take tea with us?" ventures a young girl in a black smock, who comes in carrying a pot of boiling water with which she skilfully fills the cups held out to her.

Delighted, I sit down on a bench which seems to be thrust behind me from nowhere. They seem as pleased with me as I am with them. A crust of bread in one hand, a steaming cup in the other, they have formed a circle, and, as my first words reveal my halting Russian and my frightful French accent, they break into laughter like a lot of children. I warn them that I want to question them. I pass over the question of employment. I know that the workers are exclusively engaged through the Workers' Exchange by means of a collective or individual contract. But what are their work hours here?

* This is the first of a series of three articles on women in Soviet Russia. Succeeding articles will deal with The Intellectual and The Aristocrat.

Eight hours, as everywhere: from eight o'clock in the morning to five in the afternoon, with an hour's pause for lunch. Girls between the ages of sixteen and eighteen are obliged to work only six hours, but all are above that age in this shop.

And how much do they earn? I am familiar with the collective principle which regulates the production of the Russian proletariat. In every class valuation commissions determine the amount of labor which each worker in each class must furnish daily. Those who produce below this determined amount receive a diminished wage. In general these wage standards are fixed by a commission composed of an equal number of workers and employers.

One by one the women tell me their wages. Modified monthly by a scale established in advance and keeping pace as closely as possible with the fluctuation in the cost of living, their wages, calculated of course on the same scale for both men and women, vary from 120,000,000 to 160,000,000 rubles a month. It is little. At the current cost of living it is enough, but scarcely enough, to assure a livelihood.

I turn to one of the women whom the others call Natacha, a beautiful woman with regular features but with a complexion spoiled by the lack of air and by fatigue. I ask if she has any children.

"O yes, I have three, besides a fourth from the Volga, which we adopted last year. Ah, if you had seen him when we took him! He is much better now and goes to school with our two elder children. The third is here in the nursery. Would you like to see him?"

We traverse the court, encumbered with rolls of iron wire, with rusted debris powdered with snow, and Natacha precedes me into the interior of a little house. We enter a warmly heated room. Some thirty babies sleep, chatter, or squall in as many white little cots.

"There, that's my Petia!" And her extended arms indicate proudly a tawny little fellow who beats the air with his arms. "I bring him here in the morning, and twice during the day I come to nurse him."

"What are you doing here? This isn't your time," scolds a woman in a white smock who rushes out of a neighboring room, whence issues an odor of boiled milk and where one espies rows of nipples on shelves. Natacha, who has been arrested in the midst of her effort to raise the child from its cot, drops him gently, with a parting murmur of galoubchik (little dove), and we hurry out of the room like two children caught at mischief.

As we walk, Natacha tells me that she had nearly died in bearing her child but that she had been lucky enough to receive excellent care.

"Where?"

"Where do you think? At the hospital, of course." And she explains that during the last weeks of pregnancy, during confinement, and for three months after childbirth, all working women receive free care.

When we reenter the shop, we find the young girl who had been pouring tea reading a newspaper aloud to the rest.

"Our paper," she explained proudly, showing me the title, "The Working Woman, a newspaper written by and for working women."

While slowly sipping the cup of tea into which an unseen hand had sliced small bits of apple to improve the taste, I listen to them as they sketch their simple lives. Natacha is not unhappy. She is married to a furnace worker who, laboring at night, earns 300,000,000 rubles a month. They live nearby, in one of the brick barracks in the vicinity of the works. They have two rooms for the six of them, and in the evening, on returning from work, she sets the water boiling on the primus for the tea, with a bit of bread and cheese, and at times an egg, that constitutes their dinner.

How can they buy the clothes they require? I have often enough visited the markets of Moscow, studied the shop-windows, and it seemed to me impossible for them to clothe themselves on the money they earned. All speaking at once, they explain that they get their clothes at the Cooperatives, where the price is . . .

Natacha, whose voice dominates, tries to be scrupulously precise. "Let's see, about half as dear? No, let's say two-thirds of the prices obtaining in the market. And, besides, it's easy," she adds, smiling. "We simply don't buy any clothes." And I learn that the threadbare caftan which envelops her shoulders and which gives her the air of a female Cossack has behind it a history of fifteen years.

And what do they do evenings, Sundays? Have they any distractions?

"This evening I'm going to the Grand Theater," gaily exclaims a young girl who, until then, had been silent. "I'm going to see the 'Tales of Czar Saltan.' I've never seen it, have you?"

"Yes," says Natacha, then turning to me: "You see, every month the union distributes a certain number of theater tickets, and you can guess what a scramble there is for them. And then there are excursions during the summer, group visits to museums, lectures. But, above all, there are the evening courses where we all try to complete our education. You know, it didn't amount to an awful lot before." "But there are also those who do not seek distraction, and who think only of propaganda," interrupts a woman whose slim, ardent lines are lost in the folds of a khaki frock.

I ask a question which has been burning on my lips but which I have forced back: What part do they take in politics; what do they think, from a political point of view, of Russia today? There is amazement in the faces about me.

"How can you ask such a question? Is it possible that there are foreigners who imagine any form of government other than the Soviets could exist for the Russian people?" This time it is an old woman who speaks, a woman whose yellow, corroded hands emerge, gesticulating, from an oil-spotted apron. "We don't live like lords and ladies, that you can see, but at least we have the right to hold our heads up. But before! Look, you don't know. We weren't human beings. We were worse than cattle. Ah, I can see you don't know how things were—before. Look, me, I couldn't read and they taught me. Things about politics, they explain them to us women now, and we understand. But I'm wrong to speak of myself. I don't count. I'm too old. But I've three daughters. Marie, I haven't seen her since last summer. She was getting thin, she was pale and always exhausted. So they made her go to Petrograd, in the Islands. Do you know the Islands?"

Ostrovski, Kamenski, on the shore of the green Baltic, come back to my mind: the leafy islands where flitted the heroines of Pushkin, the sumptuous villas nestling in the foliage, transformed now into nurseries for the young or rest-homes for the workers.

"If we still had the Czar, wouldn't Marie be dead now? Now she's working in Petrograd, in the pottery works, and she's going to marry a young fellow in the navy. I have another daughter, Vera, appointed by the union to study at the Pokrovsky Institute. She wants to be a children's doctor. Would all that have been possible—before?

"It's much more than just that. It's a pity I can't talk well, to make you understand. You see us all here, and you think that's as it should be; for you it's as though nothing has changed. Look, Moussia, recite your Proletcult. Listen, you must. That's it. She'll tell you."

Shy and obstinate, Moussia amuses herself by making little bread pellets on the table, and it is from her comrades that I learn that she has already "made" a poem which is to be published. I beg her to recite, but in vain.

If for the sake of the veracity of my account I feel it necessary to gather the truth from their lips, I am nevertheless persuaded, after a thousand proofs, that the Russian working women are devoted with all their souls to the present regime and that the majority of them are even savagely revolutionary.

Before my eyes there passes the interminable pageant of working women on the fifth anniversary of the Soviet Republic. I see them again, arm in arm, forming a wide stream of scarlet heads in Red Square. I hear their songs, their shouts. I see their faces gleam as they pass before the tribune where stands Trotzky. . . .

Several days before I had called on a working woman in the modest room which she occupies in the Kremlin. She holds an important position in the Communist Party and in the Syndicates. Austere, severe, leading the life of an ascetic, sleeping four hours a night, she is the perfect type of the working woman who has become a Communist leader. She is thirty years old, married to a militant much in the public eye.

To the observer she is an alert girl who, having worked for twelve years in factories in New York, retains in her countenance and especially in her handclasp much of the American woman. Her words come back to me now as the logical conclusion to my visit in that shop.

"You see," she said, "from a material point of view, our working women lead a more dismal life perhaps than their French sisters. They are less well fed and certainly less well lodged and more poorly dressed than the American working woman. But what you must understand is that their present hardships represent an enormous advance over the utter poverty of the past. And from a spiritual point of view, as far as liberty and human dignity and faith in the future are concerned, it is as though a whole century had been skipped.

"Besides," she added, smiling and watching the drift of the smoke from her cigarette, "our country is the only one, at any rate, where feminism has no reason for existence. Though there may remain some things which time alone will achieve, there is one question which has been definitely realized—the liberation of woman."

Lenin, and the Prize Pig

By DOROTHY BREWSTER

Moscow, September 27

THE European Student Relief workers said that there was a little pavilion at the Agricultural Exposition where one could sit on Persian rugs and drink Turkish coffee. It was that prospect, not any interest in agriculture, that drew us out one afternoon to the grounds of the All-Russian Agricultural Exposition on the other side of the Moscow River. "Agricultural" means much more than threshing machines and pigs. We discovered that long before we found the coffee—which turned out to be tea.

It means Lenin, for one thing. No one can miss his portrait just inside the gates: giant size, all worked out very cleverly with plants of different shades and colors. One soon becomes convinced in Russia that it is only a matter of time before there will be Lenin ikons. We followed signs directing us to "Lenin's Corner." This was a small building devoted to a poster and cartoon history of the revolutionary and labor movement, before and after 1917. The earlier posters—pictures of strikes, evil factory conditions, massacres, punitive expeditions—made up a Chamber of Horrors that recalled Gorki's "Mother" and Andreev's "Seven Who Were Hanged." Those of recent years recorded the fight against counter-revolution, the efforts to stimulate production and to educate the workers. Lenin was speaking from every wall in every room.

We were glad to escape from Lenin into the attractive "Kustarni" building, filled with beautiful samples of all the peasant handicrafts of Russia: carved wooden utensils and fascinating little boxes, humorously painted toys and nested dolls, colorful embroideries, homespun linen, native costumes, laces and lacquered ware. They were suspicious of their guests here, for they took away at the door not only our brief cases, but even our little handbags.

Still searching for the coffee, we found ourselves in a sort of village, with huts and cottages and outhouses. The first hut we entered was a dark, tiny, thatched den with a mud floor and bare plank beds—the peasant hut at its worst. The next was larger and lighter, with a separate apartment for the family cow or pig. Another was better still, with a plank floor, several windows, three rooms, and a stove really adequate to accommodate the family. A pleasant-faced peasant woman sat at her embroidery in one corner, under an ikon, with the little lamp burning. There were bright quilts and embroidered towels and other signs of relative prosperity. And so on through this poverty and progress exhibit, until we came to the model of what the peasant cottage should be, two-storied and spacious. This last was just a dream of the future, if one may trust countryside impressions from a railway-coach window.

A graceful, cream-colored stucco building, with lovely blue minarets, was evidently the home of the Turkestan display. The building was closed. But beyond, near the river, a crowd, and odors of roasting meat on the chilly air, attracted us to a spacious shed. That Turkish coffee couldn't be far off. Inside were long boards on trestles, wooden benches, and charcoal braziers. Dark gentlemen, in brilliantly striped garments like bathrobes, with little embroidered caps on the backs of their heads, strung rings of meat on long sticks and held them sizzling over the fires. Others, powdered with flour, rolled out and molded dough on rugs that covered the table. Why didn't the dough stick? That question interested us more than whether the rugs ever saw a vacuum cleaner. Back in the shadows was a big pot-bellied furnace, with a hot fire on its floor. As the rolls were shaped, a half-naked cook skilfully shot them through the jaws of the monster against the inner walls of the furnace, where they stuck miraculously. When the inside was completely tiled with the rolls, the baker shut the door, wiped off the sweat on his apron, ate a slice of watermelon, and chaffed the waiting crowd. Presently the tiles were perfectly browned and he picked them off with a poker. We took some across to the pavilion, where we squatted on carpets, drank tea from brass pots, and nibbled at dried apricots. They were the best rolls I had in Europe. I should like to import a company of these artists to set up a rival exhibit next to Childs Fifth Avenue pancake window.

The New Seal of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics

The inscriptions on the wreath contain the words "Workers of the World Unite" in six languages, Russian, Ukrainian, White Russian, Georgian, Armenian, Turkoman.

My Russian interpreter has a young sister studying at the University of Kazan to be an "agronome," an agricultural expert. For her sake we started out one day to find the prize pig. We found nearly everything else first—textiles, fish, leather, wine, furs, music. Resisting the temptation of strains of Tchaikovski coming from the big music pavilion, we went on to the exhibit of the Narkompros—the People's Commissariat of Education.

Here every graphic device of chart, map, diagram, poster, cartoon, and model is utilized to rouse the interest of the peasant visitor and to reach his intelligence. I liked the contrasting posters of the old life and the new, some tragic, many with a kind of sly humor, all vivid. The ragged children, the tumbledown cottages, the lean cattle, the poor crops, the vodka shops—all of this, my interpreter assured me, was not exaggerated in the pictures. A priest praying for rain versus peasants intelligently irrigating their fields is a sample of the "look upon this picture and on this" appeal. And I understood the big circular charts divided into sectors to show the proportion of crops harvested in successive years. One didn't need to be literate to comprehend them. The potatoes were there, for instance—little pink new ones, deftly stuck on the proper sector. Sectors of brown sand revealed the distressingly large areas uncultivated in recent famine years. Models of farm buildings made a fascinating toy countryside. But I was so much less intelligent about all this than the most illiterate peasant that I left my interpreter to study them, and wandered about watching the peasants themselves.

They all looked interested, these small groups of peasants, men and women, who were being taken about by efficient young Communist guides. I was told that some six thousand of them visit the exhibition every week. They are brought in relays from different sections of the country, at the expense of the government. A country school teacher who had accompanied a party from his own village described their trip. They had been joined by others en route, till they numbered nine hundred. When they arrived in Moscow, they were met by members of the trade union that was to entertain them during their stay. The entertainment began with baths. Part of the program was a visit to the map factory where the hosts worked. This visit particularly impressed some of the peasants: they hadn't really believed till then that city workmen "worked." One saw these visiting peasants all over the city, as well as at the exhibition. In the large party of workers who occupied all of one gallery at the opening night of the opera, I noted many bearded peasant faces. And if expression counts for anything, they were thoroughly enjoying the fairy tale of the Snow Maiden.

But we hadn't yet found the pig. We turned toward the hillside, which looked more rural, and on our way visited the camels. Up on the hill among the trees was what looked like an Indian tepee, of bark, with smoke curling up through the opening at the apex. Fascinated Russian children and their mothers were peeping in at the Eskimo baby inside, with its mother and small brother. Nearby was a much larger tent, a hemisphere of skins and wood, very snugly put together—airproof, I should think. The shadowy interior, lighted with a lamp or two, was lined with bright carpets, rugs, and shawls; and squatting around a fire in the center was a solemn Bashkir or Kirghiz family—I forget which. But all these nomads with strange names, members of the Soviet Republic, were there in their appropriate dwellings on the hill. One began to understand why "Russian" has been taken out of the official title of the government: instead of "Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic" (R.S.F.S.R.), it is now "Union of Socialist Soviet Republics" (Union of S.S.R.).

When at last we came to the big barns where the animals were, it was five o'clock and cleaning-up time. There were few horses in the stalls. I wasn't surprised at that, for the Quakers had told me that Russia was nearly ten million horses short. The horses on exhibition were taken away as soon as they were sold. But there were cows and bulls, many of them fine specimens. One huge, white, haughty bull weighed some incredible number of poods. "Krasota! A beauty!" exclaimed a bearded peasant. That bull looked like Zeus when he abducted Europa. And late as it was, there was an admiring throng around the biggest pig, which might have posed as the model for communist cartoons of the bloated bourgeoisie.

"Well, what do you think of the exposition?" I asked my interpreter, who had been keenly observant but noncommittal. She was not prejudiced in favor of the present Government. The Bolsheviki had made her sweep the streets for months. They had threatened to put her baby in an institution. They were now blocking her reentry into the university to complete her medical course. "A very good piece of work," she replied, "even if the Bolos did do it."

As we passed Lenin's portrait on our way out of the grounds, we caught one of those glimpses that make Moscow the most strangely fascinating of cities—the gold domes of the Cathedral of Our Savior and beyond them the cupolas and towers of the Kremlin, gleaming in the sunset. That, as a background for Lenin, was striking. But why did they turn Lenin's face toward the setting sun?

Mister God*

By MAXIM GORKI

AT Sestrotsk, the famous watering-place, there was employed an old man, still handsome and strong despite his sixty years, by name Stepan Prokhorov. He would gaze strangely at people with his bulging, porcelain-like eyes, which sometimes sparkled with too bright and harsh a luster, but could smile warmly and grow very gentle.

Prokhorov's general attitude toward people gave rise to the impression that he considered himself more wise than any of them. He moved about cautiously and spoke in a quiet voice, as if everyone around him were asleep and he feared to disturb them. He went about his tasks sedately, indefatigably, and willingly; and when his work was done, he would not hesitate to do the work of his comrades. When one or another of the employees of the baths would ask him to assist in some task, Prokhorov, who was in general a man of few words, would reply slowly and reassuringly, "Very well, I'll do it, brother. I'll do it. Don't worry." And he would perform the other man's work, good-naturedly and without comment, as he might give alms to some good-for-nothing.

He kept himself aloof from others, preferring to be alone; and I do not believe I ever saw him in his leisure moments chatting with his fellow-workers. His esteem among those who knew him was not clearly defined, but generally they appeared to consider him tolerantly as a well-disposed fool.

When I inquired what manner of man Prokhorov was, they would answer, "So, so—an ordinary man." Only the butler, after a little reflection, replied, "The old man is very proud, and he is awfully careful of his appearance."

I invited him, one evening, to join me at tea in my room. The room was large as a barn, with two Venetian windows looking out into the park. It was heated with steam. Every evening the pipes would hiss and rumble, and it would sound as if someone were asking in a stifled whisper, "Do you wish some fish?"

At last the old man arrived, dressed very neatly and carefully in a new pink shirt with a gray jacket and new boots. His broad, gray beard was combed straight, and his hair was plastered on his head with some oily paste which emitted a sharp, pungent odor. He drank his tea and red wine and ate his raspberry jelly very gravely, and spoke in a subdued voice, quite coherently and with unusual ease in expression.

"You have observed correctly," he said. "I am a good man. However, I was born and lived half my life with no love for people in general; and it was only when I lost my faith in Mister God that I became good. This was the result of my persistent success in life. Success pursued me from the day of my birth. My father, a machinist of Mtsensk, said himself, 'Stepanka was born for luck,' because on the day I was born he began to thrive, and opened a shop of his own. I was successful in all my childish sports, and study was to me as play. I never experienced illness, and no trouble ever touched me.

"When I finished school, I immediately obtained a position with excellent people in a rich concern. My employers liked me, and the mistress would say to me, 'Stepan, have a care for yourself; you have ability.' And that was true: my capacities were so great that I surprised even myself. I cured horses of diseases, without understanding what it was that made them suffer. I could train the most unruly dog to walk on its hind legs—and this not by force, but through tenderness.

"I was as successful with women. Any to whom I took a liking was certain to come to me. At twenty-six I was chief clerk, and I am sure I could eventually have become a director of the company. My friend Markevitch, who was like yourself a writer of books, would go into raptures over me and say, 'Prokhorov is a true Russian, like Pursam.' Who Pursam was, I do not know; but Markevitch was a stern judge of people, and his praise was not a matter for jest. I was very pleased with myself, and everything was well with me. I had a little store saved up, and was contemplating marriage. I had even fixed upon a suitable young woman. Then suddenly, quite imperceptibly, I began to become aware of the whole peril of life.

"The most confounding questions began to arise insistently within me. Why was I successful in everything? Why was it only I? Such questions startled me at every turn, until I could not sleep. I would become weary in the middle of the day, like a horse after plowing, and would lie down with eyes wide open, asking myself, 'Why am I successful? Of course, I have abilities; I say my prayers; I am not a fool; I am modest and sober. Nevertheless, there are so many people around me, so much better than I, yet fortune does not come their way.' This much was perfectly clear. And I thought, 'Lord, why do you permit such a condition of things? By these same tokens I lie like a cherry in sugar, and someone may presently eat me up.' From such thoughts as these I could give myself no rest. I felt that in the very success which had thus far marked my life, there was hidden an uncanny something which was enticing me with dainties—to what did it entice me?

"I asked in my heart, 'Where, O Lord, art thou leading me?' But Mister God was silent, silent. . . . Then I determined to live dishonestly for a time, to see what might happen. I took 420 rubles from the vault, remembering that for the theft of more than three hundred rubles one is tried in the District Court. Very well, then, I stole. Naturally, the money was soon missed; and Philip Karlovitch, who was the kindest of men, conducted an inquiry. Nothing could be discovered. Then I contrived in such manner that no one but I could be suspected. I could see that Philip Karlovitch was agitated and in anguish. Why should I make a good man suffer? I asked myself. So I confessed to him that I had stolen the money. He did not believe me. 'You are jesting,' he shouted. Finally, however, I convinced him; and he told the mistress, who became frightened.

" 'What has happened to you, Stepan?' she demanded.

" 'Take me to court,' I replied.

"At this she became so angry that she flushed violently and plucked the trimming of her blouse until it tore. 'To court I will not take you,' she cried, 'but you are behaving so insolently that, as you yourself will realize . . .'

* Translated by William A. Drake and Max Stetsky.

"I did realize, so I left the place. Then I went to Moscow, and from there I returned the money by mail, under another name."

"But why did you do it?" I asked the old man. "Was it because you wanted to experience suffering?"

He raised his eyebrows incredulously and smiled into his beard. Then the smile vanished. "No. Why should I wish to suffer? I desire a quiet life. I was simply overcome with curiosity to know why I was successful. And perhaps it was caution that urged me; perhaps I did it to discover how definite my success really was. Then again, it was possibly only youth. So a man sports with his destiny. But it is not only sport. I had lived exceptionally; I was petted and fondled like a lap dog. On every side of me were people who moaned and complained, yet it seemed that I had been sentenced by Mister God to live a quiet life until the end of my days. Every one about me had all manner of trials, yet I had none, as if I had not merited the ordinary fate of man. That was all, I suppose.

"Well, there I was, lying in a room in a Moscow hotel, thinking. Anyone else they would have dragged to court for one ruble, yet me they had left at liberty with four hundred rubles. It was somewhat comical. Here was luck! But no, I thought to myself; wait! I began to observe the people around me. The hotel was a filthy hole, and the people in it all of questionable appearance; they were actors, gamblers, and loose women. One of them pretended to be a cook; he proved, however, to be a professional burglar. I contrived an acquaintance with him, and asked him how he was making out.

" 'So-so', he replied. 'Sometimes thick, sometimes thin. And at other times there is nothing doing at all.'

"We entered into conversation. 'I am contemplating a little job,' he said, 'but I am in need of good instruments. These instruments are indispensable, but I have no money.'

"Ah, I thought, so that is what he is about! I asked him if he intended anyone's life. He was offended.

" 'What are you talking about?' he exclaimed. 'My head is too precious to me.'

"Well, I gave him the money for the instruments; but stipulated that, for my reward, he should allow me to accompany him on the 'job.' At first he refused and endeavored to dissuade me; but in the end he took me with him.

"I did not find his occupation to my liking. It appeared that we had gone to visit someone who was not at home. The door was opened by a dark-faced girl, whom apparently he knew. He trussed her up at once, hand and foot. Then he began searching the closets. He whistled as he worked. The thing was very simple. We left as we had come, without experiencing the slightest disturbance. The man left Moscow at once, but like a fool I remained. 'Well,' I thought, 'success still pursues me.' The thing was amusing enough, yet it exasperated me.

"A few days later, I went to the theater. As I took my seat in the balcony, I saw the dark-faced girl sitting a few seats away. She was watching the stage, drying her eyes with a handkerchief. During the intermission I went over to her.

" 'Your face is familiar,' I said.

"She did not reply; but when I recalled to her the occasion of our first meeting, she begged me to speak more quietly.

" 'What is troubling you, that you should weep?' I asked her.

" 'I pity the prince so much,' she replied. In the scene some prince was suffering.

"After the performance, she went with me to a traktir, and from thence I took her to my room. Thereafter we lived together. She assumed that I also was a professional burglar, and asked me if I had no 'business' in view. I replied that I had not.

" 'Very well,' she replied, 'I'll introduce you to a few of my friends.' She did so, and I found that even if they were thieves, they were excellent fellows. One of them especially, Kotza Bashmakov, was a strange prodigy of nature. He was a very child, so bright and jolly a soul was he. I became very fond of him. At length I confessed to him that I really was not in need, but had only become a thief out of curiosity.

" 'I, too,' he replied, 'became a thief because of too much happiness. There is so much that is good in the world, and it is so pleasant to live! Sometimes I wanted to go out into the streets, shouting, 'Brothers, take me! I am a thief!' "

"He was an amazingly merry fellow, but soon after I met him he broke his arm while jumping from a train, and went to the prairies to cure himself on kumiss. For ten months I frequented this company. There were ten of us in the group. We robbed houses and trains, and every day I expected something to chance amiss. But each adventure was brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The leader of the company, Michail Petrovitch Borochov, who was an honorable and sensible man, once remarked, 'Ever since Stepan joined us, fortune has come our way.'

"These words abruptly recalled me from my new activity, and once more I became preoccupied with my inner self. 'What shall I do next?' I began asking myself. Should I commit murder? The thought entered my heart like a wound; there it remained, until it became corroding as an abscess. At night I would sit on the edge of my cot, with my hands on my knees, wondering. 'Why is it, Lord God!' I would cry. 'Does it, then, not matter to you what I might think? Now I can contemplate murder without affection, and I could as simply consummate it. Why is that?" But Mister God was silent."

The old man sighed heavily and spread some jelly on his bread.

"Yet you are a very proud man," I remarked.

Once more he raised his heavy, bushy brows and fixed his porcelain eyes upon mine. Now they seemed vacant and harshly bright. "No, not at all," he answered, meanwhile shielding with exquisite care his beard from the stains of the jelly. "No man has anything to make him proud, I take it." And, deftly thrusting the small bits of the bread into his hairy mouth, he proceeded in the same quiet tone, as if he were talking to a total stranger, for whom he had no special liking: "And so Mister God was silent. About that time came an unusually tempting opportunity. We had effected an entrance into a summer house, and while we were ransacking it we suddenly heard out of the dark a sleepy, childish voice, crying, 'Oh, uncle, is it you?'

"My companion leaped out onto the balcony, but I remained; and upon closer observation I saw someone moving behind a door. I opened the door, and beheld a boy about twelve years of age, lying on a bed. He was scratching his head, and I noticed that his hair was uncommonly long. 'Uncle!' he cried again. My hands and feet trembled as I looked at him. Here, I thought, was my opportunity. Go ahead, Stepan, go ahead! But I halted myself just in time. No, I protested to myself, I should not go so far as that! Perhaps it was your Mister God who tempted me to crime, even to the murder of a human being. No, no, it should not be. . . . This conjecture filled me with such a blind fury that I do not remember even how I left the house; but presently I found myself in the woods. I was sitting under a tree, and my companion was beside me, smoking a cigarette and swearing quietly. It was drizzling, and the woods were filled with tinkling whispers; and before my eyes in the darkness I fancied I could see that defenseless boy, wholly in my power. One moment more, and there should be no boy! Well . . .

"The hallucination consumed me with rage. I could not make peace with my wrath, and began to feel myself like an equally defenseless boy in the grip of my own fury. Just think of it, seriously—here we are sitting, and you do not know what I might do a moment from now, nor do I know what you might do. Suddenly, anything might happen—for all sorts of thoughts pass through one's head—suddenly, either you or I . . .

"This mental defenselessness is very alluring. And, in general, who directs our consciousness? That is precisely it. In the morning I went directly into town to the magistrate, Mr. Suyatuchine. 'Arrest me, please, your honor,' I said to him; 'I am a thief.' He proved to be an exceptionally good barin, so affable, so thin, and only a little silly, as they all are.

" 'Why,' he remonstrated, 'do you confess it? Have you quarreled with your companions over the booty?'

"I had no companions, I told him; I worked alone. Then, foolishly enough, I told him my whole history, as I am telling it to you: about my odd predicament, and how cruelly Mister God had been sporting with me."

At this point I interrupted him. "But why, Stepan Illych," I asked, "do you think it was God, and not the devil?"

"There is no devil," the old man explained, with confident assurance. "There is no devil. That is only an invention of the shrewd. People invented him to justify their foolishness, as well as for the greater benefit of Mister God, so that His reputation might not suffer. There are only God and man—nothing else. And all those characters who are supposed to be possessed of the devil, such as Cain and the Czar Ivan the Terrible, are likewise the inventions of the shrewd. They were invented that the sins and crimes of all mankind might be burdened in each age upon a single person. You may take my word for it. We rascals of men debase ourselves, and then we invent something worse than ever we can be. . . .

"But let us come back to the magistrate. The walls of his room were adorned with pictures, and the whole atmosphere of his home signified him to be a man of culture. His face was kindly. But a gentle face means nothing—under this sign much rotten goods are sold. While I was talking with him, someone was drumming away at a piano above my head, and it was very unpleasant to have to listen to this and to the magistrate's empty chatter. Ekh, I thought, how confused everything was there!

"I talked for a long time, and the magistrate listened to me as in church an old woman listens to the priest. He understood nothing. 'Of course,' he said, 'you must be tried, but I can guarantee that you will be acquitted if you tell the jury all that you have told me. And it seems to me that you have before you, not prison, but a monastery.'

"I was offended. 'You have not understood,' I exclaimed, 'and I shall waste no more words with you!' He sent me to the police station, and there the detectives busied themselves with me. 'We know,' they said, 'that you were not alone in the thefts in which you participated. Tell us who were your accomplices? Then come to us when you have been set free, and we will give you employment.'

"Naturally, I refused to betray my friends, and the police beat me for my obstinacy. Truly, I have suffered a little. Then I was put on trial—I found it very dull, and refused to speak to the judges. They were offended, so they committed me to prison. In the prison I was confined among men who were like worms and beasts. I was appointed overseer. Ekh, I thought, this is bad, Mister God; this is very bad! Then I saw that, however man may live and whatever he may do, it is Mister God who orders his existence.

"As to prison, just as about a wart, there is nothing good to tell. When I was released I loitered here and there, looking around, and eventually I started to work in a cast-iron mill, but soon gave it up. It was too hot. Besides, I do not like cast iron and steel, or any other metal. From metals arise all the hardships of life—weight, dust, and all the forms of rust. Without metals, man would be simpler, and he would live more virtuously.

"Thereafter I performed all kinds of labor, even descending, I must confess, to the most menial services. Eventually I came to work in the bath-house. And now it is seventeen years that I have been bathing people and trying not to obtrude myself upon them. I have concluded that there is little wisdom in all our agitations, and none at all when one looks at life seriously. I live without God, and I am sorry for people because of their helplessness against Him. My life I find somewhat lonely. That is all."

Reunion

By EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

By some derision of wild circumstance
Not then our pleasure somehow to perceive,
Last night we fell together to achieve
A light eclipse of years. But the pale chance
Of youth resumed was lost. Time gave a glance
At each of us, and there was no reprieve;
And when there was at last a way to leave,
Farewell was a foreseen extravagance.

Tonight the west has yet a failing red,
While silence whispers of all things not here;
And round there where the fire was that is dead,
Dusk-hidden tenants that are chairs appear.
The same old stars will soon be overhead,
But not so friendly and not quite so near.

The Land of Leisure

By MAX EASTMAN

Moscow, September 1

AFTER a night in a comfortable hotel by the sea, we went back to Riga to secure our tickets to Moscow from the Russian embassy. The passport functionary here was almost magically friendly and gentle, and I think it was due in an indirect way to the unfriendliness of the same functionary in Berlin. He was one of those growling desk-dogs who seemed to think it his function, as representing a proletarian government in a bourgeois country, to be as surly and unobliging as possible. He looked me over and decided that either the cut of my clothing or the indolence of my manner was essentially bourgeois—as indeed without doubt they both are—and he told me that he did not have any authorization to admit me into Russia. I happened to know that the authorization was in his desk, but he showed no disposition to look for it. I do not know how long he might have found it necessary to demonstrate the class-struggle in the privacy of that office if I had not just happened to meet Chicherin as I was coming into the building, and he had not happened to remember me, and remember that I did a little work of translation for him in Genoa. I asked the passport functionary to telephone Chicherin while I waited, and the result was not only a passport, but a passport bearing the magical word byezplatno the literal translation of which is "without paying," but which really seems to mean, as far as I can judge from its effects, "In spite of his manners and the bad cut of his clothes, this guy is all right."

We had to wait three hours while our railroad tickets were being "drawn up," but when we got them we saw that they called for a stateroom in the "diplomatic wagon," and for that we were very glad, because as the time drew near to be "herded in like animals" we were getting more and more anxious to be numbered among the blooded stock.

I ought to explain that my use here of the word "we" does not imply the usual editorial duplicity. It refers to the invaluable company of Albert Rhys Williams, a great creative genius who had invented a language that the Russians understood almost as well as their own, although I never could see any similarity between the two.

The train for Moscow was a terrible disappointment. I couldn't find one single thing the matter with it. The cars are wider than railroad cars in America, and that is delightful. The second-class cars have no upholstery; the bunks are made of hard wood. And as there are two upper ones, the effect is like shelves. It is a little funny to see people arranged on shelves like dishes, but it is not either "filthy" or "congested." There is certainly less "herding" done all over Russia in a week than there is in New York City in one afternoon.

Our own cabin was a great big square room like a two-story tent, with a table between the beds, and an enormous space like a hay-mow upstairs—room there for all family pets and belongings. There was clean white bed-linen at a mild price, and a friendly young host in a workingman's shirt who came in every once in a while to know if we wouldn't like some tea. He had a campfire in a samovar at the other end of the car, and on the whole that journey from Riga to Moscow was more like camping out than traveling. The absence of a uniform on this young man, and his easygoing and hospitable manners, had something to do with it—and then the big windows and the extraordinary amount of space. But I believe the sweet, benign, sedative influence of the abundance of time was also beginning to be felt. We were in Russia and among Russians.

I have not calculated the exact variation of the time factor which occurs upon crossing the border into Russia, but I have made some observations which may be of help to future travelers. I think the ratio is somewhere in the vicinity of six to one. The annual convention of the Communist International lasted a month and eight days, and the longest political convention I ever heard of in the United States lasted not over a week. The wait between the acts in a Russian theater gives you time to go home and change the baby and come back again. In Russia it takes three minutes after you reach the window to buy a postage-stamp, the stamp being identified, sorted out, and carefully severed from its fellow-stamps with a pair of scissors. It takes, under the most favorable circumstances, five minutes to buy a railroad ticket; no Russian thinks of coming to a train less than an hour in advance. The great mass of the passengers is there a half a day before the train starts, but this is due, I think, to another peculiarity of Russian time—namely, that it is not very accurately divided. The Russians do not pay much attention to the behavior of the planetary system. They each have their own time of day. This is sometimes very convenient. If for some reason you want it to be a certain time of day, you just go and hunt up a clock that tells that time of day, and it is. But obviously it is not convenient when it comes to catching trains. There the need for a certain social approximation is met among the general public by taking the household furniture and going and living for a while in the station.

From all these facts I infer that there is about six times as much time in Russia as there is in our anxious land; time is worth about one-sixth as much. If you know this simple astronomical and economic fact to begin with, it will save you a great deal of nervous anguish, and prevent many erroneous psychological judgments about the Russian people—particularly the judgment that they are lazy. They are not lazy, they are leisurely. In the house where I am staying now it takes five people a quarter of an hour, or one person an hour and a quarter, to prepare my breakfast of coffee and toast and eggs. But they are all busy all the time they are doing it. I do not begin to get mad until the proper interval according to Russian time is past, and thus I lead a very peaceful life and keep my digestion. There is a girl who comes in and cleans up my room. I never see her, as she comes after I have gone out, and goes away before I come back, but I communicate with her by leaving notes on the pillow. One day I asked her to take my soiled clothes to a laundry and have them done immediately as I was leaving town for a few days. That evening when I came back I found the laundry carefully put away in the drawer and a note on my pillow, saying that since I wanted it done immediately, she would inquire at the laundry how soon they could do it, and then let me know with a note the next morning, and then the morning after that, if her report was satisfactory, I could leave word for her to take the clothes to the laundry. It is a great mistake to confuse this attitude toward life with indolence. The Russian mind gears in differently with the motion of the planet.

Russia's Era of Revival

By ISAIAH J. HOORGIN

IS there really an increase of prosperity in Russia now that the years of war, blockade, and famine are finally over?

Skepticism toward Soviet Russia is by no means the least virtue of some people, and all those virtuous gentlemen who firmly believe that the growth of national wealth is incompatible with the Soviet regime must be disappointed again. For this purpose it is not even necessary to resort to any complicated statistical calculations. The plain ordinary facts of everyday life speak for themselves and testify, more eloquently than figures, to the improvement of the material well-being of the Soviet Republics.

The All-Union Agricultural Exposition has recently been taking place in Moscow. The workers and peasants are proud of it and have good reason to be. Daily thousands of peasants from the remotest and darkest corners of the Soviet Republics came to Moscow to visit the exposition. These tourists had not the faintest idea, nor have they any now, of that excellent establishment, Thomas Cook and Sons; neither had they the money necessary. In Moscow they were the guests of the workers and clerks of the Moscow factories and institutions. In order to arrange an exposition, to bring thousands of guests thousands of miles—all this requires money. It could not have been thought of in 1920 when, even if they had had the evil intention of doing so, the government could scarcely have broken the law which in the interests of economy of fuel prohibited the heating of apartments to a temperature of over 47 degrees.

Not in a dark alley; but out in broad daylight in the presence of distinguished witnesses

(From Projektor, Moscow)

Another fact. The problem of aviation now engages the mind of the Russian public. The idea of owning airplanes, conquering the vast stretches of Russian territory, quickening or "Americanizing" the lazy tempo of life inherited as a legacy of czarism, charms and attracts. And voluntary collections for the building of airplanes are in full swing. Everywhere—in the workshop, in the government institution, in the peasant's cooperative society, and in the provincial labor union. The newspapers carry entire columns of names. One contributes a single dollar, another two, five. All these contributions come from simple workers and clerks. These facts, of course, do not prove any considerable prosperity. It is rather proof of an astounding capacity for sacrifice. At last these people can give vent to their desire; they do now have money.

The Union of the Sickle and the Hammer is now only entering upon the seventh year of its existence. Systems of national economy do not arise like Venus out of the sea-foam, and the periods of their creation and development are measured, in the history of mankind, by decades if not by entire centuries. Even if the past six years of Soviet rule had been years of peaceful and undisturbed economic endeavor, it would have been childish to expect that the tremendous problem of building up the economic life of the nation on a systematic, integrated basis should be completed by the sixth anniversary. But the past years have been by no means years of peaceful work. Five-sixths of them were spent in bitter fighting, accompanied by constant destruction of vital parts of the country's economic fabric. Yet one year of more or less peaceful work has yielded tangible proofs of progress from economic disruption to a revival under a new economic system.

The economic history of the past six years should be divided into three periods. The first one, until the summer of 1918, embracing altogether seven months, was the period devoted to taking possession, rather in a mechanical sense, of the apparatus of the country's economic life and of subordinating it physically to the interests of the new master of the land. Least of all did the theorists and creators of the Soviet system imagine the possibility of bringing into existence a socialist system with one stroke of the revolutionary sword. It was mainly a question of transferring into the hands of the new government those branches of industry which were already prepared for systematic and centralized management by their previous economic development.

Changes of economic systems have always been accompanied by a definite period of transition, in the course of which the growing new system has existed side by side with the old outgrown system. Such a transitional period was practically necessitated by the domestic and international situation of Soviet Russia. The enormous, numerically overwhelming mass of small peasant-producers, and the need of participating for years to come in the economic life of the world jointly with the capitalist countries, were the determining factors of the economic development of the revolution from the moment of its victory.

The first period was molded entirely by these factors. The Soviet Government was endeavoring to map out the economic boundaries of that transitionary period. But this period was of too short duration to yield any substantial results. It was interrupted by the second period, which lasted for three years, until the summer of 1921, and which was marked by the bitter and relentless struggle for the very existence—the mere physical existence—of the new regime. War was waged against the Soviets in all the forms known to mankind today. The Soviet regime had no choice in the matter. It was compelled to take up the fight which had been foisted upon it, and once having taken it up, to fight with all the determination of which it was capable. This was not ordinary war with a defined front and rear. The sparks of war were scattered—in every city, in every village, frequently even within the same family. The war was being waged essentially with the object of conquering economic positions, and the front touched upon everything—every repair-shop, every small store, every provincial market-place. The adversary had to be forced out of every position. This was rather a matter of military strategy than of economics. And at the same time everything within the country had to be whipped into line for one purpose—defense. One gave his life, another had to offer his labor, a third his bread. Under conditions of dire privation, this was rather a matter of severe military morale than of policy. If the first period was logically indispensable, the second period may be considered theoretically as unnecessary. In a different international situation it might at least have assumed different and less devastating forms.

At the first opportunity to lay aside its war weapons, the Soviet Government resumed the work of economic reconstruction. The turn of the tide came even prior to the formal ratification of the peace treaty with Poland, which put an end to the last of the wars in which Soviet Russia had been involved, and the summer of 1921 marks the beginning of the third period, known as the period of the new economic policy. If within six years in the history of mankind one can distinguish between new and old, it would be more exact to christen the third period that of the old policy. In fact, this third period was a legitimate and logical sequel of the first. The armed warfare which the Soviet Government was forced to wage for its very existence did not change and could not radically change those fundamental economic problems with which it was confronted at the beginning of the revolution. The organization of the country's economic life during the period of transition remained the basic problem. However, while the war did not change the essence of the problem, it considerably altered the conditions of its solution. While on the one hand the Soviet Government emerged from the period of struggle stronger both physically and morally, while it had accumulated some experience in economic organization during that period, on the other hand the country's industries had been subjected to a tremendous drain, and the most vital arteries had been badly torn and twisted.

Under these conditions the third period was ushered in. This period has lasted somewhat over two years, in the course of which all the efforts and thought of the Soviet authorities have been focused exclusively on its economic problems. But even of this brief period at least one-half should be discounted. The drought which brought about the dreadful famine, more cruel and devastating than the war through which Russia had just then passed, coincided with the first steps of the new economic policy. Some wits are inclined to attribute the drought also to the unnatural actions of the Soviet Government. But if we cast aside these meteorological revelations and estimate instead the cost of maintenance on a mere starvation basis of the famine-stricken regions, not to mention the damage sustained by agriculture, it will be apparent that the economic progress achieved during the past year would have been doubled if the famine had not occurred.

It is only with these facts briefly recalled to memory that one should estimate the economic results of this first and only year in which the Soviet Government has been at all in a position to concentrate its attention on the task of economic reconstruction. I say "at all" because the past year like its predecessors had been graced by increasing diplomatic conflicts and tremendous upheavals in the European economic life of which the Union of Soviet Republics forms an inseparable component part.

The industrial achievements of the Union of Soviet Republics are characterized by the following data. For the fiscal year 1922-1923 (in the Soviet Union the fiscal year begins on October 1) the industrial output is estimated at 1,118 million gold rubles.* This is as yet a low figure, amounting to only 32 per cent of the pre-war output of Russia's industries. Nevertheless, this is a substantial achievement. The year 1921-1922 yielded an industrial output valued at 829 million gold rubles, whereas at the beginning of the new economic policy the yearly output of the country's industries was only 511 million gold rubles. Last year's production has been doubled as compared with the year 1920, and it exceeds by 35 per cent that of the year immediately preceding.

The achievements of the past year will stand out in greater relief in the light of the following comparative figures. If we take 100 to express the figures for the first half of the fiscal year 1921-1922, then the output for the same period of 1922-1923 would amount to 141, the number of workers employed to 113, and the productivity of the labor of the individual worker, 124.

In the domain of foreign trade the past year had been marked above all by a particularly noteworthy attainment—the resumption of export of Russian agricultural produce, which had always been of great importance to the Russian farmer. As in the case of the industries, the total amount of trade turn-over is considerably below the pre-war level, of which it amounts to only 12.3 per cent. But while in 1921-1922 the imports amounted to 282.3 million gold rubles, they had been reduced in 1922-1923 to 144 million gold rubles, whereas the exports, which were estimated at 63.9 million rubles for the year 1921-1922, had reached the sum of 130 million gold rubles in the year 1922-1923. This last amount does not include all those large quantities of grain which are now on the way to the various foreign markets. Within the next year it is expected that the trade turn-over will be doubled with a decidedly large excess of exports over imports.

But the most outstanding results are revealed by a review of the financial work of the Union. At the beginning of the last fiscal year the outstanding item of the Union's revenue was the issue of currency, which provided

* 1 gold ruble equals 51.4 cents.

46.3 per cent, while taxes composed 24.4 per cent and the profits from state industries and commerce yielded 29.3 per cent. Nine months later the issue of currency covered only 26.8 per cent, the taxes rose slightly to 29.3 per cent while the revenue from sources other than taxation increased to 43.9 per cent. At the same time the monthly average revenue increased from 65 million gold rubles to 88.3 million gold rubles. During the past few months the relative importance of the issue of currency has sunk still further, having been reduced to 15 million gold rubles per month, or about 15 per cent of the total income, and in the budget of the next year its role will be of practically no significance. Within those rigid limits which are dictated by the financial poverty of the Union this signifies an approach toward a real stabilization of the budget.

Simultaneously, within the past ten months, a new stable monetary unit—the chervonetz[*]—has been created in Russia and is growing in stability. It has won a firm position on the exchange and it is successfully supplanting, for internal circulation, the dollars and pounds which found their way into Russia on account of the collapse of the paper ruble. Another feature—during the past year the number of paper rubles increased 83 times while prices increased 56 times.

The leaders of the Union of Soviet Republics are not inclined to overestimate these results. The famine in funds greatly obstructs all progress. Economic decay is tightening its grip on Europe. But the Soviet Union which took shape this year under the guiding sign of economic revival has the strength to safeguard its further development. It is now both economically and politically many times stronger than it was when it entered the struggle for its existence.

In the House of the Sugar King

By JESSICA SMITH

THIRTY versts outside of Moscow, through tall pine trees hiding the gaily frescoed dachas where sugar and cotton kings of Russia used to while away their summer hours, converted now into rest homes for the workers or vacation homes for the children of Moscow, you come to a station bearing the name of Pushkin. The station swarms with children, from the dozens of childrens' colonies nearby, and the air is filled with shrill happy voices. A high sweet call sounds insistently above the merry clamor on the station platform. We send back an answering "halloo!"—nimble-footed, fleet figures come flying toward us down the railroad track. Suddenly we are smothered in vigorous embraces as Shura and Varya and Katya and Alexey and Ivan throw themselves upon us, clinging to our arms and hands, showering us with bright flowers they have just gathered, and tall Pavel comes shyly up behind and greets us in quaint English.

We turn off into the woods where the ground is soft with pine-needles, and the air rich with the smell of them. More calls ahead, and answering calls around us, a burst of song—elves and fairies dart out from behind the trees, and spring from the ground beneath our feet. And so we come to the yellow and white mansion where the children and teachers of the Musical Art School of Pushkin live. On the wide balcony in front a black-haired little fellow with the face of a prize-fighter is practicing on the flute. He is utterly oblivious of the hullabaloo we are raising below. "He's only been playing the flute a week, and he can't think of anything else," the other children explain. From somewhere inside come the notes of a Chopin waltz.

We are pulled in ten directions. "Come, climb the meteorological tower!" the boys insist, "we built it ourselves," and they urge us toward a high tower hung with garlands, and flying a red flag, from the dizzy heights of which they observe the heavens and the surrounding landscape, and test the rainfall and the temperature. "Come, see the new stage we are building! We are getting ready to give 'Boris Godounoff'—Pavel there is to be Boris." And we are swept around the corner to the big side piazza where some of the boys are carrying on a great hammering and pounding, while the girls sit and sew curtains and costumes out of old sacking which they have dyed bright colors.

We are led into the big central room, hung with sketches and paintings by the children, battle-axes and shields from their plays, pictures of Lenin and Trotzky. Big Colia, who is a scientist as well as an actor and a musician, pulls us away to his museum in the attic where he has collected and classified all the birds and beasts and flowers and stones of the neighborhood.

In our progress through the various rooms and corridors we run into the Princess of "Prince Igor," Snegurotchka of the "Snow Maiden," Tyltyl of the "Blue Bird," and other famous characters. Sounds of music are everywhere in the air. "You see," the children tell us, "summer is the best time to practice. In the winter we have our school work, and so many other things—and then Comrade Tsibin, our director, can be with us so little, for he has to play the flute in the orchestra at the Bolshoy Theater every night. But now he is with us every day, and we have lots of time to practice."

After tea there is a concert by these future artists of the Bolshoy Theater. The boy orchestra plays the merry "Melnitza" in which you can hear the mill-wheel going around and around, and feel the flour-dust sifting through the air, the march from "The Hump-Backed Horse," and a variety of other selections rendered amazingly well. There are voice, violin, and cello solos, choruses, dances. The light is very bad, and two flickering lamps have to be carried here and there, but they do not seem to be in the least daunted by material difficulties. Every child has something to contribute to the program, they are beautifully trained, and some of them very gifted.

After the concert we leap into the Russian folk dances with the children, and go swinging and whirling around with them to their great delight. Then the room is transformed quickly into a dining-room, we eat soup and kasha and black bread. The tables cleared, the younger children are sent off to bed, and the Soviet assembles. Directors, teachers, and children participate equally in the discussions and decisions. There are serious problems to be considered tonight. First, there is the question of two of the boys who are so interested in their music that they refuse to do their share of the other work of the community—one of them a gifted pianist, the other the black-haired little flute player we had seen when we arrived. Then there is the problem of where and how they are to get sheets, blankets, heavy clothing, violin strings, wood for the winter—for the Soviet government has not the means to support such institutions as it had hoped to be able to, and the local educational departments are also poor, so they are badly pressed for means to carry on.

[*] Par $5.14; recent quotations are $5.

At last all the children have gone to bed. Tovarish Tsibin and his wife, who is manager of the school, are very weary. But even yet they feel they have not done enough. Tovarish Tsibin is a gentle, bearded little man in a Tolstoi blouse, and besides being the director of the Musical Art School, he is the foremost flute player in Russia. He plays a little now, exquisitely—apologizing that he is too tired to play more, and his sweet-faced wife, who has the voice of an angel, sings for us.

As Vera, their daughter, a pale, golden-haired girl of fifteen, is arranging the mattresses and bedding for us on the tables in the concert hall, she tells us how they came to be living in this lovely spot.

When the school was first started, three years ago, they had lived in a much smaller house a few versts nearer Moscow. But it was very crowded and uncomfortable. They had to eat and sleep and have lessons all in one room. Besides, winter was coming on, and none of the stoves worked. They appealed to the Department of Education, and they received a paper ordering the Sugar King, who was at that time occupying his dacha in Pushkin, to let the Musical Art School move in. A deputation of children went to him with the paper, saying: "You are one, and we are many. You use your house only for pleasure, and we must have it for work."

The sugar magnate was deaf to their pleading, and turned them away. But while the children were there they had discovered a wing of two rooms which were not in use. A group of the older boys went back and requested him to open up this wing for them. He refused, so they broke in and took possession. They brought all their things, and even held their classes there, while the girls brought food twice a day from the other house. They begged for more room—for the use of the kitchen. But the Sugar King was adamant. The children grew desperate. It was getting so cold in the other house that their fingers were too stiff to play. One day the boys at the big house heard that the Sugar King was planning a concert for that evening. They went over to the other house and held a council of war.

That night the Sugar King's table sparkled with silver and glass that had escaped confiscation, and his table was laden with the good food and wines that he was somehow able to get when everyone else was starving. The Sugar King and his guests ate and drank and made merry far into the evening, and then the musicians and guests repaired to the big drawing-room for the concert. The lights were switched on, and there, filling the room were rows and rows of little wooden beds—in each one of them a sleeping child. There was no concert that night.

The Sugar King raged. But he could do nothing against so many. He locked the kitchen against them—they climbed in through the window. They needed more room; when he refused, they calmly took possession, and soon they were carrying on the organized life of the school. From one room to another the Sugar King retreated before the advancing hordes of the children. At last he could stand it no more. He gathered together as much of his furniture and precious possessions as he could in a nearby cottage, and fled to a hospitable border state. All he left behind was a great heavy safe. To this day it stands unopened in the concert room. They do not know whether it is full of gold and jewels or not, and have never taken the trouble to find out. But now at last Tovarish Tsibin finds that he needs it to keep things in, and is beginning to talk of having it opened.

The Sugar King came back last summer to have a look at his dacha. He was delighted at the good condition in which he found it, and said he could imagine no tenants he would rather have had. He is probably banking on happier days when the old order will return to Russia, and his dacha will be returned to him in good condition. But I bank on this vigorous young generation of proletarian musicians and artists and scientists who have come into their own because power has been wrested from the Sugar Kings—and who will not lightly give up what they have won.

The Soviet Press

By L. TALMY

OF the many things which the bolshevik revolution "wiped out of existence" in Russia the press is one of the most lamented. It is still the popular notion that the Soviet press is made up of a few government-owned official sheets faithfully carrying out the dictations of the powers that be; that the Soviet journalist is a mute slave of whom only blind obedience is required or expected.

Somehow this conception of the Soviet press does not bear out the fact that of the score of leading dailies published in Moscow and Petrograd alone no two are quite alike in character. Each one of these newspapers has its distinct individuality which makes it easier to distinguish between two newspapers in collectivist communist Russia than in individualist America. The individuality is manifested not alone in the external appearance of the papers, their size, make-up, print, etc., but even more in those things which give a newspaper its soul: contents, style, treatment of news, editorials, reaction toward the thousand big and little things which come up to the surface in the everyday life of the republic. The only thing which all the newspapers in Soviet Russia have in common is their loyalty and allegiance to the Soviet form of government and the ultimate aim it stands for—the organization of society along the lines of communism. Within these limits they retain the highest degree of independence, indulging in sharp and bitter criticism of persons and institutions without regard to their standing and position. They retain their different character which, it is true, is not shaped by the personality to their standing and position. They retain their different ent groups of readers to which they appeal and whose interests they serve. However, this very fact tends to put the different characteristics of the newspapers in bolder relief, since the individuality of a group is more pronounced than that of an individual.

In Soviet Russia more than anywhere else it is not the journalist who makes the press, but it is the press which makes the journalist. In fact, in Soviet Russia this rule (with only a few exceptions) is true in a literal sense. When the Soviet Government was confronted with the problem of creating the new labor press, representative of the proletarian dictatorship, there were no journalists to begin with. There are a number of brilliant writers among the leading Communists but for the most part they are not identified as such. Lenin, Trotzky, Kamenev, Zinoviev, and even Radek are not thought of as journalists, although they still devote a great deal of their time to journalistic work.

Before the revolution there was no labor press amounting to anything. When the Soviet Government suspended the publication of the bourgeois press and the press of the socialist opposition parties and nationalized their plants, the old-timers in the journalistic profession—most of them—left Moscow and Petrograd in a hurry and went to those parts of Russia which were under the occupation of the different white and interventionist armies. This happened as late as the summer of 1918—about ten months after the October revolution. Until then the opposition press, although frankly counter-revolutionary, had been tolerated by the Soviet authorities. Only when the English landed troops in Archangel and Kolchak became active in the Volga region while General Krassnov threatened the Soviet forces from the Don, were the opposition newspapers suppressed.

The new Soviet press was then created in great haste to meet the requirements of the fierce civil struggle which ensued. It was created through a virtual mobilization of all Communists and sympathizers who could muster a pen and it was subject to all the limitations of war time. It was under strict military censorship. Its scope was limited to striving and aiming at one goal—to overcome the enemy. The Soviet journalist was really a soldier, fighting with his pen and called upon to provide the army with the morale and the consciousness of a just cause which frequently supplemented the lack of real firearms. These conditions often led to excesses of naivete. Viewed today, the editor of some tiny town newspaper, debating political problems in dead earnest with Lloyd George and Millerand, would cut a comic figure. But in Russia even this sort of thing was born of necessity and served definite ends. For the worker, the peasant, the Red Army soldier, the premier of Great Britain was a reality incarnated in the white guards whom he met in active struggle.

When the civil war ended and the army was demobilized the press also was demobilized. It lost a great deal of its impetus and it began to deterioriate. Besides, the new economic policy was soon introduced, which meant that the newspapers were no longer provided for by the government but were forced to pay their own way. It also meant that the newspapers would not be distributed free of charge any more. The immediate results of these changes were disastrous for the press. Both the number of newspapers and their circulation fell with alarming rapidity. According to the data published in the Moscow monthly Journalist, the circulation of the newspapers immediately before the introduction of the new economic policy was about 4,000,000. It fell to about 2,600,000 in January, 1922, and kept on falling until it reached its lowest figure in August, 1922, when the circulation of all the newspapers totaled about 1,000,000 copies. The same applies to the number of newspapers which fell from 800 in January to 300 in August, 1922.

Since then, however, conditions have been constantly improving. The figures for each succeeding month show a steady growth in the number of newspapers and their circulation until, in February, 1923, at the time of the Fourth Congress of the Union of Journalists in Moscow, the number of newspapers had reached 500 and their total circulation was 2,000,000 copies, and is still climbing steadily upwards. The congress decided to initiate a campaign to give the newspapers a circulation of 10,000,000 copies daily by the end of the year, and, from later figures, it seems that the Soviet press is well on the way to achieve this lavish number. The total circulation of the Russian press before the war was about 2,500,000.

This marked improvement is accounted for by the fact that the Soviet press was quick in adapting itself to the new conditions which arose with the termination of the civil war and the period of military communism coincident with it. The Soviet press is more and more becoming representative of the laboring masses, establishing an intimate contact with them, and voicing their sentiments and needs. The growth in the number of newspapers and their circulation is accounted for by the fact that they are more and more reaching into the farthest corners of the Soviet federation, to the workers in the shops and the peasants in the villages.

In pre-revolutionary Russia the newspaper was the companion of the few who had the privilege of living in the bigger centers. The villages and most of the smaller towns knew almost nothing of the existence of newspapers. Sometimes the village teacher and the small-town intellectual would subscribe to a metropolitan daily but that was seldom. The press was chiefly metropolitan. Outside of Moscow and Petersburg only the bigger centers of industrial, commercial, and intellectual life, such as Kiev, Kharkov, Odessa, Rostov, had newspapers of any considerable merit. Even the provincial capitals had for the most part only the official Gubernskie Vedomosti (Government Communications) containing official notices, and prikazi (orders) of the administration. The news was confined to the social events in the governor's palace and the Dvorianskoye Sobranye (the Assembly of Noblemen).

The Soviet press, on the contrary, is establishing itself in most of the smaller towns where it can better serve the neighboring community. The press is striving to become not only a press for the masses but also by the masses, to be intimately associated with them. It is in fact becoming a weapon in the hands of the new labor democracy which is being forged in the Soviet republic.

The new Soviet journalist is, for the most part, recruited from the ranks of the workers and peasants. Outside of a few special newspapers which appeal to a rather limited audience of specialists, the press in Soviet Russia is becoming a tribune of labor. In the industrial centers the newspapers have full staffs of workers' correspondents who are writing of the life and sentiments of the shops and factories. These correspondents are not outsiders in the factories. They live and work there. In the rural centers the newspapers establish their contact with the villages through the peasant correspondents.

Russia is now in a period of reconstruction in which all the forces of labor must be taxed. In this work the press plays a considerable part as an organizing and controlling factor. The journalist, both the professional and the workers' correspondent, enters the fabric of state construction as a component part performing a definite function.

Europe in Washington

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

ONCE more Europe has drenched Washington with a visit from the best-known of all European public men and with a new revival of plans for American participation in the settlement of the reparations question, together with a considerable political disturbance ensuant upon the appointment of a confirmed pro-Leaguer, Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, of Minnesota, to represent this anti-League country in the American Embassy at London. People who are forgetful of American history see in these recurrent deluges of Washington by European affairs a sort of modernistic novelty. They are forgetful indeed.

In the administration of George Washington the affairs of Europe became so engrossing to the United States that it is validly possible for Mr. S. E. Forman in his history of the United States called "Our Republic" to say that "for twenty years the principal question to be asked about the politics of an American was: Does he belong to the French faction or to the English faction?"

Today in Washington, underneath all the formal public open talk about "helping Europe," or about refusing to "intermeddle" in Europe, the basic fact is increasingly coming to be that an American point of view regarding Europe is largely frustrated by personal factional preferences for a point of view French or British.

Statesmen come back here from Europe and in their public utterances call for an "American policy" toward Europe or assert that the United States should continue to maintain its "neutral aloofness." These utterances represent the ideas which statesmen are willing to put forth to the electorate with their names attached. Their utterances in private are usually of a much more revealing sort.

Some of our returning statesmen are deeply impressed by the difficult problems of the British and by what they regard as the valorous efforts made by the British to subdue those problems manfully. Such statesmen will say in private that they feel that the British are quite right in their opposition to the French in the matter of the Ruhr. When asked, however, if they are going to urge the United States to help the British pry the French out of the Ruhr, they remember that in their constituencies there are many persons, particularly in American Legion circles, who do not care to have the French pried out of the Ruhr at all.

Contrariwise, there are returning statesmen who are deeply impressed by the sufferings of France during the war and by what they regard as the heroic endeavors of the French to efface the results of those sufferings now in the devastated region and in France in general. Such statesmen think really that the United States should help France to collect from Germany the last pfennig of almost any indemnity which the French think they ought to have. When asked, however, if they will urge the American people to set forth on this emprise, they usually remember that in their constituencies there are many persons of German descent and of English descent and also many persons who simply, irrespective of descent, disagree with the French.

It is accordingly to be noticed that the statesmen who demand a policy in Europe are for the most part exceedingly careful to avoid saying what that policy should be. They may be willing to advocate an entrance into the League but they are virtually invariably unwilling to say what they think we should do after we get into the League. They will say that they are willing to go to Europe but for the most part they will not say one word for publication as to what they would do in Europe after they had got there.

The reason for their reticence is that they thoroughly realize that no matter what they did after getting there they would displease a considerable fraction of their political followers. They are as devoid of a policy toward Europe as an "irreconcilable" could possibly be. The "irreconcilables" and the "participationists" are in fact in the end in one way exactly alike. The "irreconcilables" refuse to "participate" and the "participationists" refuse to say what it is they would seek through "participation" to do. Each position is in fact as negative as the other.

This truth can be seen from another slant if statesmen are asked just what it is that they expect to see come out of an international reparations meeting attended by the United States. Suppose that in that meeting the representative of the United States votes with the representative of Britain to reduce the present demanded total of reparation payments. Suppose then that the French Government refuses to consent to that reduction. What will the United States do? In response to that question the usual answer from "participationists" is to the effect that no country can afford to refuse to accept the verdict of the United States. If then it is pointed out that Germany in 1917 refused to accept our verdict on submarine warfare the final response elicited is usually a refusal to be quoted.

It is further to be remarked that no matter how emphatically an American representative might vote with the British on the subject of reparations he would utterly fail to gain the support or sanction of those Senators who believe that the French are right. No such thing exists in Washington as an American policy toward Europe to which the American friends of the British and the American friends of the French are willing to subordinate their factional personal views.

President Adams at the beginning of the last century thought it necessary to pass a sedition law and to put people in jail in order to subdue the sympathizers with France. President Madison, in the War of 1812, found the Union almost disrupted by sympathizers with England who came near preferring the extinction of the government at Washington to a war with the government at London. We are developing fast into an era of the same sort.

Three years ago we were divided really only into those who wished to help the Allies enforce the Treaty of Versailles and those who did not wish to help them. Now among those who wish to help the Allies we have those whose helpfulness would be extended to France and those whose helpfulness would be extended to England.

In these circumstances Mr. Hughes confines himself to offering to allow an American to take part in a reparations meeting which shall confine itself essentially to calculating Germany's capacity to pay—to doing, that is, a sum in arithmetical economics. If he essayed to bring pressure on the British or on the French to accept the results of that sum, he would turn the floor of the Senate into a sort of collision between the city of Paris and the city of London under an American roof. The American friends of Britain and the American friends of France are stronger than any American perception of any outrightly and merely American interest and policy toward Europe at large.

At Noon Saturday

Tokio, September 10

DEAR ———: The Japan that you and I knew and loved crumpled up and died at noon Saturday, September first. It would grieve you to see what is left as it would grieve you to see the funeral of a mutilated loved one. The Japan that you know, as it means Tokio, Yokohama, the seaside and mountain places, has simply ceased to exist. It will be very dreary and depressing during the years of building something to take its place. Karuizawa and Nikko are the only ones of our favorite holiday places, with the exception of South Japan which is undamaged, that are not destroyed. Kamakura, Myanoshita, Hakone, Atami, Dzushi—all—were simply bumped off the cliffs or sunk into the sea. The Fuji-ya Hotel at Myanoshita, where we have spent so many happy week-ends, was left marooned, a junk heap, many persons buried beneath the wreckage, with a chasm in front and one behind making escape impossible. Rescue parties from Tokio got there five days later.

We know nothing whatever of the rest of the world and we know nothing whatever of how the rest of the world got our story and what it knows of us. You can understand the agony that is to newspaper correspondents.

Of course we have no lights, water, gas, or trams. In fact I can't think of anything we have had but canned stuff and free food for the refugees at the Imperial Hotel —and earthquakes. The quakes, mild by comparison, have continued with nerve-trying regularity every half hour or so. Most of us are dressed in very disreputable garb and are greatly in need of a bath. O-Chio-san, my old cook, goes out and gets water in a bucket from somewhere. Wells and taps are running here and there. I don't mean that anyone is dying of thirst. You can get water somewhere. Yokohama, however, has none at all. People have almost perished from sheer thirst—those few who hadn't perished before—and of course the vast thousands of unburied dead make the health situation perilous. The quake itself was terrible here but it was ghastly in Yokohama. Yokohama simply doesn't exist—nothing. It crumpled instantly—the Bluff, all the foreign settlement, Japanese sections—all gone. There's nothing—wires, railroads, cables, trains—nothing except the ground where Yokohama used to be, and that's so cluttered with dead and wreckage you can't see it.

This must be more or less bulletin stuff. Everything is chaotic. I must stay on the job and nothing but my legs to do it with. Quakes continue and there is little sleep and utter exhaustion for all of us all of the time.

The houses of most of our friends were destroyed. Go-ju-ichi-banchi, my own house, stands. But it's a horrible mess. The roof seems to have gone to hell—that small part of it which is not out in the garden. There are typhoonish rains all the time. All together I own two cocktail glasses and several spoons. There's a moratorium now. Nobody has any actual money except what was in his pockets when the quake came. But you can sign a chit for a million.

I was at Shihotsu's desk, third floor of Nippon-Dempo building, when the quake began at two minutes to twelve, Saturday, September first. We were doping out a story about the new Cabinet—a story that never went. Suddenly there was a vast thud, a sort of vague universal noise. I can't quite describe it. It wasn't huge in actual volume, but it sank in on your consciousness that it was literally universal—that it was the cracking and twisting of all creation. The entire building was swinging and swaying about, bricks and mortar and debris falling. I remember being tremendously impressed with the fact that the floor, always immaculate, was an awful mess and for the first time had the littered and disreputable appearance that a newspaper floor ought to have. The place was a trap. I realized that this was an earthquake—a regular old he-earthquake with hair on its chest. I was conscious of the fact that everyone in the room (some twenty Japanese men) was leaping for the doorway. I was aware that Uyeda called to me to "Leave! There is great danger" as he disappeared, and that the little news editor—the same who rubbed his forehead on the floor when he met us that first night at the dinner at the Maple Club—was screaming something at me as he flew out the door.

Of course this was all in a very few seconds. Shihotsu and I were silent. He was very quiet and impassive and my one dominant emotion was that I'd be damned if I'd let him have anything on me in poise. At the same time my brain which seemed to be operating as a remote and impersonal affair, was registering the facts of the situation; that the window behind Shihotsu's desk was three stories high, opening on a paved alleyway beneath and that it would be disastrous indeed to jump out; that to get to either the front or the rear flight of winding stairs I would have to run through two or three rooms and the chances were entirely in favor of the building crumbling before I could reach the ground. I don't suppose it was more than a few seconds. . . . Anyway we sat there looking at each other with the office wrecking all around us. Then Shihotsu said: "I think it's time to go," and I said: "I've been thinking that for some time."

The most curious sensation was that of the stairs and balustrade swaying and pitching like the steps and hand-rail of a ship's ladder at sea. I had to cling—actually cling, to hold on—and this a big office building on solid land! It was no way for solid things in which you put your confidence to act. The ground and street were swaying. Wreckage was everywhere. The entire Nippon Dempo staff huddled there. The swaying stopped. I don't know how long it had been, perhaps a few minutes, and I ran upstairs to get off an urgent flash over Nippon Dempo's wires. But there was no operator and the wire wasn't working. Shihotsu had tested it. Then the quake started again, as big as before, and I leaped back down the stairs with debris falling all around me. Shihotsu had not left the building. I thought he had been right behind me after he had observed that it was time to go. And I thought he had beat me back upstairs. But not so. He had been there all the time, the only person in the office. And, as I learned several days later, he remained there until one o'clock, with the building gradually going to pieces around him. I asked him why. "I am on duty until one o'clock," he replied very simply. "It is my custom to remain at my desk until that hour." I objected that he was risking almost certain death, to no purpose. "I am always prepared to die," he replied, "and I did do something. I answered two telephone calls before the last wire went down." His house was burned, his family saved. Two mornings later he was at my house before daylight to make a report on the situation.

Conscientious Objectors and the Army Intelligence Tests

By EDWARD A. LINCOLN

THE publication of the results of the intelligence testing in the army during the World War has brought much dismay to a number of writers. Magazine and newspaper articles, and even whole books have appeared which use the army results as the basis for all sorts of misgivings and dire predictions as to the ruin of our civilization. The assumption upon which these foretellers of calamity base their evil prophecies is that the army tests showed the average intelligence of the country to be on a much lower level than even the experts in mental measurement had suspected. The army psychologists rated the men by letter grades, ranging from "A" for the superior down to "E" for those who were practically useless for even the simplest army work because of their low mental ability.

The results of the army testing have been published many times, but it will be well to set them forth again. About two million men were given the various tests, and from these records the army psychologists made a chance or random selection of about 100,000 cases for special study. The men in this group, which was probably quite representative of the army as a whole, attained the various letter grades in the proportions shown by the percentages in the table below:

| E | D | C— | C | C+ | B | A |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 7.7 | 17.0 | 23.8 | 25.0 | 15.2 | 8.0 | 4.1 |

Our pessimists, pointing to the low percentage of "A" and "B" men, cannot see how we can produce the leaders to make the progress necessary for the survival of civilization.

The fallacy of this reasoning is, first, that the tests were purely arbitrary and hence the relation of the percentages must be likewise; and, second, that a man's value to society depends solely upon his general intelligence. Nothing could be further from the truth. Social value is much more a matter of what use a man makes of his talents than of what talents he may possess. The "A" man may become a great educator, inventor, or political leader, or he may turn his abilities to war grafting, profiteering in sugar, or lobbying against social legislation. He may build wonderful bridges or organize a labor-crushing trust. He may solve the mysteries of science, or he may edit a truth-suppressing newspaper. While it is probably true that the great reforms of the past have come as the result of the labors of superior men, it is none the less true that there is no history of any progress or attempted progress which does not tell of bitter and ruthless opposition by men who would test in the "A" group on any intelligence examination. Superior men have fought savagely and untiringly against Christianity, religious freedom, the destruction of feudalism, the abolishment of slavery, shortening of the workday, the American Revolution, progress in the sciences, eradication of child labor, enactment of prohibition, and the establishment of woman suffrage.

There is, in the army report, a scrap of evidence as to the whereabouts of some of the "A" men, which, although apparently of tremendous significance, seems to have escaped the notice of the previous writers. There is a chapter in this report which deals with military offenders, and in this chapter may be found the intelligence records made by the conscientious objectors who were confined in the army prison at Leavenworth. These records, shown in the accompanying table, indicate that the religious and political objectors stand out intellectually as a separate race. "A" grades were three times as frequent among the religious objectors as in the general run of the draft army, and among the political objectors the "A" grades were ten times as frequent. In "B" grades also these groups show themselves far superior to their fellows in the army:

| | Grade "B" Per cent | Grade "A" Per cent |
|---|---|---|
| White draft army | 8.0 | 4.1 |
| Religious objectors | 15.1 | 12.8 |
| Political objetcors | 13.2 | 39.3 |

In their education there is also an indication of the superiority of the conscientious objectors as shown by the following figures:

| | High School graduate Per cent | College graduate Per cent | College post-graduate Per cent |
|---|---|---|---|
| White draft army, native born | 4.1 | 1.1 | 0.1 |
| Religious objectors | 5.3 | 1.5 | 1.5 |
| Political objectors | 9.2 | 2.2 | 2.2 |

Here then was a group of men, small to be sure, but endowed with superior mental ability, and possessed of superior education. Their qualifications were such that we should have looked to them for guidance and leadership; yet their lot was persecution, imprisonment, torture, and even death.

Where are the "A" men? Some of them are in the seats of the mighty, where they intend to stay, resisting with all the means at their command every attempt of the average man to make his life fuller and sweeter. Other "A" men are in the courts of Michigan, the bull pens of Los Angeles, the cells and dungeons of the State and Federal prisons.

There is perhaps in the army-test results evidence of danger to our civilization. This danger, however, lies not in the mediocrity of the masses, but in the false leadership of those who use their talents for their own advantage and in the waste of a portion of our intellectual resources by the persecution of our idealists of superior intelligence.

In the Driftway

“To the Drifter:

“Sir: I have been chewing a cud of protesting reflection upon your discovery of romance on a Vermont road. To you, dull, settled city-dweller as you evidently are, an inn with no food but pork, and three city girls stealing rides far from home constitute Adventure, Romance, Mystery. You remind me, sir, of the people who talk of the beautiful Zanzibar landscape after reading Mr. Stoddard's travel books.

* * * * *

“Romance is not to be found in a Ford car. The automobile is almost as deadly an enemy of adventure as the telephone and the radio. All of these horrid instruments destroy loneliness, and there can be no romance, no adventure, no mystery, no poetry—none of the things which make life worth living—without loneliness. Company destroys the individual. Solitude alone is creative. Can you imagine Shelley whizzing along the Bay of Naples in a crowded touring-car and writing ‘I could lie down like a tired child’? With ear attuned to that jump in the motor he would never have noticed that ‘The City's voice itself is soft like Solitude's.’ Can you conceive Keats stepping back into his car after five minutes in a museum and penciling ‘Thou still unravished bride of quietness,’ or blind Milton listening to an impatient honk-honk-honk? No automobilist would think to write ‘Bare, ruined choirs where late the sweet birds sang’; he never hears the birds except when he stops to pick up a hitch-hiker.

* * * * *

“I would not deny all virtue to the automobilist. Now that he has polluted the roads he may as well be used. There is no longer any pedestrian pleasure in a white ribbon of road; instead of stretching one's legs into the long, relaxed stride that comes as a rest after uneven country one must step uneasily, with ear tense and muscles ready for the jump across the ditch when such city-folk as you scoot past. I have no protest to make against those who use you, who wait at the hill-top or the railroad crossing, the only points where you slow down, and demand a lift. But I pity those who think of this as romance. We who have done it know better.

* * * * *

“Hitch-hiking is no thoughtless expression of the untrammeled pioneer, but one of the most desolate of the exact sciences. From the point of view of the dull motorist it may have an element of adventure. Even the girls who sleep at the “Y” must be exciting to those victims of civilization, like yourself, who know only the type that ride in automobiles and sleep in hotels. But from the point of view of the pedestrian all automobilists fall into dead categories. There is no use hailing a car with two young folks of opposite sexes on the front seat, even though there be five unoccupied places in the rear. There is no use trying to stop a driver who wears goggles; they are all flinty-hearted. A lone man hiker need never trouble to hail a car with only men inside and a lone girl hiker wastes time in appealing to women. It takes a quick eye to appraise a car and its occupants before it has passed forever—whether one had best appeal to the driver or to the woman (or in these days man) beside him or her, how much room there is behind, and whether one had best ask a lift only to the next village or admit that one has fifty miles to go. Like all sciences it seems fascinating to the amateur, but it becomes dull and disappointing after a little experience. The automobilists are so uninteresting.

* * * * *

“There is romance, there is adventure, there is mystery for the hiker afoot who, with an all-sufficient pack upon his back, is free to desert roads and even paths, can cross any stream and scale any mountain, and follow any inviting vista without consulting the blue-book. Those Adirondacks and Green Mountains which looked so beautiful to you from the road—what do you know of them now? You might as well say that you understood candy because you had gazed at it through a plate-glass window. Mountains must be climbed as surely as candy must be tasted. But what is the use of explaining this to you? Probably you are old, rheumatic, and dyspeptic.

RAIC Declares a Dividend

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Russian-American Industrial Corporation has just announced its first dividend of 3 per cent.

The investment of our corporation in the Russian clothing industry has proved to be profitable, the All-Russian Clothing Syndicate having been operated on a sound basis. The results of its work for the past six months indicate quite convincingly that the Russian workers know how to run their clothing factories.

The letter from Chairman Bograchev of the Syndicate, referring to the operations of the last half-year, inform us that “from the figures in the balance sheet it is apparent that the expected profits of the Syndicate have been exceeded.” So it appears that those doubters who scoffed at the Russian-American Industrial Corporation when it ventured to help build up a branch of industry in the Soviet Republic have now to face facts that show them to have been in error in their opinion concerning the ability of the Russian garment workers to carry on profitable business.

It so happens that during the past year the activities of the Syndicate, in which we have invested, have spread over the territories of the Soviet Union. The Syndicate has opened sales agencies and stores in 25 cities, as far south as Tiflis and as far east as Irkutsk in Siberia. The membership in the Syndicate which now employs over 15,000 workers has been increased by the entrance of several new city trusts, so that the Syndicate now comprises, in addition to our corporation, the Supreme Council of National Economy, the Moscow Experimental Factory, and the clothing trusts of the following cities: Petrograd, Moscow, Nizhni Novgorod, Kazan, Kharkov, Tambov, and Egorievsk.

During the period of the civil wars in Russia the clothing industries worked almost exclusively on military uniforms and equipment. Now the growing purchasing power of the peasants, stimulated by fair harvests, has increased the demand for the clothes manufactured in the factories, which are now working 90 per cent on the wholesale manufacture of civilian clothing.

The presence in Russia of several score of ex-members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers—men who have gained valuable experience in the American needle industry—has contributed much to the success of the Syndicate's factories. The manager of the Moscow Experimental Factory, one of the most up-to-date clothing shops on the continent of Europe, was formerly an active Amalgamated member in Baltimore. The representative of our corporation in Russia, Mr. D. Petrovsky, was one of the first organizers of the Amalgamated, having worked in the Rochester market in 1915, later returning to Russia to become the mayor of a city of 80,000 in the Ukraine.

The close association of these men with the American industry has contributed much to the splendid technical organization of some of the Russian factories. The efficiency of these factories has risen steadily during the last twelve months. "When I was in Russia last fall it took 16 to 19 hours to make an average quality men's suit (about $25). Now it takes only 12 to 13 hours to complete a suit of this kind. With the introduction of further modern technical equipment in the factories of the Syndicate the efficiency of the shops will be increased still more," writes the Chairman of the Syndicate in a recent letter.

When the Amalgamated at its biennial Convention in 1922 voted to help Russia by organizing a one-million-dollar corporation, the American friends of Russia whom we called upon to subscribe to stock had the pledge of the highest Soviet authorities that the capital invested in Russian enterprises would be guaranteed as well as a dividend of 8 per cent payable to our corporation on the capital stock so invested. Now, however, with a year's experience and the announcement of the first dividend, we have something more tangible than even the contract of the Russians, something that ought to increase confidence in Russian industry and stimulate others to a genuine desire to help her in this very practical way. The capital stock of the corporation has not yet been fully subscribed. There is still some for those who want to join in a movement to give credit rather than charity to the Russian workers. Approximately five and one-half thousand shareholders are now participating in our enterprise and will benefit by the first dividend that has been paid out of Russian industry to a large group of investors since the adoption of the new economic policy.

A Plea from Haiti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The situation in our republic has reached a new phase. Senator McCormick and the National City Bank wanted the loan, and imposed it upon the Haitian people against their will. We were not opposed in principle to a loan to facilitate the liquidation of our foreign debt, but we wanted any loan to be made under conditions which would not exhaust the resources of the nation as has the present loan.

What we foresaw has occurred. The loan voted, it became necessary to impose new taxes. The people protested everywhere against the Borno Government and against the military occupation of the United States. When M. Bouchereau, the Minister of Public Instruction, went to Jacmel to defend the policy of the Government he found the population of that important city so hostile that after four days throughout which he kept himself in hiding he returned to Port au Prince without having come into direct contact with the people. On the other hand the editors of the opposition journal, the Courrier Haitien, received continued ovations in the Department of the South.

In order to direct this wave of discontent and to prevent it degenerating into a bloody conflict we have undertaken a campaign for the restoration of the legislative bodies. We are asking a return of the legal regime established by our constitution. Since the United States military forces dissolved our legislative chambers in 1918 we have had no election. A body of officials in the so-called Council of State named by the President and revocable at his will has usurped and exercises legislative functions. Even the pseudo-constitution prepared by your Mr. Franklin Roosevelt which was imposed on us under the Dartiguenave regime provides for elections every two years. But a tiny phrase, "s'il y a lieu," seems to withdraw with one hand what the constitution grants with the other, and as the duty of decreeing elections in accordance with the constitution falls upon the president of the Republic, his legal advisers have maintained that he may indefinitely suspend the exercise of the right of suffrage, contrary as that is to the fundamental principle of democratic and representative government.

We ask that the Government of the United States, since M. Borno derives his powers from it alone, should ask our president to permit our citizens freely to exercise their right to vote under an electoral statute to be established by a commission of impartial jurists. If we do not have such a reform of the electoral law we are determined to go to the polls anyway on January 10 next.

It seems to us that the time has come for President Coolidge to carry out the only experiment which has not yet been tried: to bring his government into touch with the authorized representative of the Haitian people in order to establish a modus vivendi satisfactory to both. It is neither just nor reasonable to treat Haiti and the Dominican Republic differently.

A Company Dinner for Lloyd George

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article What is an American Dinner? in your issue of October 17 awakes in me a responsive chord. I have often wished that we might have in each of our large cities at least one restaurant making a specialty of typical American dinners. One can now get everywhere good French dinners, Italian dinners, Spanish, German, and Russian dinners, Chinese meals, and also Arabic and Hindu, for all that I know. But most American restaurants, as you rightly indicate, do not even know what American dishes are. Good corn on the cob, for instance, is by no means easy to get.

Your menu for Mr. Lloyd George is pretty good, but it contemplates offering him what I should call a "good home dinner." Why not give him something extra, like terrapin and canvas-back duck? By the by, in serving him pumpkin pie care should be taken that it is made out of real pumpkins and not of squash. Squash pie is good, but, as Kipling says, "that is another story."

Your condemnation of pie à la mode shows insufficient discrimination. It depends on the pie. Americans have always eaten cream with apple pie and freezing the cream is a mere detail. Did you ever taste a molasses-lemon pie? It sounds queer, but it is one of the most delicious dishes ever concocted on American soil. To add ice cream to it, however, would indeed be monstrous, as you say.

Elijah and the Clowns

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In reading your editorial note on the death of Al Miaco the clown, it occurred to me that you might be interested in the following translation of a Talmudic passage found in "A Book of Jewish Thoughts" (edited by the Chief Rabbi of England):

> Rabbi Baroka, a saintly mystic, one day as he was walking through the crowded market-place of his town, met Elijah, the wandering spirit of prophecy in Jewish lore. "Who of all this multitude has the best claim to Heaven?" asked the Rabbi of his spirit companion. (Elijah points to a disreputable weird-looking creature, a turnkey.) "That man yonder, because he is considerate to his prisoners and refrains from all unnecessary cruelty. In that miniature hell over which he presides he has suppressed many a horror." "And who else is here worthy of eternal life?" continues the rabbi. Elijah then points to two motley-dressed fellows, clowns, who were supplying amusement to the bystanders. The rabbi's astonishment knew no bounds. "Scorn them not," explains the prophet, "it is always their habit, even when not performing for hire to cheer the depressed and the sorrowful. Whenever they see a sufferer they join him, and by merry talk cause him to forget his grief." . . . A jester may be first in the kingdom of heaven. . . .

Casuistry and Strategy

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A peculiar problem of casuistry has arisen in the affairs of the American Civil Liberties Union, Southern California Branch. Eugene V. Debs was to speak at the Municipal Auditorium in Long Beach, and the American Legion and other super-patriots got after the city authorities and caused the canceling of the engagement. The organization of which I am director has been formed for the purpose of opposing such interference with free speech, so I went to call upon Squire DuRee, who is the custodian of public property in Long Beach, and applied for the use of the Municipal Auditorium to discuss whether or not Long Beach should have permitted Debs to speak. Permission was refused us. We then applied for permission to speak in Bixby Park, an open-air meeting. This permission was also refused, but Squire DuRee finally decided to permit us to hold a meeting there, provided we would pledge ourselves to make no reference to the barring of Debs.

So you see we were in a dilemma. If we held the meeting under those conditions we would gravely compromise our principles; on the other hand, if we did not hold the meeting, the people of Long Beach would not learn anything about what had happened. Our executive committee finally decided to compromise and hold the meeting. We figured that while we couldn't discuss the barring of Debs we could discuss the fact that the American Civil Liberties Union had been barred from mentioning a certain subject. Everybody in the audience would know what that subject was, and they would not be barred from discussing the matter all over the city!

So we held the meeting, and about five hundred people attended. That day the Long Beach papers were full of discussions of the fact that the director had censored the list of speakers, and had barred Mrs. Fanny Bixby Spencer, whose father gave Bixby Park to the city of Long Beach. Mrs. Spencer's crime was that she was a pacifist, like Debs. She went to the mayor, and the mayor countermanded Squire DuRee; so then there was more talk in Long Beach, and there were long discussions in the newspapers next day as to whether we had kept our pledge or had not kept our pledge.

We went to see Squire DuRee about it, and he professed himself as satisfied. Also he told us that we might have a meeting in the Municipal Auditorium if we would accept the same conditions. Our executive committee thereupon decided to compromise again; they take the position that next to making us appear upon the platform with a padlock upon our lips or with chains about our wrists, Squire DuRee has done the most significant thing we could have imagined. He has put us in a position to compel everybody in Long Beach to keep on talking about the question of the barring of Debs.

We write this letter in the hope that you will publish it and give still further impetus to the discussion of this forbidden topic. For one thing, you may be the means of letting other people in Long Beach know that we are in business at 540 Wilcox Building, Los Angeles, and that we can be tempted to compromise our principles if we can thereby accomplish our purpose of making the American people think about the protection of their civil liberties.

Wasteland

Kangaroo. By D. H. Lawrence. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

THIS latest product of Mr. Lawrence's restless febrile intelligence suggests the reflection that he is the best example of that drifting rudderless state of mind, without settled aims, beliefs, or standards, of which this age is so proud. That Wasteland which many have attempted to describe and of which Mr. Eliot, not to universal satisfaction, proclaimed himself the laureate, Mr. Lawrence describes most accurately without, like the laureate, finding the task gay or amusing but only because he finds himself in the land and can't get out. Like the rest of us he has enthusiastically destroyed illusions in the hope of arriving at truth, but having torn away the veils he is not sure that there is anything to see and so he either turns away in disgust or babbles orphically something about "the God you never see or visualize who stands darkly on the threshold of the phallic me"—rationalizing his bafflement into the semblance of a mystic system. He is a purely intuitive artist even when dealing with intellectual concepts, but all current thought, aspirations, and disgusts seethe in his spirit.

"Kangaroo," said by the publisher to be strongly autobiographic, has points of difference from the rest of his work. Love between man and woman plays little part in it, and the distance which he has been rapidly putting between his current style and the clear-flowing definite narrative which was the backbone of "Sons and Lovers" is here even further increased. The new book is not quite his best work, for it carries a heavy burden of mysticism, but the familiar manner and the characteristic passion are there. It is one more study of love and hatred between man and man or man and an idea, in which the reason for either emotion is less important than the passions themselves. Intellectually it may be not quite clear but all is tense. Phrases flash back and forth between the characters like lightning strokes in the heavily charged atmosphere about them, and they all beat the air in vain.

However much or little the outward events of the book may be autobiographical, the hero who flies from Europe because it is too old and rotten and then flies from Australia because it is too new and crude is the essential Lawrence. The picture which the author gives of the Australian Main Street with its vast stretches of iron-roofed bungalows, so easy, so slack, and so empty, is a masterly externization of the soul of a country, and from the conversations between the hero and the fantastic Nietzsche-Mussolini who dreams of conferring upon the Australians the benefits of rule there emerges a brilliant phantasmagoria of political speculation ending in no conclusion; but, when the hero cuts and runs to America, a land which he does not want to see, simply to get away from the people he knows, the whole becomes more interesting as a symbol of Lawrence and his attitude toward life than in itself.

The mutual irascibility which always subsists in his books between man and wife or lover and mistress and which constitutes with him the chief outward symptom of love gives one of the keys to his character. A nervous irritability is almost his dominant trait and he can never make up his mind about anything, be it religion or government or love, any more than he can long be attracted to people without wanting to be rid of them because everything gets so frightfully on his nerves. Petulantly sensitive to all appeals he is unable to get anywhere without being seized with revulsion and wanting to escape into some far country or to draw his quivering soul back into his shell and be done with the whole wretched business of living and feeling. He never stretches out that he does not draw back so that perpetual frustration keeps him perpetually tense and nothing is constant with him except excitement. Yet this morbid sensibility is the source of his strength as well as of his weakness. It gives the peculiarly modern twang to his writings, and it enables him to feel with unusual acuteness those sudden eager enthusiasms and quick passionate revulsions which constitute the inevitable reaction of a sensitive mind to the confusion of the modern world. Under a magnifying glass, as it were, he studies the emotional attractions and repulsions which affect us all, and he describes them more accurately than anyone else because he feels them more strongly.

The man is a genuinely tortured spirit and no mere player at disillusion and despair. There is, or he thinks there is, at the center of his being a desire for a contact with men and a chance, as his hero phrases it, to be something in the world of men. But in the center too is a cold little demon who lays a chilling finger on every love and every enthusiasm. No sooner does he find the love of a woman than revulsion sets in and he longs for the sturdy friendship of men; no sooner does the desired comrade stretch out his hand than something fastidious in him recoils as from the back-slap of a Rotarian; and no sooner does the cause to which he had hoped he might devote himself appear, than he realizes that it is not for him with his hesitance and his relenting. From everything he turns away or bolts and in his novels we have no conclusion but only thunderstorms of passion. What may one say of him except that he is the most interesting and the most unsatisfactory of novelists writing today? J. W. KRUTCH

Modern Russia

The Russian Soviet Republic. By Edward Alsworth Ross. The Century Company. $3.

MR. ROSS carries the story of modern Russia (a story which he began in two earlier books) almost up to the present day in "The Russian Soviet Republic." He disclaims any intention of writing a history; he has written, however, a fascinating narrative in which events of world-wide significance are presented at cinematograph speed, with the author's comments for captions. He has sifted great quantities of material, documents, propaganda, newspaper clippings, accounts by "eye-witnesses," and government reports. His story is not going to please everyone. The Russian aristocracy and former members of the Russian division of our State Department are going to feel that the book is too pro-bolshevist; our socialist and communist friends are going to object to Mr. Ross's manifest opposition to their economic philosophy and their fanaticism in carrying it out.

In an introductory chapter the philosophy of the leaders of the Russian revolution is presented briefly but with the sympathetic understanding of one who has met and admired these men. Their idealism, their devotion to a reorganized society free from exploitation, with equal opportunity for all, their fanaticism annihilating opposition are all depicted.

Mr. Ross, after discussing the peace of Brest-Litovsk and the bolshevist propaganda in Germany which followed it, concludes that the latter did not contribute perceptibly to the defeat of the German army. He rehearses rapidly the events of the spring of 1918 when the Allies discarded the opportunity of utilizing the disillusioned Russians against the Germans and when the fabric of falsehood originating in counter-revolutionary sources gradually enveloped the whole world. It was at this period, he recalls, that the bugaboo of German and Austrian armies of ex-prisoners of war marching back and forth across Russia was offered with our morning coffee, providing additional thrills to our already overworked emotions. He refutes the accusation that the Soviet Government was closely allied to the German Government and minimizes the amount of bolshevist propaganda abroad which, according to the newspapers of the day, resulted in demonstrations in Brisbane, strikes in Manitoba, protests from miners in South Africa, and plots against the Uruguayan Government.

Perhaps the best part of the whole book is the fascinating story of the Czecho-Slovak migration across Siberia. Mr. Ross shows clearly the sinister forces at work on both sides to bring about the Czecho-Slovak attack upon the Russians in the spring of 1918 and the resulting occupation of Siberia by the Americans in August of that year. He goes on to tell the story of the conspiracy of the representatives of the Allies in Russia to bring about a counter-revolution, admitting that he has to depend almost wholly on Soviet sources, for naturally the Allies have never made public their part in this unsuccessful and disgraceful affair. There are chapters on the Allied participation in the Kolchak, Denikin, Wrangel, and Yudenich bubbles. Then when Uritzki was assassinated and an attempt was made on Lenin's life he does not spare the Soviet Government, but charges it with horrible retaliation, retaliation which called forth Major Allen Wardwell's protest to Chicherin against the "intentions upon the part of the government to wreak a bloody vengeance upon a whole section of the people for no other reason than that they are suspected of holding political views different from those of the authorities."

In a chapter on The Poison Gas Attack, Mr. Ross has collected some fifty of the lies current in almost the entire American press regarding the situation in Russia. From the Rev. Dr. Hillis's confiscation of Y. M. C. A. property, through Chinese executions, to that crowning absurdity, nationalization of women, the whole galaxy of calumnies is represented. The persistence of these stories is indicated by the fact that the writer of this review was accused by one of the government divisions as late as the summer of 1919 of undue sympathy with the Soviet Government because he denied that he had seen in Petrograd (from which he had just come) placards nationalizing women. The government division was sure that these placards covered the walls of Petrograd, for had not a government official in Copenhagen so reported?

There are interesting chapters on the political system, Communist Party, peasants, production, justice, education, and the church, and perhaps a little too much generalization in describing the inefficiency of Russian schools under the Czar. The writer had the good fortune to spend many days in schools in the southeast of Russia just previous to the first revolution and in some of them teachers trained in Germany and England were doing excellent work in well-equipped schoolbuildings.

Mr. Ross brings his narrative to a close by discussing some of the probable world effects of the Russian revolution in the decades to come. He thinks its influence will be not in abolishing private capital but rather in training production for profit to subserve the general welfare. WALTER W. PETTIT

Letters of a Scientist

The Story of the Development of a Youth. Letters to his Parents, 1852-1856. By Ernst Haeckel. Translated by G. Barry Gifford. Harper and Brothers. $3.

"EXACTLY that which people despise and tread under foot as contemptible, inferior dirt, the green slime on old wood lying in the water, the turbid foam on the surface of the mire, does not my microscope prove these things to be just the most magnificent and most marvelous forms of creation? Never, by the way, have I missed my beloved microscope so painfully as in those days when the waters of the mountains offered me so much and such new material, animal and vegetable, for my microscope. So, thereupon, I took a solemn oath never, no matter how great the possible difficulty in the way, even on journeys, to let the dear companion of my life, which opens to me an infinitude of organic life where the unassisted eye sees nothing but rubbish and rottenness, out of my sight."

Such rapturous outpourings as this from the pen of a university student of twenty-one years do not often reach the eyes of parents, especially concerning so unromantic a theme as a microscope. They express, however, not the exalted mood of a moment, but a profound and permanent passion for nature, given lyric utterance with a hundred variations, intermixed with a minute account of daily happenings, meals, expenditures, and ailments, as well as with reflections upon life, upon God, and upon human destiny.

During the four years of his student days at Würzburg, the period covered by these letters, Ernst Haeckel sketched microscopic forms and preserved mosses and insects, "my hay and vermin," with an ardent devotion incomprehensible to ordinary minds. The gift of Berghaus's Physical Atlas made of his eighteenth birthday an exciting adventure among geographical plates. Literature, too, was no terra incognita to him. He read Goethe and Lessing for pleasure, and Homer in the original. A letter dated New Year's eve, 1853, contains the following postscript: "When I asked you to send Homer to me, I meant the original in Greek, which affords me quite another pleasure than the translation. However, I am quite fond of reading it once more in that form." For painting and sculpture he had an enthusiastic appreciation, but, an unusual thing in a German of culture, little enjoyment of music. "My musical sense is in reality equal to zero. The only music in which I take any interest is the popular song."

It would be a mistake to assume that this youth was an average German university student of the early fifties. His isolation from most of his fellows is evident. In their jollifications, their Studentenspritze, their drinking bouts, he was both unable and unwilling to join. He recounts some pathetic attempts to enter with ease into general social life. Concerning an excursion at which young ladies were present, he comments: "I have learned how to navigate safely around such rocks [namely the task of entertaining these ladies] so I did not speak a single word to one of them throughout the day." After two years of residence in Würzburg he remarks that he is "not conscious of knowing, with the exception of Frau Professor Schenk and Frau Dr. Gsell-Fels, any female soul in the whole of Würzburg, even by sight." He has nevertheless quite enough in common with the life around him to make the letters valuable as a picture of the university life of the time. They are still more important to the psychologist for the revelation they contain of a growing mind, and in particular the growing mind of a man of undoubted genius. No laboratory could furnish data half so significant, and none of the many recent studies of youth in fictional form escapes the unconscious distortion which mature reflection inevitably gives. As literature, neither in the original nor in this fairly good translation does the book quite merit Professor Schmidt's enthusiastic preface. For, in range of ideas and experience, in variety and richness of expression, many collections of letters are superior to these, though few equal them in candor, in depth of feeling, and in the completeness with which the heart is "shaken out."

Possibly, however, the chief interest of the volume lies in the light thrown upon the career of the mature Haeckel, the impassioned apostle of Darwinism, the poet-prophet who made materialism a religion, the zealot who led the German professors in their pronouncement regarding Germany's innocence in the Great War. Haeckel's American friends apologized for his war hysteria on the score of his advanced age and failing powers. But he had earlier shown the same docility in making his powerful intellect the servant of an intolerable governmental policy. In 1870 he cut from one of his books a passionate protest against militarism with its waste of precious human life, and during the Kulturkampf he inserted an attack on Catholicism. The real explanation is based upon that combination of indifference to politics with deep-seated respect for authority which was the price consciously or unconsciously paid by many German university professors for their boasted Lehrfreiheit.

When Haeckel first read Darwin's "Origin of Species," he remarked that he could have written much of it himself. In these letters it is evident that for him the dividing line between plant and animal life is already growing dim. Indeed the final step in this process of thought, a completely monistic philosophy in which all nature is regarded as the working out of uniform laws, a step which Darwin himself seems never to have taken, is already present to his mind. In the letters, Monism, which ultimately became a religion to Haeckel, is in continual conflict with a devout pietism that had been deeply instilled by parental training, and evidently was as nearly native to his temperament as religious feeling can be. Like many other devout souls, he staved off the crisis of the conflict by separating the spheres of religion and science. "Also I myself can only find comfort and peace in this Christian belief, which is contemplated by so many and such important minds to be mere ridiculous foolishness, by my admitting this life of faith as a sphere quite apart from the life of knowledge and understanding based on the evidence of our five senses, which is not only possible side by side with it but also necessary, just as justified, and even infinitely more important." This twofold truth subterfuge begins to wear thin in the latter part of the correspondence, and only a few years subsequently the open break with Christianity came. We actually find him in middle life issuing a challenge upon the subject to his former teacher and friend, the great scientist Virchow, against whose materialistic views he had struggled throughout his university years, but who in later life turned apologist for institutional Christianity.

The less unusual traits of personality revealed in the letters: artistic sensitiveness, eagerness and impatience of temper, passionate loyalty to family and friends, susceptibility to partisan prejudice, sincere concern for human welfare, emotional fervor in the discussion even of abstract subjects, add greatly to the reader's interest and are by no means unimportant in explaining the extent and specific character of Haeckel's influence throughout his remarkable career.

The Large View

Building the American Nation. An Essay of Interpretation. By Nicholas Murray Butler. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

PRESIDENT BUTLER continues to speak and write, but he seems pretty much to have given up publishing anything that is new. With only such variety as naturally comes from the choice of different subjects, almost any one of his recent books is of a piece with its companions. The same sententious style, the same conventional thought, the same elementary generalizations resting upon an unimpeachable but modest body of data, the same dignified assumption of the large view, and the same complacently hopeful tone, characterize them all. The president of the greatest American university is unquestionably the best American exponent of commonplace observations on what are comprehensively classed as "public questions." We have linked together President Butler's writing and speaking because they are, as a matter of fact, hardly to be separated, most of his books being little if anything more than collections of addresses; and since he has been successful in "drawing" rather more lectureships of a quasi-public kind than any American now living, the announcement of a new appointment is practically equivalent to the announcement of a new book.

"Building the American Nation" is a good illustration of what has just been said. The volume comprises the lectures given in Great Britain by President Butler during the present year on the Sir George Watson foundation for American history, literature, and institutions. The last of the lectures was delivered on June 11, and the book was off the press on August 24—quickly enough to reach any probable American public before the English audiences would have had time completely to forget.

Only to a British public, however, notoriously ignorant as that public is of American history, do the addresses here collected offer anything likely to be regarded as novel. There is nothing new in the book for American readers. The "builders of the nation" whom President Butler introduces are the same that any informed American would naturally expect him to introduce: Samuel Adams and Franklin for the days of Revolution, Washington for independence and the period of constitutional establishment, Hamilton and Madison for Constitution-making, Jefferson as the "spokesman of the democratic spirit," Marshall, Webster, and Jackson as "welders of the nation," and Lincoln as "defender and preserver of the nation's unity and power." Of each of these leaders President Butler says the well-known things that a lecturer in his position is usually expected to say, with the addition of enough comment and generalization to make it clear that there has actually been some development. That is all. The nature of the closing lecture, Fifty Years of Growth and Change, can be sufficiently gathered from the title. Nothing in the substance of the book calls for comment. The lectures are proper, well mannered, agreeable, and tailor-dressed, in every way the offering of a busy man who evidently thinks very highly of the only America that he perceives, and who knows perfectly how to give to an entirely respectable audience the kind of intellectual performance that it expects.

The Public-Health Nurse

The Evolution of Public Health Nursing. By Annie M. Brainard. W. B. Saunders Company. $3.

ALTHOUGH the earlier Christians insisted upon due mortification of the flesh, so that the holier among them disapproved such an obvious aid to hygiene as the bath, yet it was, paradoxically enough, from an impulse of pure Christianity that the nurse was derived. The first Roman deaconesses lived in an era when charity meant love. The same spirit, free from sectional prejudice or sectarian propagandism, animated Pastor Theodor Fliedner, who laid the foundations of modern nursing in the little German village of Kaiserswerth am Rhein (at any rate it was German a hundred years ago). The Kaiserswerth institution owed something of its inspiration to a great Englishwoman, Elizabeth Fry, so that Florence Nightingale had every right to borrow ideas therefrom. After she comes on the scene the history of public-health nursing must be transported to England, there to mature for the benefit of humanity through the next generation.

In England the idea of professional bedside care was developed and scientific training was gradually recognized as of greater importance than the ability to distribute material relief. There was at least one English doctor, born before his time, who realized the educative possibilities of a visiting nurse, but it was left to an American to found the first society for Instructive District Nursing. This society, founded at Boston in 1886, may be said to have introduced the present era in which the visiting nurse has come to be regarded by Professor Winslow and many other socially minded people as "the most important figure in the modern movement for the protection of the public health."

The question now arises whether the public-health nurse can compass all the manifold duties demanded of her. Must she cease to give bedside care as she has already forsaken the distribution of relief? A medical delegate (he was, if I remember rightly, a representative of Sweden) at the General Council of the League of Red Cross Societies, held in March, 1923, insisted that efficiency demands this sacrifice which in his country had already been made. There are many good reasons for hoping that the example will not be generally followed. An alternative relief is given by the process of specialization discussed by Miss Brainard in Chapters XVIII and XIX. Besides the tuberculosis nurse we already have the baby-welfare nurse, the factory nurse, the hospital social-service nurse, and the contagious-diseases nurse, to whom will be added perhaps one day that extremely important person the birth-control nurse and a specialist in eating and drinking. May the American of the future find it in his heart to make friends with all these people!

Tales Out of Russia

Russia Before Dawn. By F. A. Mackenzie. T. Fisher Unwin, Ltd.

Unfinished Tales from a Russian Prison. By Marguerite E. Harrison. George H. Doran Company. $2.

THE Soviet authorities have put the stamp of approval on Mr. Mackenzie's book by asking to have it translated into Russian. This leads one to suspect propaganda. But there is no propaganda—simply honest, competent, well-informed journalism. Mr. Mackenzie records many facts that most governments would not care to have stressed: the corruption and red tape, for instance, that curse the new regime as they cursed the old. The weary pilgrimage from department to department, from official to official, to secure a permit to take photographs or carry a few books out of the country, is the chief outdoor sport of Moscow; and swapping stories about delays and hindrances is one of the chief indoor sports. Mr. Mackenzie doesn't mince matters in his account of the treatment accorded foreign firms who have tried recently to do business in Russia: "until the spirit and methods of the Moscow officials are radically changed, big business will not come in." He regards the "definitely and actively anti-religious" attitude of the Communist state as a piece of folly that is happily not succeeding. The Young Communist carnival against religion last Christmas in Moscow, with all its "rough stuff" of effigies and cartoons, had few spectators, while the churches were crowded as never before.

But what appalling difficulties this government has grappled with! Mr. Mackenzie's survey covers the period from September, 1921, to January, 1923; and takes in not only the big cities, but many country districts, the famine area, and Siberia—"the Outer Marches." We have all read statistics about Russian railways and the breakdown of transportation. They come to life in Mr. Mackenzie's lively narrative—in such little episodes as that of the engine-driver mending a broken coupling-rod with a piece of rope. As for the famine, read A Corner of Samara and The City of Death, and then try to forget it all, if you can. Mr. Mackenzie, a Canadian, pays generous tribute to the work of the American Relief Administration.

The government has faced all these conditions, and has learned by experience to modify its policies. The steady improvement in many directions during the later months of Mr. Mackenzie's survey is very marked: the increasing reliability of the train service, the greater degree of personal security, the revival of private enterprise, the repainting and repaving of Moscow, the more abundant food supplies, and the dissolution of the Cheka, whose operations kept alive the atmosphere of terror. The Cheka looms large. In Petrograd especially "one rarely attended a party where there were not some recently released from the Cheka prison." "At least one-half of the people with whom I came in contact had been in prison at one time or the other during the past four years, some for only a few days, some for over a year. Most of them had been incarcerated for no special offense, but as suspects."

Mrs. Harrison gives us a "close-up" of one of these prisons in Moscow, and fourteen fascinating unfinished tales of the suspects who shared her imprisonment. Each story ends abruptly with the entrance of the guard who tells the prisoner to pack up her clothes and get ready to leave—for another prison, for trial, for the death sentence, or perhaps for freedom. There is the ballet-dancer who had been a political Commissar with the Red army, and had signed many death warrants herself; the young spy, the prostitute, the frivolous aristocrat, the Jewess, the Social Revolutionary, and others. One gains from these stories a picturesque impression of the strange disturbed life of the Russia of the last seven years, and the hazards of individual destinies. They are convincing, one feels, in spite of some pardonable journalistic heightening of effects.

Some Modern Essays

Extemporary Essays. By Maurice Hewlett. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $2.20.

On the Margin. By Aldous Huxley. George H. Doran Company. $2.

On. By Hilaire Belloc. George H. Doran Company. $2.

AFTER reading these three volumes I have realized how misused is the word "essay" and how neglected is the true function of this important division of literature. Between the writing of novels almost every author becomes what he calls an "essayist." Because he fancies himself as a critic of other authors he writes book reviews, inconsequential little pieces that in the journals serve their purpose as guides to the busy reader who seeks counsel in the purchasing of books, but hardly worth serious attention once their value has been dissipated by time.

Among the books that have provoked these remarks is Maurice Hewlett's "Extemporary Essays." Hewlett says: "If one had to define the essay it would be as the written, after-dinner monologue of a well-read, well-satisfied man of, at least, five-and-forty. Years don't matter: the spirit of years matters very much." This is a good, workable definition but judged by it there are few essays in Mr. Hewlett's own volume. Most of the fragments are book reviews, saved from mediocrity by the erudition that Hewlett has brought to his little tasks but rather dull reading because of the commonplace nature of the tasks themselves. This is unfortunate, for Hewlett possessed much of the charm of the elder essayists. He looked upon life with a knowing eye and had some humor. The few real essays that the book contains are excellent. "Junketings New and Old" and "Daily Bread" can stand the test of his own definition. They should agreeably affect any group of dinner companions. When the author quotes from the Greek it is not in the fashion of the young literary prigs but in the manner of one to whom the language is a living delight.

Aldous Huxley also suffers from the ambition of his publisher to put everything that he writes into book form. Now that "Chrome Yellow" and "Mortal Coils" have met with some popular success we may be sure that the author will not be able to write a letter to the Times without furnishing his publisher with a copy for inclusion in some future book of "Essays." You may forgive him much, however, when you come upon such a remark as this: "Among the minor makers of oriflammes there is our own Mr. Chesterton, with his heroic air of being forever on the point of setting out on a crusade, glorious with bunting and mounted on a rocking-horse." The essays—the real ones are few—are written with a great deal of skill but are not distinguished by choice of subject. The book shows none of the volatile imagination of "On" by Hilaire Belloc, who never seems to be engaged on a journalistic stint. Belloc avoids the ordinary "literary" subjects of his contemporaries. He skims over life, examining, commenting with suave irony. He and Max Beerbohm are almost alone in modern letters in reviving the essay from its state of neglect and in making it serve as a medium for original observations upon men and manners.

Belloc shows us something of what the essay may become when written by a man of intelligence and understanding. The essay, properly used, is a vital form of self-expression, equaled perhaps, but not surpassed by the lyric. And it is less hampered by traditional rules. To suggest that it keep within its special province is not to seek to limit its powers but rather to intensify them. The essay is not the place to mold mankind, nor, despite the august example of Matthew Arnold, is it the place to pound the pulpit that was worn smooth by his heavy fist. The writer who is actuated by a stern moral purpose may preach his creed in sermons and treatises, but the essay should be the personal vehicle of the civilized and genial man who takes the reader into his confidence when he reflects upon life.

HOWARD IRVING YOUNG

A Novel of the Nineties

Fan. The Story of a Young Girl's Life. By Henry Harford (W. H. Hudson). E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

THIS novel by the late Mr. Hudson, first published in 1892 under an unobtrusive pseudonym, is quite unlike any other piece of fiction that he wrote. The scenes of "The Purple Land," "Green Mansions," and "El Ombù" are set in distant places. "A Crystal Age" is concerned with the distant future, "Dead Man's Plack" is concerned with the distant past, and "A Little Boy Lost" is sheer fantasy. But "Fan" is as local and contemporary as the then recent "Esther Waters" and "Robert Elsmere," and indeed it shows the influence of those two books. The heroine rises from a London slum almost as terrible as that which Mr. Moore described, and in the course of her adventures she meets several provincial persons who are finding it as difficult to keep their religion as Mrs. Ward's clergyman found it to keep his.

Fan is a pure and beautiful girl of the tenements who at fifteen discovers that her real father had been a gentleman. Her drunken foster-father abandons her at her mother's death, and she is in a pitiable plight until she is taken under protection by the rich and passionate Mary Starbrow. The love between these two women is the central story, and it is perhaps unique in fiction, though it may derive in germ from the relations between Esther Waters and her benevolent London mistress. Mary is as tempestuous as Fan is calm, and in a fit of jealousy casts her off because it appears that her love is being diverted to Constance Churton, a tutoress in the west of England, to whom Fan has gone for a winter's instruction. After many vicissitudes, during which Fan becomes possessed of a fortune and the knowledge of her father, she is able to prove that she can love both Mary and Constance with her whole nature, and their reconciliation makes the end of the book. There are men; each of the three women loves a man; but these affairs are nothing to their feelings toward one another, just as the relation between Esther Waters and William finally becomes subordinate to the relation between Esther and her kind mistress in the country.

The book may borrow from this or that source, yet essentially it comes from Hudson's own character and observation. Fan is as much like her creator as a heroine could be. She has his purity, his simplicity of spirit, his perfect reasonableness, and his lack of salty humor. Indeed she conspires with him to make the book not altogether a success as a realistic study. She is too good, and she forces the other people to be too good, though Miss Starbrow is not too far from being the "demon" her brother called her, and Merton, the husband of Constance, remains an unregenerate charlatan till his death. "Fan" is not a perfect novel for the very reason, perhaps, that it is so good a book.

It is an excellent book, and every reader of Mr. Hudson will wish to see it. The writing is impeccable, of course. But readers of the posthumous work "A Hind in Richmond Park" will be especially interested to observe that portions of "Fan" are taken directly from the author's experience. In "A Hind in Richmond Park" Hudson tells how once on a windy street in London the vision fluttered before his face of a beloved girl whom he knew at the time to be eighty miles away. He had been wishing he could adopt her as his daughter, and she was more or less constantly in his mind; but at this particular instant, as he later discovered, she was in painful difficulties with her parents in the country—people whose narrow religion she found no longer tolerable—and was contemplating flight to him. In "Fan" the gentleman father has a similar vision of his daughter just before he dies, and Constance in the country struggles similarly with her mother over a cruel and ridiculous creed. Hudson often complained that he forgot most of the things in his life that would have made good reading. But he remembered much.

Books in Brief

America and the Atlantic. By Vice-Admiral G. A. Ballard. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

It is to be feared that the critical reader will hardly discover in Admiral Ballard's volume any very distinctive contribution to American history, notwithstanding that the maritime episodes which are dwelt upon, chiefly such as relate to colonization and the naval phases of wars, have some novelty of interest when grouped together. The most interesting part of the book is the few concluding pages in which Admiral Ballard points out the inevitable dependence of the Monroe Doctrine upon a fleet "powerful enough to insure its defense against reasonably possible risks." The strength or weakness of a navy, however, seems to depend very largely upon its position, and the summary view which the author gives of the comparative weakness of a modern navy, especially in the matters of fuel supply and repairs, when operating far from its base, contains suggestive material for a reply to the big-navy advocates who are forever talking of how easily the United States might be invaded, and shows pretty clearly that the maintenance of naval "superiority" serves no particular end except that of aggression. It is to the credit of Admiral Ballard that his final word should be a commendation of the disarmament policy which inspired, if unhappily it failed wholly to control, the Washington conference.

Ventures in Book Collecting. By William Harris Arnold. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

This is a far more delectable volume than its title might indicate. Mr. Arnold may have been primarily a collector of letters and first editions, but the motive force behind his zeal was that of a genuine lover of literature—this is evident from the wise and generous inclusion which he has made in this volume. He kindles the ardor, not alone of the connoisseur, but that of the mere student of literary history as well. His selection of topics is catholic, and he has brought to them a background of culture which makes a personal hobby doubly fascinating.

The House of the Enemy. By Camille Mallarmé. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

Despite the difference in setting, this novel has certain marked resemblances to the work of Bojer, particularly in the directness and the pace with which its story is unfolded. The scene is laid in La Mancha, and the complications grow out of those insoluble conflicts which arise when a child of the soil is thrown into the alien life of a fading aristocracy. Here the material has been handled with competence and vigor, and with a fidelity to human motives and relations which lifts the story above the commonplace.

The Best Poems of 1922. Selected by Thomas Moult. Decorated by Philip Hagreen. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

An admirable volume which it is to be hoped will inaugurate an annual series. Mr. Moult prints his choice of all the verse which has appeared within the year in both British and American magazines.

Oedipus Rex

FOR years scholars and dramaturgists of a definite pseudo-intellectual variety have pointed to the Oedipus Rex of Sophocles as the first thoroughly well-made play in the history of the drama. As they justify the money-grubbing of the Broadway hack through the fact that Shakespeare and Molière needed food and clothing, so they have justified the base ingenuity of the followers of Scribe by an appeal to the great and commanding name of Sophocles. Point by point it has been hard to break down the arguments thus advanced and the cultured public—the public that is only cultured—awed by the name of Sophocles, has swallowed Mary Roberts Rinehart and Sam Shipman without inner discomfort.

It is high time that the war be carried into the country of this particular enemy. From the point of view of plot and external fable the Oedipus Rex is melodrama; it is mystery melodrama of that well-recognized type in which the hero turns out to be the villain. Any schoolboy can see at once how this central device of the hero-villain results naturally in an action of gathering suspense and gradual unfoldment and has therefore been found grateful and lucrative by dozens of modern playwrights of infinitely varying gifts and qualities from the days of Kleist's "Der zerbrochene Krug" to those of "The Sign on the Door."

Not only is the Oedipus melodrama. It is upon the whole not very good melodrama. It is not possible to suspend disbelief sufficiently to accept anything so monstrous as that Oedipus and Jocasta, during many years of marriage, never exchanged such simple confidences as would have brought out the entire story. It may be pleasingly romantic to marry a gentleman with a mysterious past; the woman never lived who, after marriage, did not seek to render that past the reverse of mysterious. In brief, the Greeks of the fifth century did not care particularly for verisimilitude or for the logic of life or the concrete facts of human character. Absolutely their dramatic poetry remains great; relatively these are vital and, indeed, insufferable defects and the justification of bad modern work by an appeal to these defects is dangerous nonsense.

Their dramatic poetry remains great. What forevermore divides Oedipus from "The Sign on the Door" is its spiritual elevation and its poetry and its wisdom. Sophocles wrote a well-made melodrama. But what he was interested in was not primarily the plot and the suspense. It was the saga and its illustration of the inscrutable dealings of the gods with mankind. He had not the granite piety of Aeschylus nor the bold speculative intellect of Euripides. Yet he was a poet to whom ingenuity, though he possessed it, was of least concern.

Sir John Martin-Harvey's production at the Century Theater is dignified and pictorially satisfying and insufferably unrhythmical. Its only thrilling moment is the first in which the Theban populace throngs, suppliant, to the feet of Oedipus. But this thrill is a thrill provided by Max Reinhardt and its organic connection with the play and with the Greek theater remains more than doubtful. The rest is coldly formal. Nothing of the heat and mystery and terror is communicated, nothing of the gradual oncoming of an intolerable woe. The enunciation of all the actors is good; their gestures are correct. But what persuaded so hopelessly pedestrian an actor to attempt Sophocles? Of the precision of Sir Gilbert Murray's translation I am no judge. But I know that Sophocles was a great poet and that Murray, despite his inveterate imitation of Swinburne, is an exceedingly accomplished one. The actors do everything in their power to destroy the verse. They wrench it, break it, jangle it. The chanting choragus is interested only in his uninteresting tune. I listened for the beat of the verse; it was mangled. For the rich and emphatic rhymes; they were huddled out of sight. But the soul of poetry is in its form. Sophocles created through rhythm. Strip him of that and there is left a horrible nursery tale. It may make the flesh creep; it cannot elevate the mind or refresh the heart. This production aims at neither effect. It has cold, prosaic dignity. It is sober. It may be considered instructive. It does not live with the life of a great poet; it illustrates the Attic drama as conceived of by Professor . . . Personalities are useless. But no wonder that this actor was knighted.

A Correction

By a regrettable typographical error in the October 24 issue of The Nation, the last sentence in Johan J. Smertenko's review of Burton J. Hendrick's "The Jews in America" read as follows: "The author's purpose seems eminently laudable: he has sought a goat for the accused members of his race and found one in the Polish Jew."

It should read: "The author's purpose seems eminently laudable: he has sought a goat for the accused members of the race and found one in the Polish Jew."

Workers' Faculties

By HANNAH PICKERING

IN Moscow, along one of the principal streets, there is a large stone building, part of Moscow University. It might be one of the buildings of any city university in America except that the street in front is lined with second-hand bookstalls and the students going in and out are dressed in working clothes and are less healthy in appearance than the average American student group. Just inside is the ever-present bust of Karl Marx and above, the red banner "Workers of all Lands, Unite." This is the largest of the Workers' Faculty schools and has at present about twenty-five hundred students.

The Workers' Faculties, or "Rabfacs," are part of the general movement for the education of the workers and the peasants. They were started in 1919 with the idea of taking the "workers from the workshop and the peasants from the plow" and giving them three years of training preparatory to entering the university. This theoretical training added to their practical knowledge would fit them to go back as leaders of their various groups and would give Russia within a short time a large number of educated workers and peasants. No person can be sent who has not been doing some definite work and he must go on to the university when he has finished his Workers' Faculty course.

The number of schools has increased rapidly so that today there are eighty with over 35,000 students. Ten thousand of these students are in Moscow, four thousand in Petrograd, and the rest in schools throughout the provinces. Of this total, 70 per cent are workers and 30 per cent peasants, 75 per cent men and 25 per cent women. The ages of the majority range from eighteen to twenty-five years but there is no age limit set. There have already been 11,000 graduates who are at present in the universities.

The workers are chosen by their unions, the central office of the Workers' Faculties stating how many each union can send. The peasants are chosen by the village committees and go to the district Rabfac. Selection is based on (1) length of time in factory or field—it must be not less than three years; (2) ability; (3) social capacity. The student must be able to read and write, to have a certain amount of ability in expressing thought, and a knowledge of elementary arithmetic.

During the time he is at school he is supported by the state, receiving a monthly ration of food (1 pood of flour, 2 pounds of fat, 5 pounds of corn and meat), a small monthly wage, and, during the year, clothing. Most of them live in communal houses, some in private rooms. Certainly none are living in any great degree of comfort on the rations they receive, but they can exist and study. Prior to this fall the burden of supporting the students in the universities fell to the unions and the districts. Now this expense is being taken over by the Department of Education. The Rabfacs are nearly always in university buildings and most of the university professors teach there. All teachers must have a university degree. Only 2 or 3 per cent of them are members of the Communist Party. About 30 per cent of the students are Communists.

In general the student has three types of courses from which to choose: technical, which are taken by a majority; biological, for the agriculturists and those who will study medicine; and social science. The whole tendency of the educational system in Russia today is away from dulness in academic study. The curriculum of the Workers' Faculties offers to the students a few general subjects for the year from which to choose one. Then all his studies for that year are related to this subject. Suppose, for example, he chooses the Evolution of Technique. Under this he would take up the study of man and his implements of production, man and the machine, bringing in problems in mechanics, and man and water, under which he would get his knowledge of physics and chemistry. In this way during his training he gets his knowledge of biology, literature, economics, language, history, etc., related to the general subject chosen.

In most of the schools the faculty have formed committees to represent them before the students. Each week the teachers and students meet together to discuss various methods of teaching and studying, the students telling the teachers where they are at fault and the teacher commending or criticizing the student in his method of study.

When the end of the term comes thirty students in the group taking the same general subject are chosen by the group to examine the rest. The teachers give a report of each student. Then a committee of three students is chosen to complete the reports of individual students. After each report the teachers and students express opinions as to whether or not the student can be promoted. If the teachers and the group fail to agree, the directors of the school preside and the student has the right to be examined. In the general meeting he is judged by his knowledge of the subject, his ability to work, his activity at home and at school, his general development, and his ability.

In one beginning class of forty-five which we visited a poll was taken as to the authors read by the students. All had read Tolstoi and Gorki, thirty had read Goethe, fourteen Dostoevsky, and four or five each Jack London, Upton Sinclair, Wells, and Mark Twain. It was after this class that the students gathered around us and one youth who rivaled Trotzky in his oratorical ability sent "Greetings from the working youth of Russia to the working youth of America, with the hope that they, too, will soon throw off the yoke of capitalism making it possible for all to gain an education!"

Jews Under the Soviet Regime

By L. T.

ON September 9, the Jewish workers of Moscow celebrated the opening of the Jewish pavilion at the All-Russian Agricultural Exposition. The significance of this pavilion was thus summed up in the speech by M. Frumkin-Esther, the representative of the Jewish sections of the Communist Party (as recorded in the Moscow Yiddish daily Emes of September 11):

> The modest products of Jewish agriculture which you see here are the first green blossoms from a soil which has been fertilized by centuries of suffering. You will see here the map of our Soviet land showing the number of pogroms perpetrated by the counter-revolution in hundreds of Jewish cities and towns. You will find them marked with the colors of all the white-guard bands which have passed through them, leaving ruin in their wake. . . .

And now this earth, saturated with floods of blood, is being fertilized by the producing hands of the Jewish agricultural worker who puts into it his hope for a better future.

The significance of this pavilion is great in that it marks the historical turning-point of the Jewish masses. For more than a thousand years the Jews were forced out of every productive occupation. It took them hundreds of years before they regained the right to engage in manual labor, but still they were rigidly kept away from agriculture. There have been some attempts to settle Jews on the land. . . . But only the Soviet power has thrown the way wide open for the Jewish masses to work and create on the land which has for so long been soaked with their blood. . . . Equals among equals, hand in hand with those Ukrainian, White-Russian, and Russian peasants who had been separated by a wall of prejudices and darkness and who now extend a brotherly hand to each other.

Another Jewish exhibition which was recently held in Moscow and which attracted much attention was the exhibition of the All-Russian Jewish Public Committee (known as the "Yidgescom") which closed on September 15. According to the Moscow press this exhibition may be brought to America some time during the next winter.

Both of these exhibitions give a fairly complete summary of what the Jewish masses have recently achieved in Russia, at the same time plainly indicating the lines along which their further cultural, economic, and social development may be expected to progress.

The Jewish population of the Union of S.S.R. is centered chiefly in the Ukraine and White Russia which, up to the summer of 1920, were the battleground where the civil war was fought. In this civil war the Jewish population passed through a veritable hell before it found itself, ultimately and definitely, under Soviet rule.

When life, under the aegis of the Soviet power, became secure at last, the Jewish population was confronted with the unequaled tasks of rehabilitation from the utter ruin it had suffered. Chief among these were the tasks of economic reconstruction and of providing for the orphaned children. According to the figures made public by the Child-care Commission of the All-Russian Jewish Public Committee, the number of Jewish children who became orphaned during the war and the pogroms reached the staggering figure of 300,000 in a population of about 3,000,000. The number of refugees who left all their belongings to the mercy of the bandits and fled to the bigger cities where life was more safe, exceeded 500,000. Even that part of the Jewish population, which had not suffered physically, was economically in deep water, since trade, which had been the main occupation of the Jewish population, was practically at a standstill during the period of civil war.

The Soviet Government was quick to organize immediate relief work on an extensive scale. This work was carried out through the government organs, such as the specially organized commissions for the relief of the victims of the counter-revolution, the Jewish sections of the Comissariat of Public Maintenance, the Jewish Division of the Commissariat of Nationalities (in the Ukraine—the Jewish sections of the Commissariat of Internal Affairs and of the local executive committees), and the Jewish sections of the Commissariat of Public Education, in close cooperation with the All-Russian Jewish Public Committee. The latter was organized in Moscow in July, 1920, for the relief of the war and pogrom sufferers and soon became the leading Jewish public organization in the Soviet Federation with branches in every city and town with a considerable Jewish population. By virtue of the fact that the problem of constructive relief has become, of necessity, linked with every other problem of Jewish life in the Ukraine and White Russia, this organization has come to be identified with every Jewish public activity in the Soviet Union.

The chief concerns of the Jewish Public Committee are the uncared-for children, particularly the war and pogrom orphans. The data from its exhibition in Moscow show that at one time the Jewish Public Committee maintained and subsidized about 1,500 children's institutions in which 150,000 children were taken care of. At present the committee is maintaining upward of 1,000 institutions with 80,000 children. Most of these institutions are educational in character, intended not only to provide the children with food and shelter but to bring them up as useful citizens of the Workers' republic. Accordingly they are organized along the lines of the Soviet school system. Great stress is laid in these institutions upon the children's self-government and upon manual training. A large part of the exhibition of the J.P.C. is devoted to samples of the work done by the children in the institutions. Much of this work is of high artistic quality.

Together with the hundreds of Jewish schools under the supervision of the Jewish sections of the Commissariat of Public Education these orphans' homes form a widely distributed network of institutions for elementary education which, although not sufficient, still represent a remarkable achievement. Before the revolution there were practically no modern Jewish schools with Yiddish as the language of instruction.

In addition to these institutions of elementary education there have grown up a number of other Jewish cultural institutions of considerable merit. Chief among these are the Jewish art school and music school in Kiev, about ten normal schools, a few high schools, the Jewish departments at the universities of Moscow, Odessa, and Minsk, besides a hundred professional trade schools.

Special mention should be made of the Jewish Kammertheater in Moscow, which is the first Jewish state theater in history.

The Jewish Public Committee has been generously supported in its varied relief work by the Soviet Government. However, when Russia was confronted with the famine catastrophe the Soviet Government was obliged to reduce its material support to a minimum, and the Jewish Public Committee had to fall back for its funds upon the sympathetic cooperation of the Jewish masses of America. The committee, through its American representation, established close relations with the Jewish relief organizations in the United States, chiefly with the so-called Landmanschaften. It also organized the shipment of relief packages from private persons and the transmission of food remittances. The proceeds of these transmission operations went into the funds for the general relief work of the committee. According to the official data published by the American representation of the All-Russian Jewish Public Committee, it has transmitted from America clothes, food, and money to the amount of almost $3,500,000.

This does not include the funds spent for relief work in Russia by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Out of the $6,000,000 spent by the J.D.C. for relief work in Russia in conjunction with the work of the ARA, a considerable sum went to the children's institutions of the Jewish Public Committee and for the constructive relief work which the J.D.C. is carrying on in close cooperation with the Society for Spreading Handicraft and Agricultural Work among the Jews in Russia (known as the Russian "ORT").

The constructive work of the Jewish public organizations in the Soviet Union has contributed considerably toward the establishing of sounder economic foundations for the Jewish population. It has saved from complete ruin the old Jewish colonies in South Ukraine which, after they had undergone all the terrors of the civil war and the pogroms, were in danger of being wiped out by the famine. It has stimulated the organization of producing cooperatives and other forms of productive associations. The Soviet Government has lately decided to lift the burden of taxes from artisans who do not exploit labor. This measure is already showing its effects in increasing the number of Jews engaged in productive labor.

But the most significant achievement in the economic life of the Jewish population in the Soviet Union is the rapid spread of agriculture among them. The Jewish pavilion at the Agricultural Exposition in Moscow shows that the number of Jews engaged in agricultural work is at present about 77,000. Before the revolution the number of Jewish farm workers in Russia was only 52,000. The significance of these figures is not in their absolute numbers. It should be borne in mind that during the civil war the little there was of Jewish agriculture in Russia suffered a heavy setback and the number of 52,000 was reduced by many thousands of killed and refugees. The real growth of Jewish agriculture has therefore far exceeded the number of 25,000. Since the Soviet Government is heartily encouraging Jewish agriculture and since among the Jews themselves the tendency toward agriculture is assuming the proportions of a strong popular movement the future possibilities along these lines are most promising.

The Russian Cooperatives

THE following is part of a statement issued by Centrosoyus, the Russian Cooperatives' central organization, on the occasion of its twenty-fifth anniversary:

The opinion that all pre-war establishments in Russia have been completely wiped out appears to be prevalent in America. This belief is probably due to the fact that too much thought has been devoted to the political aspect of the Russian situation, and not enough to its commercial and industrial activities. The Centrosoyus, however, which today proudly celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary can boast of great accomplishments. It was born amid a most unhealthy and antagonistic atmosphere, progressed despite the repression of the Czarist Government, survived the most cataclysmic war the world has ever witnessed, withstood the severe hardships caused by the revolution with its consequent iron blockade, and through it all emerged more firmly intrenched than ever before. The cooperative movement is today the outstanding factor in the commercial and industrial life of the country, and in fact might well be considered the backbone of the entire business structure. . . .

On this account it might be considered appropriate to chronicle the growth and progress of the Centrosoyus. . . .

of profiteering by the local storekeepers. They were organized on a very modest scale by groups of villagers aimed to combat these gorging storekeepers. . . . The first Russian cooperative society was established in 1865, almost sixty years ago. The numerous previous applications for charters to form Cooperative Societies were rejected—the Government regarding them with suspicion. The movement progressed for about a decade, and societies were organized in rapid succession in all parts of the country until the Government was again aroused, when it saw fit to check the movement by inaugurating the famous "Administration Measures," which for a time diminished the hopes of its supporters.

During the period from 1875 to 1891, only 186 local cooperative societies were approved by the Government—the insignificant average of 11 per annum. . . . Repeated efforts were made to form federations of cooperative societies, and even attempts to hold conventions for this purpose proved futile. The necessity for the federation of all societies throughout the country into unions in order to carry on their work with any real measure of success became so keenly manifest that it was felt urgently necessary to center every effort upon this phase of development.

In 1891 the country was faced with famine, and the poorer classes, as a means of improving their intolerable position, turned in great numbers toward the cooperatives. This added strength and its consequent pressure, resulted in more liberality on the part of the Government in granting charters between the years 1891 and 1900. During this period 517 societies were approved, an average rate of 65 per annum. . . .

FORMATION OF THE "CENTROSOYUS"

In 1898, an exception was made with regard to the formation of federations of cooperative societies, and permission granted to the Centrosoyus to form a union of the Moscow societies. This field, however, was very limited inasmuch as it was restricted exclusively to the Moscow district. . . .

From this date until the beginning of the World War the cooperatives made smooth and steady progress. In 1905 the total number of cooperative organizations had already reached the number of 5,801. In 1914 they had expanded to the number of 30,842 societies. Practically all of this growth may be attributed directly to the formation of unions of cooperation which enabled the scattered societies to concentrate their activities, and thereby gain the advantage of larger and more economical purchases, and better results in the sale of the produce of their combined members. . . .

ACTIVITIES DURING THE WORLD WAR AND REVOLUTION

The beginning of the World War may be regarded as the turning-point in the history of the Russian cooperative movement. The Czarist Government in order to gain the full support of the country in waging war against Germany was induced to show a greater degree of tolerance toward the cooperatives. New cooperative societies thenceforth were organized at a phenomenal rate, as may be noted by the fact that on January 1, 1917, the number of societies had increased to 46,149. The consumers societies alone claimed a membership of 20,000,000 householders, representing a population of approximately 100,000,000 people. . . .

The cooperatives were intrusted with important tasks of supplying the army and the population with foodstuffs and supplies. The ability and results produced by the cooperative organizations during this period became generally recognized, and even the Department of Agriculture of the former Imperial Government intrusted them with many important tasks. When the Czarist Government was overthrown, the Provisional Government intrusted the regulation of the entire food supplies of the country to the cooperative organization.

Throughout the war and the subsequent revolution the cooperatives served as the largest factor in maintaining the production and distributive system. It may be definitely stated that were it not for the remarkable organization which they built up, far greater and more serious consequences might have been expected. Their organization enabled the population to survive the chaos caused by the revolution.

PRESENT FACILITIES OF THE CENTROSOYUS

According to the most recent statistics, which contain many omissions, the cooperative system is composed of the following:

|---|---|
| Consumers Societies | 23,852 |
| Agricultural Societies | 37,636 |
| Industrial Societies | 18,461 |
| Total | 79,949 |

Each of the above organizations operates one or more stores, branches, factories, etc., and it is therefore safe to say that the cooperative structure is composed of over 100,000 centers for the distribution of supplies, collection of crops, factories, and artels. Furthermore, the above figures do not include numerous credit and banking societies, nor the non-commercial activities of the Centrosoyus. It numbers among its non-commercial activities such organizations as schools, libraries, research and experimental laboratories, museums and expositions, dramatic and musical studios, hospitals, dispensaries, and sanitariums, clubhouses, dormitories, orphanages, summer camps, printing plants, and many other facilities of a similar nature. . . .

The proportion of merchandise handled by the cooperative societies compared with that of the whole country since 1914 is as follows:

|---|---|
| 1914 | 7 per cent |
| 1915 | 15 " " |
| 1916 | 32 " " |
| 1917 | 46 " " |
| 1918 | 40 " " |
| 1921 | 40 " " |

No reliable comparisons are obtainable since 1921, but it is safe to assume that in view of the fact that during the past few years the cooperatives have been allowed a greater degree of freedom by the Soviet Government they have gone far ahead of the proportion shown for 1921.

With its enormous facilities in every verst of the enormous territory comprising Russia and Siberia, together with its branches and agencies in all principal centers of the world in which it carries on its international trade, the cooperatives form the most practical commercial link with foreign countries under the present circumstances. Their large operations in connection with the exportation from Russia to all foreign lands of raw materials, and the importation of all sorts of manufactured articles are carried on through these facilities in foreign countries.

Communists in Saxony and Thuringia

THE policy of the Communists and their stand in entering the governments of Saxony and Thuringia which has brought about the present conflict between the Saxon Cabinet and the Central Government in Berlin is set forth in an article by Paul Boettcher, one of the Communist ministers of Saxony, and in a declaration by the Central Commitee of the Communist Party of Germany, both published in the Internationale Press-Korrespondenz of October 12. Paul Boettcher writes in his article:

Step by step the dictatorship of the industrialists is advancing upon Germany. The first attack of the reaction which began with the declaration of a state of emergency and was intended to end with the establishment of a directorate was not met immediately with a wide counter-attack by the working class of Germany. Many workers have still been led to believe that the state of emergency was a necessary measure adopted against the drive of the counter-revolution in Bavaria. But the proletariat now clearly realizes that the state of emergency is directed against the left. The proletariat of central Germany, menaced by the Hitler guards from the south and by the legal and illegal Reichswehr formations in the north, was the first to prepare for the counter-attack.

The Communist Party has taken the initiative of creating a labor government in Saxony. The Communist Party came to the workers with an emergency program to meet the emergency state. This emergency program found enthusiastic response among the workers. The seriousness of the situation was fully realized in the factories. Spontaneously executive committees were organized for defense against any attacks on the part of the Fascisti. The centralized coordination of the executive committee all over Saxony is well under way. The masses of workers are streaming into the defense organizations. They build and fortify their cadres and they demand arms for the hundreds. Surely and steadily the mass movement is growing from the bottom up.

The counter-revolution has completed the preparations for its blow. It may be expected to attack now at any time. Each hour lost by the proletariat in organizing its defense is a loss irreparable. The situation calls for quick action. The Communist Party has therefore proposed the immediate creation of a workers' government. The basis upon which this government is created is the struggle against reaction and counter-revolution with all means. The Communists are entering this government not as opportunists but as the representatives of the workers who are ready to fight. This government will come into existence as a government of struggle carrying out the mobilization of the masses and working for the establishment of the united front of the proletariat on a wide basis. Even before the workers' government has come into existence the whole bourgeois press has raised a cry. The concentrated attacks of the counter-revolution against Saxony and Thuringia show that it is intended to destroy the last positions of the German workers. The Saxon workers above cannot counter this attack. The whole German working class must declare its solidarity with the advanced lines of the proletariat in Saxony and Thuringia. It should not permit any attack of the counter-revolution against central Germany. The immediate future will be decisive. Central Germany has been handed over to the military commanders who have already organized their action against the "hundreds," the control committees, and the factory committees. Even tomorrow they may try to destroy the organizations of the proletariat.

The workers of central Germany will not yield one foot of ground without offering resistance. The leadership in this struggle is now in the hands of the workers of the governments of Saxony and Thuringia. It lies with the masses to destroy the plans of the counter-revolution which are intended to sabotage the labor bloc in central Germany.

The declaration of the Central Committee of the Communist Party follows:

The Central Committee has agreed to the entrance of the comrades Boettcher, Brandler, and Heckert into the Saxon Cabinet. The labor population is united against the bloc of the industrialists, the great landowners, and the monarchist generals. The capitalist military dictatorship is out to put chains on the working class.

The Communist members of the Saxon Government are instructed by the partly to organize, together with the Social-Democratic members of the cabinet, the most energetic defense against the menacing danger.

The Communist members of this Government are under the constant control and leadership of the party. The entrance of our comrades into the Saxon Government is not the result of a parliamentary business transaction. It is conforming with the decisive will of the labor masses to meet the attack of capital with a strongly united front. The government of the working class in Saxony is a signal for the working class of all Germany. It needs the active support of the proletariat of all Germany.

The Saxon experiment of creating a coalition government with the left Social Democrats in the hour of extreme danger and to organize the defense forces of the proletariat will prove successful when our party mobilizes the workers all over the country into a united fighting front against the class enemy.

THE LATE
DR. STEINMETZ & KUZBAS

A year ago Dr. Charles P. Steinmetz, the electrical wizard, was interviewed by Charles W. Wood of the New York "World." Talking of the Kuzbas Colony in Siberia Dr. Steinmetz said:

"I wish I could go to Kuzbas. That is the place for the working class to concentrate its activities."

Since that time Kuzbas has made Industrial History. It is succeeding. It is mining coal, making coke and chemicals, farming, constructing. How it does this is described in the "Kuzbas Bulletin," which is issued monthly. We will send you a copy on receipt of your address.

LLOYD GEORGE has gone home after a speaking trip through Canada and the United States which was more valuable than seemed likely. Lloyd George, as much as any other one man, must bear the responsibility of the withering Treaty of Versailles and of that post-war diplomacy of hate and blindness that has brought Europe to the verge of disruption. There is no reason to be sure that if allowed a free hand today he would prove very different. But as the preacher of an evangel of more realism and more reason in the effort to save Europe his speaking tour was most notable. Americans listened politely to Clemenceau's defense of French aggression; but, except to a limited degree, they did not accept it. To Lloyd George they listened enthusiastically, and they seemed to believe. What will be the eventual effect on public sentiment and government policy is another question, not easy to discern.

WHY not do by Mexico as we have done by Canada? For more than a century the United States and the Dominion have lived at peace under an agreement whereby the entire boundary is free of forts or garrisons, of bristling armament or clanking swords. During this period there have been many sharp disputes between the two governments; there will be more. But with each year the possibility of war with Canada grows more remote, the idea less thinkable. An unfortified border has been a psychological influence toward peace between the United States and Canada, just as it is between two States of our Union. Bishop Wilbur P. Thirkield of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose field includes Mexico, Central America, Panama, and Peru, proposes that we apply to the Mexican border the same doctrine of common sense and good-will that has been so signally successful in the case of Canada; he suggests that we dismantle the twelve forts along the border, with their 8,350 soldiers and 450 officers, substituting for them an organization of boundary police. Bishop Thirkield's suggestion is a splendid and practical one. Mexico, which has just been reducing its military forces to the extent at least of dropping 180 generals, would undoubtedly cooperate in demilitarizing her northern boundary. We commend the suggestion to progressive civic bodies. Disarmament of the border between Mexico and the United States would do more for mutual friendship than a dozen treaties, or a million after-dinner speeches on "cordial relations with our southern neighbor."

ROBERT LANSING approves of Mr. Hughes's "exchange of formal diplomatic notes" promising a New York banking firm certain assistance in connection with its $6,000,000 loan to the Republic of Salvador. Indeed, Mr. Lansing is almost dithyrambic in praise of Mr. Hughes's work on that loan. "Such a forward-looking step," he calls it in an interview printed in the New York Times, "so fine a demonstration of the mutual confidence between the two countries." It could never have been consummated, he says, "had not both governments acted in the greatest good faith and with the utmost spirit of cooperation." The good old Times, in printing this little blurb, to use the advertising phrase, for Mr. Hughes's and Messrs. F. J. Lisman and Co.'s Salvador loan, refers to Mr. Lansing as "Secretary of State under Mr. Wilson." Curiously enough, in the literature of the loan put out by the bankers, we find mention of him in quite another capacity. We find noted as counsel for F. J. Lisman and Co. "Robert Lansing and Lester H. Woolsey, Washington, D. C."

THE Argentine Chamber of Deputies has just voted an appropriation of $100,000,000 for military purposes, accompanying this rather silly vote with a very sensible resolution requesting the government to undertake friendly negotiations with Brazil in the hope of reaching an early agreement to stop the armament race between the two countries. They might at the same time have suggested that negotiations be undertaken with Mr. Hughes in the hope of persuading him to recall the diplomatic mission of American naval officers which is building up the Brazilian navy. This is the root of the trouble, and Mr. Hughes could stop it. The Brazilian craze for armament, which Mr. Hughes aids and abets, was the rock on which the generous hopes of the Santiago Conference were shattered. Armament rivalry is always silly, but the Argentine response is somewhat less silly than the Brazilian provocation. Mr. Hughes is a fervent believer in international agreements to limit armaments; why does he not recall Admiral Vogelsang's mission and thereby promote such a limitation in South America? He might even suggest a general agreement to call in no foreign military or naval missions of any kind.

OLD King Coal continues to be a topic of conversation and of thought among his subjects, the consumers. In spite of the brief strike of the anthracite miners, there is said to be a plentiful supply of hard coal on hand, but the short interruption and the slight advance in wages to the miners are being used as excuses by dealers to juggle with prices and by landlords as reasons for failure properly to heat their houses. In New York City a report to the United States District Attorney says that dealers are profiting through buying wholesale by the long ton of 2,240 pounds and selling to the public by the short ton of 2,000 pounds. The Coal Commission, on the other hand, relieves retailers, at least relatively, of the charge of profiteering, scoring this evil almost exclusively against the wholesalers. Of these there are too many, coal being sold among wholesalers two, three, and even four times. Reports to the commission indicate that during the last decade, except in 1921, wholesalers' net profits have every year amounted to more than 15 per cent on the investment and to more than 18 per cent on the proprietor's equity. In the banner year of 1920 reports from 333 wholesalers showed net profits of 55 per cent on investment and 66 per cent on proprietor's equity. Meanwhile cooperative movements are doing something for the consumer. The recently organized Cleveland Cooperative Coal Company hopes to save its members $5 a ton on their fuel.

SECRETARY HOOVER has some excellent ideas, from an engineering standpoint, for the development of superpower, but from the standpoint of the welfare of the public his conception is characteristically shortsighted. In speaking recently before the chairmen of the public-service commissions of eleven States, the Secretary of Commerce showed how New England and the Middle States might get together in developing water power to an extent which would effect an annual saving of 50,000,000 tons of coal and $500,000,000 in money at an investment of about $1,250,000,000. To do this, Mr. Hoover pointed out, the States concerned would have to agree on certain uniform regulations and would have to permit unrestricted transmission of power across their boundaries. So far, so good. But Mr. Hoover's idea is to turn these vast power possibilities over to private companies for exploitation. Why so? Why save $500,000,000 a year merely to distribute it as dividends among stockholders in public-utility corporations? The province of Ontario has done better. As we pointed out in an editorial in our issue of October 3, its publicly operated system is furnishing 600,000 horse-power at cost to 369 Canadian towns, and has cut the bills of consumers of electricity by one-half and two-thirds.

THIS limitation of immigration is a curious and difficult job. A number of the commentators on Charles P. Steinmetz have noted that he would be denied entrance to the United States under existing law. An unexpected effect of the new 3-per-cent-quota law is now in evidence. That law was designed to reduce immigration from the Mediterranean countries without cutting off the flow from Northern Europe, which parochial American opinion still persists in regarding as a superior stock. For the first two years of its operation the law did work in that way, but the first four months of the present fiscal year reveal a marked change. The British quota of 77,342 for the year 1923-24—the largest allotted to any nation—was more than exhausted with the November arrivals, and some 2,000 excess immigrants were allowed to land by a special ruling of the Secretary of Labor which possibly would not have been made but for the fact that most of them arrived on the Leviathan of the United States Lines. Exact compliance with the law might have made it necessary for the Government to fine itself about $400,000. At this writing figures in regard to the November arrivals from other countries are not available, but the outlook is that the 1923-24 quota for Belgium, Holland, Sweden, and Switzerland is about or entirely exhausted, while that for Denmark, France, and Norway will be used up before Christmas. Thus we are cutting off so-called "desirable immigration" as well as "undesirable."

WHEN the United States Steel Corporation declared an extra dividend the other day it admitted that Judge Gary's complaints of the high cost of the eight-hour day and the difficulty of obtaining adequate labor were mere steel-trust propaganda, without relation to the facts. The steel trust is now putting the eight-hour day into effect; business is not exceptionally good, yet it slices a five-million dollar melon. The most favorable inference is that Judge Gary did not know the facts about his own business, but had a sort of mossback conviction that any change must be bad. It is well to remember this; the American people have a sort of blind faith in the superhuman wisdom of their business executives. When a railroad president says that this or that is impossible, most people think that he must know what he is talking about, whereas in fact he may be just another Judge Gary. When the American Federation of Labor appropriated a few thousand dollars for the organization of the steel workers, the steel trust, theretofore recalcitrant, suddenly discovered that it was technically possible to abolish the twelve-hour day, and nevertheless finds profits so big as to justify an extra dividend.

NATURALLY the end of the twelve-hour day takes one issue away from the union organizer. But there is an even more serious obstacle to the unionization of the steel workers, and that is the color line drawn by many labor unions. The colored man has acquired a conviction that a drive to organize an industry in which many of his race work is likely to be a drive to force him out. The Crisis publishes a circular issued by the Indiana Foundry Company of Muncie, Indiana, which has imported Negro workers to replace white strikers. This company says:

> Our shop is operated on the open-shop basis. The majority of our skilled workers, the molders, are colored men, who have been taken into our plant as inexperienced men and taught all they know about work. The molders' union has never permitted a colored man to mold in our city and is attempting to stop us from adopting this policy now. There are four shops in our city that are closed to all but union molders and three shops like our own that are open to any workman. Ours, however, is the only local foundry that has ever attempted to employ colored men on skilled work. . . . The union demands that we take every colored man that we have off of skilled work, replace them with white men, and have these white men work under union jurisdiction.

The Nation believes in union organization because it believes in democracy in our industry, and sees in union labor organizations the greatest hope of achieving it. But when a union deliberately bars from membership a whole group of workers it abolishes its own excuse for existence. We are well aware that "open shop" is a pretty name for non-union shops and realize that the foundry's devotion to the Negro is merely devotion to cheap labor. Nevertheless in such a case—if the facts as represented are correct—our sympathy goes to the open-shoppers. We hope they establish the right of the Negro to work.

AND while we are taking to task molders we may as well include the journeymen barbers, who have refused to open their ranks to women, and the American Federation of Labor itself, which has declined to grant a separate charter to the organized women barbers of the country. Let us warn them, in the language of their profession, that they are cutting off their noses to spite their faces. The women have plenty of weapons at hand and may easily decide to cut up—skilled barbers though they be. In fact, if they take our advice they will begin at once to slash their prices with a merciless blade and to undercut their male competitors until they shout for help. The president of the journeymen barbers says that women do not know how to wield a razor or push a clipper. This, of course, is bosh. Women were never kept out of any trade organization for lack of ability; quite the opposite. They are kept out only when they are looked upon as dangerous and intruding competitors. Their remedy is to make themselves a little more dangerous outside than in.

A THICK, sticky fog—the ancient enemy of fishermen—drifted between the schooner Bluenose and the race committee at Halifax, so that Captain Angus Walters quite lost his way and headed for home when he ought to have remained and finished the races with the Columbia for the cup. But nobody should take the incident too much to heart, nor fear that this flurry of bad weather will injure the future of what is at once the most professional and the most amateur of sailing contests—the most professional because the participants are bona fide fishermen and fishing vessels; the most amateur because this competition, like all of the best sport, is not an end in itself but a bit of play at the close of a hard day's work. Captain Ben Pine of the Columbia saved the situation by his fine sportsmanship in refusing the technical victory he might have had by sailing the course alone; and Captain Walters is sorry already for his display of pique. It should not be laid against him. His life is among realities, not regulations. His years on the fishing banks have given him in a high degree independence, contempt for public opinion, and obstinacy. These qualities unfit a man for modern gregarious society, but they are the essence of our pioneer Americanism and not met with in such excess today that we need shed any tears at their occasional appearance.

TO sit at one's desk with the radiator whistling in one's ear and to read along with other cabled and wireless dispatches in the paper a story sent direct from a schooner locked in the ice of Smith Sound seven hundred-odd miles from the North Pole and in the darkness of the Arctic winter—this is to experience an authentic modern thrill. The sun is gone for the season, we learn; the bear and caribou hunting is not very good, but Captain MacMillan, leader of the latest polar expedition, asks us to imagine the party seated around the fire eating a tasty fox pie. There is a motion-picture machine on board and the Eskimos from shore come out over the ice to see the films and to hear the nightly radio concerts. Is this romance or is it the end of romance? We hardly know; but we know that some chord is stirred in us at the mere thought of that handful of ice-locked humans on the bleak top of the world listening in on the stock market reports from WGY, Schenectady, while the winds from the Pole rattle the rigging and ice thickens around the ship.

THE League of Composers is beginning its second season with redoubled energy and excellent plans. What is so important about this undertaking is primarily neither the exact programs of its three subscription concerts nor the contents of its magazine bulletin. It is the spirit of creative cooperation with the art of music that makes the work of the league invaluable. Here, as in literature, there is a striving after new moods and forms. But the works that embody these find it almost impossible to get a hearing. Neither the average critic nor the average conductor stops to remember that the later works of Beethoven were once thought unintelligible and all of Wagner both cacophonous and immoral. At its first concert of the season the league will present a new quintet by Ernest Bloch; it will introduce a young English composer, Arthur Bliss; it will play Stravinsky and Roussel. Harold Bauer and the Lenox Quartet are giving their services.

"WE have the dead, and America wants them," wrote Mr. J. C. Squire to the Manchester Guardian. He felt, he added, that an opportunity was being neglected:

> It is quite conceivable "that a commodity so eagerly sought would fetch as much as an old master. . . . Any guess at what a really determined American would offer for Sir Walter Raleigh must be wild, but six figures seems to me a moderate estimate. . . . I honestly believe that for the single body of Shakespeare we might secure the cancelation of the entire American debt.

So he suggested the formation of a company, to be given a national monopoly, to exploit the dead. The next day the Guardian printed the following letter:

> SIR: Can you put me into communication with one Mr. J. C. Squire who announced in a recent issue of your paper that he is forming the Posthumous Exploitations Company, Ltd., for the purpose of selling the illustrious dead of England to America? I am a self-made American business man with a great many millions but with no ancestors—to speak of. I should like some ancestors—to speak of. I will pay Mr. Squire any sum within reason for a Crusader, so that he be Norman and Warranted Entire. I should reinter him with appropriate ceremonies on the part of the Ku Klux Klan on my oil lands near Oklahoma City.
> DONALD R. P. MARQUIS

And the next morning the colyumist, who had meanwhile swathed his left foot in gouty bandages, was besieged by British antique dealers, to whom he explained his theory that the Oglethorpe incident was but a trick by Egyptian-Americans to get back at the British for unearthing Tut-Ankh-Amen.

America in the Fog

THE vagaries of Washington policy are difficult to chart. When we wrote our editorial, Much Ado About Nothing, last week, Washington was still insisting that Poincaré had really accepted its proposal. On the day following Senator McCormick's classical challenge to the "lotus-eaters" in the State Department we were still informed that the French reply "in the opinion of Secretary Hughes constitutes an agreeable acceptance."

Suddenly the wind veered and the temperature dropped. The Government, after a week of blithe optimism, discovered that it was "quite useless to undertake an inquiry if the commission is to be so restricted in advance that its efforts are likely to prove abortive"; and it also discovered that Poincaré's limitations constituted such a restriction. What had happened? Did Senator McCormick's speech frighten it, or Hiram Johnson's common-sense statement that the Government already had a hotel-full of experts in Paris, who either did not know what Germany could pay, in which case they should be recalled, or did know, in which case they ought to tell? Or had administration officials really failed to read Poincaré's notes and speeches? It is a mystery which we cannot solve.

This we do know: it is useless to expect effective diplomatic aid from Mr. Hughes. Poincaré insists that the conference shall not discuss limitation of the German debt, and Mr. Hughes finally, quite rightly, has protested. But Mr. Hughes had already insisted that the conference must not treat of France's debt to us, and that is to be as blind as M. Poincaré. A conference which is to be of use to Europe must have its hands free, and be in a position to discuss any influence which may bear upon Europe's restoration. Mr. Hughes set the first limitation when he barred discussion of the Allied debts to us.

Mr. Hughes had to make his limitation. Congress had tied his hands. Congress suspects him and will not trust him. Congress knows very well that Mr. Hughes was and is at heart for the League of Nations, for what it calls entangling political alliances; and it suspects that any halfway step he may take toward Europe looks toward that end. Yet the plain fact is that we cannot help Europe by mere gestures, and that the one strong card which we hold is precisely those inter-Allied debts. M. Loucheur has told us quite frankly that France will never pay them. That is probably true, but they still constitute a card if we will play it. The debt of France to us is as unreal as the major part of the German debt to France, but Poincaré has shown us that even an impossible debt may be trumps in the hand of a good player.

Meanwhile, with Congress too suspicious of Mr. Hughes to let him play our cards, the United States is, diplomatically speaking, negligible. Despite all the hullabaloo about our supposed return to Europe, we cannot, so long as Mr. Hughes is at the helm, play an effective political part.

There remains relief. We have given much and we are tired of giving. But the need grows ever greater, and we alone can meet it. Misery is increasing in Germany, and the formation of a national committee for German relief, headed by General Henry T. Allen, and distributing through the Quakers, marks the real American statesmanship of the day. Its address is 19 West 44th Street, New York City. We urge our readers to help it.

Poincaré's Bargain

WHY should Poincaré be disturbed by the storms and cloudbursts of trans-Channel or trans-Atlantic opinion? Krupp and Stinnes are making terms with him, and who are Coolidge and Baldwin, Mussolini and Jaspar, or even Stresemann and the workers of Germany, compared to these men grown fat on ruin? These are the lords of Germany, the organizers of industry, the owners of coal, coke, and iron ore; and if they bow the knee to the blue-coated soldiers of France, what does the diplomatic disapprobation of the rest of the world mean to the victor? So, at least, it must seem to Poincaré. If his prophecy of victory in May has proved a most egregious and costly error, at least he has saved his face and held his office while other statesmen and prophets have wandered into oblivion. And in the end, Krupp and Stinnes have yielded to him.

The agreement, as reported, is an extraordinary document. The German Government has declared its inability to pay further reparations; Krupp and Stinnes take the burden upon their own shoulders, confident, apparently, that they can pass it on to the German workers, even if the Government could not. They agree to pay back instalments of the coal tax, and a tax on all coal mined in future; to deliver coal and coke according to the schedule in force in 1921; to supply the French railway system in the Rhineland and the Ruhr and all the Franco-Belgian services with such coal as they need, "without any consideration of payment and against simple requisition slips"; and to "accept the jurisdiction of the Franco-Belgian Industrial Control Commission on all matters of Ruhr industry."

With this agreement goes a contract for the ten-hour day. Before the French invasion Stinnes and his fellow-industrialists sought in vain to impose the ten-hour day upon the German workmen. Now, broken and beaten by the long resistance, the workers have to accept from Stinnes, allied with French bayonets, what they refused before the iron-masters had bartered away their national independence.

The completeness of the surrender is overwhelming. It is the more amazing because Stinnes has hitherto been the backbone of those who resisted payment of reparations by Germany. He, as much as any man in Germany, has obstructed the "policy of fulfilment"; he, more, probably, than any other one man in the world, has profited by the debacle of his fatherland, making millions by gambling in paper marks while his compatriots were being ruined; he, by his domination of the press of Germany, has fed the fires of hate of France and has encouraged the spirit which breaks out in petty putsches and riots. Yet today he makes terms with Poincaré. Doubtless there is more behind the agreement than appears in the dispatches. Behind it, probably, is a Franco-German industrial agreement which means political subserviency to France for the Ruhr and the Rhineland, but which also means production, and markets, and profits for Stinnes. It means that his pocket-nerve is stronger than his patriotism.

No wonder Poincaré was willing to let the Independent Rhineland movement, which he had fostered, go still-born. Stinnes in harness means more to him. He is as confident as were the Germans after Brest-Litovsk. But, like them, he is mad. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they do grind. A bargain that will involve the reprobation of the world, that depends upon the continued weakness of German labor and upon the continued dominant power of a few individuals, is only a temporary solution. Its success depends upon the assumption that German workingmen will remain doubly slaves: slaves to Stinnes and slaves to France. In the long run such a bargain, like Brest-Litovsk, is likely to cost a thousand times its immediate gain. Poincaré might well reflect upon the apparent German position early in 1918; his own today is no stronger.

Labor and Its Money

NO workers' movement of recent years has had the spectacular and galloping growth of labor banking. Even workers' education, which probably comes next in rate of progress, does not match it quantitatively or qualitatively. For several years the idea that labor should control its own money and credit was a pretty theory—the subject of considerable pious discussion. But in realization the thought just simmered. It was not until November 1 three years ago that labor established its first commercial bank: that of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in Cleveland. Six months earlier the International Association of Machinists had opened the Mount Vernon Savings Bank in Washington, but the functions and scope of a savings bank are so different that such an institution is hardly to be reckoned in the same category. It belongs more properly along with building and savings societies, of which various groups of workers have had successful organizations for many years. Even after the organization of the Brotherhood's bank in Cleveland, it stood virtually alone for more than a year. Then the pot which had been simmering so long suddenly seethed and boiled over. The development of labor banking in the last year and a half has been phenomenal not merely in extent but because it has occurred in a period of assaults upon the union shop, of efforts toward lower wages, and of considerable unemployment—a time, in fact, when workers generally were still victims of the backwash of post-war business depression and of reactionary public opinion.

Yet see what has happened! At the convention of the American Federation of Labor just ended in Portland, Oregon, the executive council reported twenty-three labor banks actually doing business or about ready for it, and some twenty more in course of organization. The labor banks actually opened have total resources of nearly fifty million dollars and include institutions in every section of the country—from New York City to San Bernardino, California, from Minneapolis and Chicago to Birmingham, Alabama, and Tucson, Arizona.

It is curious, too, that the development of labor banking in America has seen no similar growth in England, where trade unionism is in most other respects far stronger and more progressive. This is perhaps due to the greater inflexibility of British business life, but as English leaders are now calling for the entrance of labor into banking, the movement will probably not be long delayed. It is worth while to note, also, that the growth of labor banking in America has been accomplished against the indifference, if not the hostility, of the old-line leadership. At the 1921 convention of the American Federation of Labor the executive council gave a warning against labor banking. The organizations most influential in laying the foundations of the new movement are the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the International Association of Machinists, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and the International Ladies' Garment Workers. Two of these unions—the second and the last—are affiliated, it is true, with the A. F. of L., but all belong to the progressive wing of the American labor movement and are tolerated rather than liked by the Gompers machine. Opposition to labor banking by the old-line leaders is probably less due to the idea itself than to a sense that the movement is outside of their peculiar abilities—likely to carry power away from the walking-delegate type of men and into the hands of more constructive and better trained persons. Still, the old-school leaders evidently recognize that they must fall in line, proof of which is found in the establishment of the Federation Bank in New York by the Gompers group in New York labor and the announcement that John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, is to become the head of a new labor bank in Indianapolis.

There has been much speculation lately in regard to the tendencies and influence of labor banking. In opposition to the views of its sponsors that labor banking means the gradual control by labor of capital, there are some who see, instead, the eventual submersion of the interests and ideals of the workers in those of business. Again, certain social students who look forward to eventual control of credit and banking by government, think that labor banking will hold back such a movement. We confess that both these bases of opposition seem far fetched and of nothing but academic interest in any event. The future course of labor and of government is going to be influenced by a thousand other considerations. Labor banks will at most be only a factor and possibly merely an incident in the course of progress.

What seems of paramount importance at the moment is that labor by going into banking can, on the one hand, give banking facilities to numerous groups now deprived of them and, on the other, save to itself enormous amounts that are now exhausted in extravagant profits. Can any sincere friend of labor urge that it should not save or absorb this drain on its earnings? Allowing for inefficiency and actual graft—there will be instances of both all too soon in labor banking—is there any reason to suppose that labor's money cannot be more effectively handled by its friends than by those who, in general, are only its exploiters?

Men, Women, and Books

IT is easy to generalize, and being easy we like it. Consequently we have spent a pleasant week-end in making a couple of generalizations. One of them is this: Men writers of novels, being interested only in women, spend a wholly disproportionate amount of time discussing and speculating on the subject of women. And the other is this: Women writers of novels, being interested only in themselves, do exactly the same thing.

The result is rather depressing, and there seems to be no hope for a change until women scramble into a more comfortable and sun-warmed spot in the civilization of the world, and forget their troubles, and begin writing books about beautiful, aspiring, puzzling young men. Certainly in almost all the recent novels that have dealt with the relations of men and women, it is the women about whom the theme and the problem and the difficulties have revolved. This has been true even when the chief character is a man; his problems and larger problems such as Puritan culture, sex impulses, personal freedom have all been bound up in the character and attitudes of some woman.

But here, we suspect, generalizing must cease; because here the pattern of the modern novel breaks up. It breaks up into the uncounted needs and interests of the men and women who write. The man writer makes an image of the woman he has not found; the woman writer of the woman she would be. And all the writers tell divergent and usually painful stories about marriage. A recent novel describes the love of a girl for a man who has nothing to offer her but physical charm. The girl wants him even though he has no brains; presently and inevitably she grows bored with him, but still he is her husband and the attraction that made her seek him out and win him persists strongly enough to hold her to him. We suspect that all through the book a desire for verity warred with sheer perversity in the author's mind and that his commentary on marriage and women and love is a little shadowed by the pleasure he took in making his girl the opposite of all the heroines he has hated. But the commentary on marriage is there none the less, and a picture of the rather dusty fate that must assail a matching of unequals.

Another novel appearing at almost the same moment insists that marriages must crumble unless a tender inequality be their base. On the part of the woman: childlike trust, maternal care, admiration, gentle stupidity, enough passion. On the part of the man: protective strength, and plenty of time and peace of mind to seek his larger destiny. There is nothing brutal in this egoism, nothing domineering or arrogant. It is simply the expression of a childlike need for reassurance and admiration in a world too large, too hard to impress. If there is not one person to whom a man may feel sure of appearing greater than he is, greater than he knows himself to be, how can he face the emptiness of eternity and the long way that leads toward it? What he wants is a lesser self that can be counted upon to speak up and defend him in the face of his own doubts. And he needs this rather tiresome reassurance more than he needs beauty or humor or color or excitement.

These two books show clearly the pattern and its variations. Both deny the validity of any moral code which binds men and women to an empty contract; both repudiate the assumption of unity where only difference is real. But where one author insists that his woman sink her identity to make that unity a fact, the other laughs at the idea that unity is either possible or desirable.

Well, take your choice. There are all sorts of books to read, every sort of woman to pin your hope to, every sort of relationship to be found. Moral standards are crumbling here and hardening there, and only those minds are to be pitied that find no interest in the flux and surge of impulses and ideas. Women, especially, are not to be pitied, for theirs is the central role in this modern drama. The future of personal relationships seems to be in their hands. In the free air of easy equality and companionship they may discover varieties of pleasure and intimacy that were not known in the world before. If anyone is to be looked upon with compassion it is those men who still reach out hopefully for that little dole of reverence needed to keep their complacency alive. Day by day it grows harder to find—even in books.

Bonar Law

If Lloyd George had been able to hold out a few months longer, Bonar Law would not have been buried in Westminster Abbey, and his obituary notices would have been shorter by 75 per cent. So slight a margin of fortune sometimes determines the grade of fame attained by an individual in public life. To become Prime Minister gives a British politician at once an eminence which can otherwise be reached only by men of unusual powers. And to such endowment Bonar Law, certainly, could not lay claim. He was a man of ability, doubtless, but not of that outstanding ability which gives its possessor an unquestioned title to supremacy. It was as a stop-gap, at a moment when acute party rivalries made it necessary for harmony's sake to elect a compromise candidate, that Bonar Law was chosen to lead the Unionists in the Commons. The accident of the party situation in 1911 put him first in the line of succession to the Premiership when the Lloyd George Government fell last year, and thus set his name on a roll of honor from which the more distinguished names of Harcourt and Chamberlain are missing.

The traditions of the Conservative party in Great Britain are, above everything, aristocratic. It is the party of blue blood. The object of its existence is to preserve as far as possible such relics of the feudal system as have not been submerged by the rising tide of democracy. It is the champion of privilege, and the guardian of the sacred rights of the established church and the established land system. Its natural adherents are the members of the upper classes and those plebeians who aspire to become patricians before they die. But, in his practical endeavors to preserve the old order, the British aristocrat shows a good deal of horse sense. Just as the life of the peerage itself has been prolonged by constant recruitment from the people and by matrimonial alliances which have saved historic but impecunious families from bankruptcy, so the aristocratic party has been shrewd enough to recognize the benefit to be gained by utilizing the political talent of men who, by birth and breeding, were alien from the caste of Vere de Vere. For a generation it suffered an adventurer of Jewish extraction to lead it by the nose, rightly understanding that the intellect of Disraeli would be worth more to it than the slow-moving wits of the typical scion of the stately homes of England. And in later years, by a no less profitable condescension, it has allowed its councils to be dominated from time to time by representatives of vulgar trade in the persons of Chamberlain, Law, and Baldwin.

Another reflection suggested by the career of Bonar Law is that the steady-going matter-of-fact politician of solid rather than showy qualities sometimes gets his chance through the very superfluity of cleverness of his more nimble rivals. The time comes when the country tires of stunts, and turns with relief to a leader whom no one can suspect of the ambition to excel as a contortionist. That sobering of the public mood gave Bonar Law his opportunity when he followed Balfour as leader of the Opposition in 1911 and Lloyd George as Premier in 1922. Dull he might be by comparison, but his deficiency in esprit was more than counterbalanced by his reputation for levelheadedness and sincerity. "Honest to the verge of simplicity" was Lloyd George's summary of him, and many a more brilliant politician might well envy him that epitaph.

Anti-Semitism in European Universities

By MARVIN LOWENTHAL

IN Berlin last winter I read a brief newspaper report of the demand of the students' corps of the University of Jena that the first four rows in all the lecture halls be reserved exclusively for students of "pure German stock." I later set out on a swing through the chief university centers of Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Poland; and I found myself in a great battlefield, which stretches from Germany east to Russia, where each campus is a front-line trench, and where the Jewish students, organized almost to a man, with practically no weapon but their organization, are lustily fighting for what to them is chiefly the privilege to study, but what for the world is the essential principle of academic freedom. Even the freedom to teach is not so fundamental as the right to learn.

I arrived in Vienna the day after a major engagement. The German nationalist students had gone on a two-day strike, and with long canes and thick rubber clubs had persuaded the Jewish students not to attend classes. The purpose of the strike was embodied in three demands: (a) Restriction of university officials to men of "German stock and mother-tongue"; (b) restriction of Jewish students to 10 per cent of student body; (c) restriction of Jewish professors to 10 per cent of the faculty staff. This 10 per cent is the famous numerus clausus; students can talk of little else. The demand for a clausus has spread now to practically every campus in Central and Eastern Europe; it has been taken up by the legislatures of Austria, Poland, Hungary, the Baltic States, and Rumania.

During my stay in Vienna I used to go daily to the headquarters of the Judaea, the Jewish student organization of the University of Vienna, through which all of the smaller Jewish Vereine and corps are welded into one body, and of which 5,500 out of the 6,000 Jewish students are members; and there I watched the reports come in from the wide-spread front: In Jassy a bloody scuffle; in Czernowitz the university senate refuses the demands of the Rumanian nationalist students, there is a strike and bloodshed; in Riga a Jewish student is killed. The Polish students of Lemberg march en masse to the Plac Maryacki and before the statue of the poet Mickiewicz take an oath to drive the Jews from the university. The Jewish students of Kronstadt form battalions for self-protection. In Vilna "the movement against the Jewish students grows." Klausenberg, where there is a medical college, brings forth what was then a novelty but is now a commonplace: the Rumanian students demanded, with the usual rioting, that the Jews be excluded from the college unless the Jewish community furnished corpses for dissection. This is all in one week's news.

Meanwhile I managed to catch a few glimpses of the battle from within. I noticed that workmen were putting up wooden shutters before the windows of the Jewish mensa, or dining-hall, in Vienna; and the students explained that this was no academic precaution—their dining-hall and kitchen had been cleaned out only the year before by a mob of Frontkämpfer, and now they had the waiters and student employees drilled to sweep all dishes, food, and furniture into the deep cellars, within a few minutes' notice. While visiting the Jewish mensa at Prague, I casually asked if any Gentile students ate there. Three, I was told, and they ate free. The explanation carried the battle to Budapest, three hundred miles away. It appears that after the Hungarian authorities put into effect a numerus clausus of 2 per cent, the University of Budapest refused to give the departing Jewish students their university records. Whereupon three liberal-minded Gentile students broke into the record offices one night and carted away all the student records in one swoop and fled with them to Czecho-Slovakia. And these were the three, eating free in the Jewish mensa. The trick of tampering with the records is not confined to Hungary. One morning, during my stay in Vienna, the students told me that German nationalists had the night before gone through the records of the School of Technology and had torn up all the Jewish records.

Up to the present time the Jews have found no weapon but protest. This is a rather empty satisfaction, for there is no one, with both good-will and power, to whom they can protest. The only other defense, if such it may be called, is flight; and again, as in medieval days, student bodies are preparing to trek from one far town to another. I was sitting in one of the leading coffee-houses of Prague, and there entered two Vienna students whom I had last met on an electric train going from Bratislava to Vienna. I was greatly surprised to see them, for they possessed rather less than the nothing which is the usual worldly goods of Jewish students. After they had explained to me the system of this particular coffee-house—whereby when the waiter comes for an order the student tells him "later," and the waiter never returns—they explained their presence in Prague. They were Slovakian born, and hence citizens of the land, and, like the spies of Canaan, were come to interview the Czech minister of education to learn what the attitude of the authorities would be if a large immigration of students set in from Vienna. Happily they were to return to Austria with big grapes—Prague would welcome them. Italy too has come forward with an offer to throw open her university doors to foreign students and to assist their coming by means of reduced railway fares. This sounds like salvation but—and a big but—for the comparatively high cost of living in Czecho-Slovakia and Italy.

In Austria the University of Vienna authorities have, it is true, turned down the numerus clausus as unconstitutional, but they have announced, quite gratuitously, that in matriculating new students extra efforts would be made to keep up the high scholastic standards of the school. That this is an indirect promise to keep out Jewish students (who number about one-third of the entire student body) becomes apparent from the statements of Dr. Diener, president of the university. "The progressive Levanticizing of Vienna must at least be stopped at the doors of the university," says Dr. Diener. "The university surely cannot be expected to welcome as guests . . . an element foreign to us in race and habits, whose culture, education, and morals stand on a much lower plane than that of the German student body, constituting a cancer in our academic life." This attitude might be kept in mind by those who are moved by pleas of the University of Vienna for financial aid (such as that put forth by ex-Premier Nitti in The Nation last winter) on the ground that it is an institution open for all. "The number of foreign Jewish students can easily be reduced by statute," continues Dr. Diener; but the faculty of the School of Technology is not waiting for legal measures and has announced that it will not accept Jews in excess of 10 per cent of the total enrolment, unless this excess is Austrian citizens, which they well know is most unlikely.

Limitation of students is equally unconstitutional in Poland, but the parliament is endeavoring to overcome this obstacle; the National Democrats who have been fostering a bill to this end are now in control of the ministry. Meanwhile the Lemberg medical students' association has shut out Jews and demanded that none be allowed to study without—the usual Jewish corpses. Cracow has demanded one Jewish for every ten Christian corpses and has given a date, together with an ultimatum, when the first corpses are to be delivered. In Warsaw the Jewish student quarters have been wrecked. The Baltic States behave like miniature Polands. The minister of education in Riga explains that the Jewish students "have offended the soul of the Latvian youth," and the educational commission of the Diet of Latvia has adopted a resolution calling for the payment of special fees by Jewish students who are in excess of the proportion of Jews to the general population. Kovno and Dorpat have been the scenes of student strikes against the Jews.

Hungary is unsatisfied with the 2 per cent clause; it is 2 per cent too many. So the students of Budapest have rioted, sent a half-dozen Jewish students to the hospital, and demanded complete exclusion of the rest. Rioting and violence have reached their height, so far, in Rumania, where throughout last spring there were a succession of bloody encounters. In Bucharest the students demand: (1) A numerus clausus of 10 per cent for Jewish students and faculty; (2) a quota of Jewish corpses; (3) no further extension of rights to Jewish citizens in Rumania; (4) no further Jewish immigration into Rumania; (5) the censorship of the "conscienceless" (liberal and radical) press.

II

A mere recital of these outward manifestations against the Jewish students reveals only faintly the nature of the driving forces behind. A Central or Eastern European university, one must first understand, is set atmospherically against the Jew. As a student he works and plays in an academic Ghetto; the walls shutting him out from social and professional intercourse with the general student body are high and rigid. He sits beside the Gentile student in class—except where, as proposed in Jena, he sits behind him—but he does not sit with him. He has the same interests as the other students but he never shares them. The universities of Austria, Poland, etc., generally have a common dining-hall where food may be had comparatively cheap—a great boon these days. The Jewish student is universally excluded from these halls, not by law or rule but by making it too unpleasant for a self-respecting Jew to eat there. Student organizations are of two types—social, which embrace dueling corps and various sorts of Verbände and Brüderschaften much like American fraternities but on a larger scale; and professional, which include medical, legal, philological, historical, literary, and scientific Vereine, which often maintain special libraries, offer their members facilities to buy books cheaply and seek positions for graduates, and afford a forum for discussing technical matters. From both these types of organization the Jew is excluded. Finally there have grown up since the war large student relief organizations (such as the Bratnia Pomoc of Poland) which distribute food and clothing, provide barracks for shelter, and make loans to cover urgent needs; and in this relief work with a few honorable exceptions the Jew may give but not receive. In Poland, it is true, the Jew may become a member, second-class, with no vote.

Five minutes' stroll through the halls of the University of Vienna will tell the whole story. The bulletin boards of the various student organizations hang on the walls, and it is customary to affix the constitution of each society upon its particular board. Here we have the Germania which invites "German-Aryan students" to use its reading room, and assures the university world that it is the "national duty" of every student, meaning Aryan student, to join up. The Deutsche Akademische Gemeinschaft "unites all German-Aryan students who strive for spiritual and moral uplift." Typical is the Akademischer Verein der Germanisten who further German culture. Their old constitution, dating from before the war, reads that "members can be only Germans." The new constitution (1920) amends the matter. Membership is now "open only to those of German-Aryan stock and consciousness." In some of the old constitutions the article on membership is left unchanged, except for the introduction in red ink of the one word, "Aryan."

The same restrictions are expressed, almost comically, in purely professional societies. The Naturwissenschaftlicher Verein "has for its object the study, on the part of German students [German underlined in heavy red crayon], of all branches of natural science." Societies for the study of history, Slavic tongues, and romance languages are open only to "German-Aryans" and, indeed, in order to be privileged to study the romance languages with these Aryans one must in addition "belong to a German Schutzverein." The Akademischer Orchester Verein, in a handsome poster, invites any student "who can play a wind or string instrument and who has Aryan ancestry to enter." In imitation of this Gilbertian nationalism, the Jewish students create their own societies duplicating, in detail, the ground covered by the German organizations. So, in the law department, one can see on the right of the main door a bulletin board, labeled in black, "Deutsch-akad. Juristen Verein," and on the left another board labeled in blue "Jüdisch-akad. Juristen Verein." The only society I noticed open to all students, without qualifications, was the society to combat syphilis.

Behind the student and his attitude against the Jew is the professor. Formerly a member of a highly respected and comfortably situated class, accustomed to adequate pay from the state and honor from society, he is, today, for the most part a wistful aspirant for the return of the old order and an implacable hater of the new. In the states formed or enlarged since the Treaty of Versailles the professor is generally a supporter and so far as he is able provider of that exaggerated patriotism and nationalism which these states require in order to keep the populations at a fighting-point against the large alien minorities within and potential enemies without.

And behind both the student and professor are the nationalist political movements of Central and Eastern Europe. Their case can be put in a few words. The people of Central and Eastern Europe are hungry. And more cruel than the absence of a real meal, they are without economic security or hope. Something must, in their desperation, be done. And the only two things to be done are to go communist or monarchist, forward or backward; anything else is merely another form of standing still and hungering. The rallying-point for those who wish to go backward, and they are perhaps in the majority, is nationalism. Whether the nationalists are aiming for a literal monarchy, as is likely in Germany, or merely for a "strong" government, as is probable in Poland or Austria, they must, to effect their purposes, demand huge sacrifices from the people, and the only way they can conceive of securing them is through an appeal to national love. And the love of one's own nation is inextricably bound up with the hate of other nations, especially if those other nations be within the gates. So the easiest way of making an Austrian, Pole, or Rumanian feel more like an Austrian, etc., is to induce him to hate the alien, i. e., the Jew. We had a similar psychology operating in America during the war when we heated up our Americanism by hating the Germans. And it was for the same ideals, to induce people to make sacrifices, to save the country, to preserve civilization. Warfare is too expensive for the Hungarian, Pole, Rumanian, or German today, so the cheapest and most available "enemy" becomes the Jew. Political parties come forward with programs for disfranchising the Jews, merchant classes proclaim economic boycotts, and, correspondingly, universities are putting up the numerus clausus.

The drive against the Jew in the university is not merely a part of this general effort at boycott; it is, in a certain sense, that boycott concentrated in a single blow. For if the Jew can be kept out of college, he can ipso facto be kept out of the professional classes, and he can also be excluded from the administration of the government, for it is carried on almost exclusively by university-trained men.

The intimate relation between anti-Semitic student riots and these general and serious political considerations is no more clearly revealed than in the relation between the student corps and the nationalist parties. They are both recruited from the same classes. When the Vienna students kept the Jews from the university grounds for two days, many of the university supporters armed with rubber clubs, were middle-aged men, and the general cry was not "Down with the Jewish students" but "Down with Jewish politics." It was a high-school student who planned and largely university students who executed the murder of Rathenau.

Central and Eastern Europe is saying "The Jew must go." He won't, of course, and he can't. And the struggle will lead no one knows where. One thing seems certain: in those lands where toleration and freedom could be waters of healing, the universities are poisoning the wells.

The New Russian Women

By MAGDELEINE MARX

II. The Intellectual

SERVANT and mother of the "cause" at once, an angel in rags, unswerving in will, unfathomable of heart, austere, searching, assimilating, a true demon for work, the Russian intellectual does not present merely the tragic aspect with which the refugees abroad have acquainted us: one discerns in her a new woman, a human type utterly unfamiliar to us, the type which the revolution has created.

I have known many of them, young and old. I have lived among them. If it is true that the revolution has left its indelible stamp on all of them, if the horizon of their country has endowed them all with a sense of the infinite, if the yoke of centuries has trained them to selflessness, it is not that which impresses one most. What impresses one is the difference existing between the two generations of women now at work. I believe that nowhere in the world is this difference so marked.

Let us begin with the older women, those who were approaching the forties when the revolution broke out, whose education was completed, whose personality was stamped, and who had behind them twenty years of struggle against the law, of imprisonment, and of hope. Ranking first among these is the woman who devoted herself to politics.

The ideal type, and also in certain respects an exceptional and fascinating one, is Alexandra Kollontai. Daughter of the aristocracy, the wife of a general, she struggled throughout her youth for the liberation of the Russian masses. After participating actively in the events of the revolution, she was for two years People's Commissar for Public Health. A brilliant writer, an agitator of the first rank, a stinging satirist, speaking English, German, Spanish, the Scandinavian and several Oriental languages perfectly, she is perhaps one of the most richly endowed individuals in Russia in point of eloquence.

On the eve of her departure for Christiania, where she now occupies the post of Ambassador of the Soviet Government, I spent a whole evening with her in the small room that was allotted to her on her return from Odessa. It is not so much regarding politics that I wish to question her. I am familiar with her written works, her activities. I am eager to know what she thinks, as a woman and a leader, of the relations that may develop between men and women in a community evolved along communist lines.

It appears to be a question which she has studied profoundly. In her view, family and marriage constitute an historical phenomenon uniquely the result of a transient era of production and are therefore ephemeral. She goes into greater detail. The family, formed in its early stages for the purpose of production, subsists in modern capitalist society for the purpose of consumption. Individual consumption being supplanted by community consumption in public kitchens, and the manufacture of clothing, the maintenance of homes, laundry work, and even mending wearing apparel having become a part of community economics, the economic unity achieved by the family has no longer any reason for existence in a republic of workers. Deprived of its economic aims the family is destined to dissolve and to assume the form of a union between man and woman based on a reciprocal agreement.

I ask Alexandra Kollontai what, in her opinion, will be the dominant factors inspiring the new laws regulating marital relations.

"These two factors," she replies: "first, public health; second, the increase or diminution of the population."

"Besides," she said, "as communist society accords to men and women the same rights and the same obligations, the double standard now prevailing will disappear. The sexual act being the fulfilment of a natural instinct, it will no longer be considered as a sin. On the contrary, communist morality, setting the highest store by the cultivation of the many spiritual activities of youth, will help each individual to conform perfectly to the needs of the community. Instead of wasting their sensibilities in the emotions of sex, the women of the future will dedicate them to service of the community."

The hours pass and I listen. She has amazing gray eyes, with soft shadows. She has a sensitive, mobile mouth, made for smiling. When she laughs, her head thrown back, it is like a cascade of gaiety. The play of her gestures is so alive, so young and winged.

Let us enter the office of Kroupskaia, the wife of Lenin. Orator, author, revolutionary from her earliest days, she directs at Moscow the Political Department for Public Instruction. On the first floor of a building occupying a corner of the Sretinski Boulevard, buried in a hive echoing with the rattle of typewriters and the tinkling of telephone bells, we find the room in which Kroupskaia works.

On the walls, a map of Russia, a portrait of Karl Marx, another of Trotzky, a few of the educational charts. Two tables overloaded with documents, a telephone, three or four chairs, and a total impression of bareness, of extreme simplicity.

A woman with white hair is seated before a desk. She rises to receive the visitor. Her back is slightly bent. She wears a black wool coat with frayed edges, almost transparent at the elbows, hanging at the shoulders; a cheap black skirt, shoes that gape frightfully, a waist of white cotton which, from too much washing, is turning rust-color at the neck, green over the bosom. That is the wife of the tyrant, the woman who has been reported as decked magnificently in precious gems and jewels.

Bending forward far over her desk, for her ailing eyes can scarcely see, she apologizes for her poor French. And yet she speaks the language faultlessly, with here and there just a momentary hesitation, as she tells me of the vast effort in every part of Russia to wipe out illiteracy.

An overwhelming kindness glows in her countenance, a kindness such I have never before seen in any face. And this kindness invades me as she explains to me the basic ideas of a report which she has just completed on the educational program of the schools. Kindness, and with it a steadfast desire to remain anonymous! Everything about her seems to say: "I am nothing. Over and above me, over and above all of us, whether we will it or not, there is the inescapable fatality which is mastered only by those who, by their unconquerable will, confront it."

Poorly dressed, inadequately nourished, confined to a single room in the Kremlin, where the only luxuries are a few flower-pots on the window-sill, the lot of Kroupskaia, her hope, her reason for living, is work.

Let us view more closely the women who more accurately represent the average woman among the intellectuals of the same generation. All, or nearly all, have been revolutionaries from their fifteenth year. The youth of nearly all of them has been passed in the prisons of the Czar. And they nearly all belong today to the Bolshevist Party.

Which of them shall I describe? Shall it be the doctor's wife, who has an active role at once in the Communist International, in the Section of Women of the Party, and in the Section of Women of the Orient; who speaks almost every day at some meeting; who with two or three other women edits a newspaper for peasant women, inspects foundling asylums, visits factories, receives foreign delegations, and reveals, under her graying hair, soft maternal eyes and a wearied countenance martyred with fatigue?

Or shall it be Pokrowska, sweet of face, choice of spirit, companion of the historian Michel Pokrowsky, who is an official in the People's Court of Moscow? Or shall it be Dr. Lebedeva, who directs the Maternity and Children's Bureau in Moscow and brings to her duties her tireless energy and her extraordinary far-sightedness?

They all have the same long day, the same superhuman task, the same small room, the same telephone at their bedside which rings at all hours of the night: "Get up. At such and such an hour you must be at such and such a place. Your sleep, your rest, your person, nothing belongs to you."

And what role does love play in the lives of these women? I know that each of them has a profound tenderness for her companion in the struggle. Many of them are married. But for each of them, the breath of their life, the passion of their heart, is their work for the cause. In this work they have spent their youth, worn out their hearts, and in this work they will die. Not that they condemn, hate, or judge love: they are merely like so many immune women in the midst of general contagion.

Their recreations? There are no recreations for these martyrs. They do not know the meaning of the word rest. When they arrive at the point of exhaustion and their bodies can no longer bear the strain, they protestingly permit themselves to be sent off to a little villa in Moscow or in Petrograd, whence they return to their tasks two or three weeks later with a bulky tract or monograph completed, hardly more rested than when they left.

I said a little while ago that the intellectuals of their generation are nearly all militant Communists. However, there is a certain number which is either neutral or hostile.

Preeminent among the neutrals are the majority of women teachers. Without failing to maintain perfect loyalty to the Soviet Government and frankly declaring that in all matters touching education the bolshevist program is incomparably superior to the former method of instruction, they preserve in their hearts an aversion for the new regime.

In the first place, the revolution brought a great change in their material lives. There has been much suffering in Russia during the past few years. There has been hunger. Without the advantage of the social mysticism which sustained those whose lives I have described, preoccupied solely with their personal fate, it is easy to understand why they have preserved a hatred for the upheaval which deprived them of their former tranquillity.

And now for the young. "You will see what an interesting generation is in process of formation among the women," I was told upon my arrival in Russia. "But you will find them somewhat arid, pursuing the dictates only of cold reason."

But where is the coldness, the aridity, of those younger girls? There is Lena, for instance, whom I should like to describe because she appears to me to be the prototype of all the others.

She was twenty years old last summer. Born in Siberia, of parents deported because of their political persuasions, she grew up on the shores of Lake Baikal and her childhood was passed in the region of Irkutsk and Tomsk.

Her blond silk hair is pretty only in the sunlight, when her fruit-like cheeks and limpid blue eyes come into notice. She cannot be described as beautiful or charming or ugly. In looking at her one does not think of beauty; one thinks of something else, something inexpressible. Despite her pathetic garb, her man's sweater, her velvet beret worn to a rag, her cloddish shoes, her threadbare skirt, she remains angelic in appearance.

From Siberia she came to Kiev, where she began her studies. At the time of the Denikin offensive, she left for the front, leading the life of the Red soldiers. During the famine that raged at Rostov, she ate rat meat, grass, even straw, and found the energy to minister to ailing babies. She is now completing her studies at the University of Moscow, and, while learning English, French, and German, pursuing sociological research, taking active part in political life, following every congress and attending all the lectures, joining every demonstration, she is specializing in the history of art.

What is her environment? A small room on the extreme outskirts of the city, an iron cot, a table, a chair, a tea kettle, walls covered with portraits and posters—a room often providing shelter for five and sometimes even seven when necessary. Throngs of young people hungry for education arrive constantly at Moscow. What matters it if the universities are already overcrowded, rooms impossible to find, the cost of food forbidding? They know (and I believe this condition exists only in Russia) that somewhere in the vast city they will find a compassionate spirit who will share his crust of bread and his crowded room.

Lena is always making room for some comrade in her pinched quarters, generally for some young girl, but if it happens to be a young man that seems to have little importance. And despite the poverty, the hunger for study, the consuming faith in the future, the little groups find time for innocent, sparkling gaiety. Tea is drunk out of the household's one glass, Lena's trifling ration is shared with her less fortunate comrades, the faucet in the hallway is the common bath-tub, and all wearing apparel is common property, stockings, dresses, shirts, shoes, the first to rise in the morning donning whatever garments he first lays hands on and the others take what is left. They adore the theater and they go by turns. They love music and there is always some girl who can dance and perform for the others. And they laugh so easily. Sometimes, in the warm days, they leave on foot for an afternoon in the country, and they sing in chorus the whole length of the tramp. And, if they have the good luck to find a lake or a pond along the route, they all tumble in, nude, pell-mell.

The joys of intimacy, private pleasures? For these creatures pleasure can only be a communal matter. In truth, the collective instinct has permeated the blood of this generation. It is evident not only in the desire to share but even in the manifestation of joy. The mere labor of loading and transporting whole pine trees, of draping wood with chintz, of preparing for a parade, of rehearsing with a chorus, gives them the sparkling eyes and flaming cheeks ascribed to heroines in the first flush of love by the old-fashioned writers. I say "old-fashioned," for the drama of the individual seems to have ceased, to have receded into history, giving way to the mass drama which alone grips and inspires the spirits of the young girls.

Is Lena a Communist? If being a Communist merely means having made a choice between one belief and another, it cannot be said that she is one, for that is saying nothing. Daughter of the era of the machine, true sister of the proletariat, she is a Communist as involuntarily as she breathes. Communism is to her neither a theory nor an ideal. It is the warmth of her youth, it is the air in which she bathes.

And therein, precisely, lies the difference between the two generations. When one knows the women of the older generation, one senses that they are revolutionaries by virtue of all that is "superior" within us. At once above and outside of ordinary mortals, they are appalling in their fine qualities. The heart is pinched and the spirit humiliated by the spectacle of their laborious days. There is a vague feeling of revolt before their sacrifices and mutilation. The Lenas are the living product, altogether natural, of this revolutionary soil. They are the vigorous plants which grow in the free atmosphere and could not grow elsewhere. They represent the moment in development when, in order to adapt itself better, the species differentiates. In this instance, certain spiritual elements have become atrophied in order to permit others to develop and reach higher altitudes. Lena writes strange poems and she excels in the sciences. Her temples pulse with love, but never does a cry of enthusiasm spring from her lips. No impulse that cannot be converted into action ever emerges. All her actions comprise the total gift of herself, and yet she never reveals the least external élan.

Her companions are only reflected images of her.

Lola, a daughter of the nobility and twenty-two years old, carelessly dressed, hair bobbed, always barefoot, with her urchin's laugh, she too is amazingly talented. She can dance and drive an automobile, she writes and composes music, she does stage decoration, she has studied scenic effects with Meyerhold, acting with Stanislawski. She has worked in factories, can translate five tongues, with great ability manages one of the government executive offices, and, if brought face to face with death, she would reveal her genius even then, skipping toward death as she would to a ball.

The common sense of Lena, her self-mastery, is found once more in Niourina, who for eighteen months was political director with the military forces, lived the life of a soldier, and even today still wears a military cap and a khaki coat with purple bars while fulfilling her duties in the Women's Section of the Party and in the army teaching staff. I have been present at the lectures on contemporary history which she gives regularly at an officers' school. What Frenchwoman, however little sex consciousness she may possess, however feeble her instinct to please, would not have felt at least slightly embarrassed with sixty pairs of male eyes fixed upon her? Cool, logical, scrupulously precise, entirely unconscious of her person, she was the victim only of her anxiety to make her audience understand and to transmit her knowledge.

The New Architecture

Temples of Mammon Supersede Those of Ammon

By HENRY S. CHURCHILL

THE New Architecture is with us, inexorably forced upon us, whether we will or not, by economic law. The relentless drive of economic necessity, the governing law of modern, even if not, as some maintain, of all life has created and is creating the architecture of today in actual structural fact. Aesthetically, where that law has been accepted and expressed, we have a living art; where it has been denied and disguised, we have a dying art.

Architecture has always been a reflection of the age that produced it. The hope of Egypt, the clarity of Greece, the pomp of Rome, the faith of the Middle Ages, the license of the eighteenth century, the acquisitiveness of the twentieth are faithfully mirrored in the temples of the times, whether these temples be of Ammon or of Mammon. Nor is there any doubt that as the material side of life has developed more swiftly in the last hundred years than in all the preceding historic centuries, so the structural side of architecture, which corresponds to the material side of life, has undergone greater changes in the last generation than in any preceding period of its history.

A hundred years ago New York was a charming, if muddy, city of red-brick houses with white doorways and cast-iron balconies, spired churches, and low warehouses and wharves, situated on a rocky island. Farm-houses dotted the open spaces between the villages of Yorktown and Harlem, Manhattanville and Bloomingdale. The fateful shadow of the gridiron had not yet fallen across it. As population, wealth, and ostentation increased, there came brown-stone fronts in endless rows, and more and more massive office buildings. In 1880 the first elevated railroad trailed its blighting way out to Harlem, elongating the city, choking its cross-town expansion, relegating the river fronts, the city's natural outlets to air and beauty, to commerce and squalor. Land in the Battery section became immensely valuable. Investors and owners, endeavoring to squeeze every drop of increment from their land, found that by building higher they could get greater returns. The height limit, however, would have remained that of convenient walking had it not been for the invention of the elevator. With its advent vertical transportation became a reality and the skyscraper a possibility.[*]

But limitations to the first high elevator buildings were soon discovered. It was found that the increase in thickness of the bearing walls necessary to carry great height ate up rentable floor space too rapidly to make a very great number of stories profitable, and besides cut off too much light. To take the place of these clumsy walls, cast-iron columns came into use, and various systems of long-span fire-proof floor construction. These were gradually developed to relieve the walls of practically all weight but their own. As the steel industry developed, steel columns came into use on account of their greater strength. The steel shapes were slowly standardized for lightness, convenience of design, and most of all swiftness of erection. It was found that by riveting an angle to the wall-beams it was possible to erect masonry from floor to floor independently of a masonry base, or to start it on many floors at once. The self-supporting wall thus went out of existence, as the floor-bearing wall had gone before, and the true skeleton frame came into being. Walls became simple fillers between floors, without any structural value whatever. This permitted reducing them to the least thickness compatible with their staying in place and keeping the weather out, and not only saved space, but weight and, consequently, steel.

Just as steel frames and curtain walls came into being through economic reasons, so brick has largely replaced stone as the material for those walls. Stone walls on a skyscraper are an anomaly. They do not carry themselves; they must be backed by some material to be weather-proof; they must be deviously anchored. In our industrial cities they deteriorate in the gas-laden atmosphere. The use of stone is an aesthetic tradition; the monumental material of the past, its use was appropriate in wall-bearing construction for monumental and sumptuous edifices. Today it persists as an example of the theory of conspicuous waste.

That stone has so largely gone out of use in recent years except for trimmings is due, however, not to a realization of its essential unfitness for its purpose, but to prohibitive cost occasioned by a combination of circumstances chiefly arising from the war and trade-union regulations. Under the pressure of these conditions, and not from any aesthetic choice, it was discovered that brick could be beautifully laid in patterns as a colorful and decorative surface instead of as an imitation masonry wall. And the logical successor to brick—especially if the brick manufacturers succeed in combining themselves out of business—is terra-cotta.

Another change, the most recent and obvious, in the architecture of New York, has been brought about by the zoning and set-back laws. Economic dictates, of course, were behind the enactment of these laws. When the greed of property owners and speculators in exploiting the space above their lots threatened not only to become a menace to public health but to reduce rentals by cutting off light and air, it was found desirable to limit an owner's rights to do what he pleased with his own. The Rights of Private Property were invaded ostensibly for the protection of the public—and one of the most beautiful and characteristic effects of New York architecture has been the result.

With the practical modern office-building essentially a steel frame requiring, logically, an entirely new exterior expression, a fair question is: Why are our streets lined with specters of the outworn past? In a measure it is because aesthetic development must always lag behind structural changes which demand such rapid visual readjustments as are involved in the change from wall-bearing to skeleton steel construction.

A generation is a short time for the eye to get accustomed to new dynamic relationships. One of the most important of these relationships is the immensely greater strength of steel as compared to the materials formerly in use. The experience of ages had taught that so much masonry was needed to support so much weight; that a stone could reasonably span such a distance, a wood beam such another distance; that too slender a support would buckle and break, too long a lintel sag and crack. Steel and reinforced concrete have changed all those long-accustomed balances. The eye must come to new realizations of what is safe, and therefore what is comfortable, and therefore what can give pleasure.

[*] The first real skyscraper was erected in Chicago, but under analogous conditions. There high property values were artificially created by the elevated "loop," which still effectively strangles the city.

Other changes are the elimination of shadow brought about by shallow reveals in the thin curtain-walls, and the consequent emphasis of surface as opposed to mass; and the tremendously increased importance of the silhouette under the application of the set-back laws.

These adjustments are gradually taking place. The trend of the new design may be briefly and cursorily traced by considering the Park Avenue Hotel, the World Building, the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, any loft building in the Fifth Avenue twenties, the Plaza Hotel, the Woolworth Building, Pierre's and Sherry's, the Fisk Building, and the new Shelton Hotel on Lexington Avenue.

It should be noted that while economic pressure tends on the one hand to make buildings structurally modern, on the other it tends to hold back aesthetic progress through fear that "novelty" in appearance may hinder rentability. It is for this reason, as well as for aesthetic ones, that so many of our commercial structures are clothed in ill-fitting garments.

Although there is slow but evident progress visible in our commercial work it is nowhere visible in our public edifices, where the question of expense is not so fundamental, the desire for conspicuous waste often a ruling motive, and the dead hand of academic tradition falls most heavily. With the exception of the design for the Nebraska State Capitol, none of our recent public buildings show the slightest attempt to develop an architectural expression in accord with either the structural system or their surrounding civilization. Their steel frames are swathed in mummy-cloths. The absurdity of steel-framed masonry domes! The sterility of rows of useless columns! Endless modillions and garlands taking the place of imagination and suitable invention! How can they be other than ostentatious, dreary, and monotonous?

Almost as little evidence of change is to be found in our domestic architecture. Characteristically enough, the more expensive the work, the more time expended upon it, the less the progress. The reason here is not only the comparative lack of economic pressure; there is a simple psychologic factor involved. A man's house is what he lives with, and to most men the most usual is the most livable. Anything "different" in the way of a home would make him feel as ill at ease as a purple shirt with lace ruffles. Then, too, the rich man sees a villa or a palace abroad, and because it costs more to build, and looks it, he must have it reproduced here—the Palazzo Massimi on Fifth Avenue, a Tudor mansion on Long Island, a Brittany farm-house in Westchester. Of course structural methods in the domestic field have not changed so radically as they have in larger building; it is not, perhaps, so heinous an offense to build a modern brick house in imitation of an old one. However that may be, our most living—if not livable!—domestic work is to be found in the model-housing industrial villages, where rigorous elimination of waste and the need for quantity production have prevented the aping of a long-dead craftsmanship, and simple, good effects have had to be obtained by the use of machine-materials, "untouched by human hand." In the same way, the noticeable increase in restraint and "good taste" in the speculatively built apartments in New York, which has received favorable comment in many quarters, has not been at all due to an increase in good taste, but to the prohibitive cost of gimcrackery.

Economic forces will thus in time bring about a new architecture aesthetically, as they have already done structurally, replacing mass and shadow by surface and silhouette. Proportion, the basic factor of good design, will always remain the chief factor. However, good proportion and its concomitant, good "scale," are not absolute, as the academicians like to think, but depend on inter-related relationships—the size and shape of the building, the relation of its many parts to the human figure and human needs, the materials used, and the system of construction. Good classic, gothic, and steel proportions are very different things, although many architects seem to think they are interchangeable. A rhinoceros skin does not fit a giraffe, nor even a cow, though all are mammals.

When modern structural methods are followed out to their logical conclusion, the results are progressive and interesting architecture. When eclectic aestheticism is followed, when "art" is the inspiration, the result is only pretense and puerile copying. Only from a building which answers inevitably to our modern needs do we get a modern emotion, a feeling of hardness, steel, vibration, discordant beauty, an emotion satisfying to our modern spirit. It is not beauty as the Greeks understood beauty, nor emotion as the builders of Chartres understood emotion, but it is life as it is understood today.

We need fewer artists and more architects; less art and more architecture. When we finally get that, we shall not need to look either humbly or reverently toward Athens, Rome, or Paris.

A Birth

By JAMES RORTY

After the rain, the morning breathed a soft
Annunciation. When I glanced aloft
I saw the sky dreamed blue, while on the sea
The foam caps shook in bright impersonal glee.

A gallant day, I thought. I said as much
To Gertie, munching mustard tops and such Beside the fence. For Gertie, too, has heard,
I thought, the mild omnipotent Word
That moves in majesty above the fields,
Where everything that grows attends and yields
The praise of life rejoicing ere it pass:
The psalming insects, the obeisant grass.

If Gertie heard, I saw no sign. She stared Across a field of ripened oats, where fared
That fecund Wind whose casual will again
Compelled the genuflections of the grain,
Then sought the sea, and combed the horizon's verge
That frothed beneath its vast, indifferent urge.

An hour later when I passed again,
She stared unmoved, in her clear eyes no stain
Of fear or worship. By her shrunken side
A something stirred: her calf, new-born, that tried
Fumbling and tottering to suck, and feebly mooed,
Scenting, no doubt, the storm the Wind had brewed.

Paradoxology

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

NOW God be praised who has made the politics of our dear country so far from fixed, so far from dull! Observe, for instance, the Grand Old Party! It is supposed to be tethered by its left hind leg and a stout chain to a hydrant of fast-flowing campaign contributions in Wall Street. Bucket-carriers of that life-giving stream thereupon come down to Washington and demand that the Republican elephant shall cross a bridge which they have designed from America to Europe.

The elephant, thus adjured by his alleged keepers to proceed across the Atlantic, turns his face toward the Pacific and busies himself with the affairs of the Far East. Additional emissaries thereupon arrive in Washington from the fastnesses of finance. They denounce the anti-League and anti-international publicity of the Republican National Committee. They threaten violent disturbances within the committee. They attempt to produce changes in policy and in personnel which would divert the committee from its anti-international tendencies and activities and bring it into harmony with the pro-international views dominantly held among the gentlemen who provide the elephant's fodder.

The fodder-furnishers indicate that in their opinion he who feeds the elephant should call his pace. The elephant rejoins that the feeding has been far from good lately. Attention is called to the prolonged existence of deficits in the food supply. Attention is further called to the paucity of food in the great endeavors of last fall when the Democratic donkey outran the elephant in so many localities. It is moreover pointed out that even if food in full quantities were forthcoming, the elephant would still be more interested in avoiding getting stoned to death by the populace than in acquiring banquets from the elite.

Convinced that the populace is opposed to traveling to Europe, the elephant rejects the admonitions of his mahouts from Manhattan. He flaps his ears also at the League World Court aspirations of his President from Ohio. He warns his succeeding President from Massachusetts that League World Court aspirations in him will have a suicidal sound. He brings it about that the broad bridge planned toward Europe by the American Bankers' Association and the United States Chamber of Commerce is narrowed to a single plank along which individual Americans may proceed, if they will, toward being appointed by the Reparation Commission at Paris to serve on a committee to make a study of Germany's financial situation and to report that study, in the wake of a score of previous similar studies, to the members of the Reparation Commission who thereupon, if they wish to do so, may communicate with the Allied governments which thereupon, if they so choose, may act to reduce the reparation indebtedness of Germany in case they find themselves unanimous in desiring reduction.

To such modesty of deportment has the elephant reduced his alleged owners that in this one narrow plank toward a non-committal arithmetical participation in the calculating of Germany's capacity to pay they see and applaud a conversion of the elephant to their views. They are deceived. The gentlemen who constitute the inward workings of the elephant may consent to an occasional trumpeting of the blessed words "helpfulness to Europe" but they most of them have no intention whatsoever of causing the legs of the elephant to stir from their rooted stand on American soil.

The elephant may be living off the elite, and he may be the favorite political animal of the overwhelming majority of the graduates of our best universities and of the members of our best clubs, but he hears that the lowly are anti-international and he loves the lowly and its life.

He also, if a sound distinction be drawn between him himself and his campaign contributors, is just simply personally indisposed toward what his professional groomers and scrubbers and trainers call "internationalism." The owners of the animal may be in favor of American participation in Europe. The professional politicians who operate the animal are for the most part opposed to it, and the fact develops thereupon that it is they that are the real owners.

One of them, a Senator, a Tory, a believer in the rights of capital and a doubter of the claims of labor, a firm enemy of virtually all "progressive" legislation, has made two historic remarks on this point. The first was to a group of delegates from interests which in American political language are commonly honored by being called "the interests." They desired him in peremptory terms to go along with them in voting the United States into organized international endeavors. He replied:

"I happen to think it treason and if you are going to talk about it you must talk about it to other people. My limit in crime is the tariff."

A year or so later, having continued in the interim to resist all radicalism, he remarked one day to this writer: "Well, I hope the lower and baser and more radical elements are going to be strong enough long enough to help me lick the League."

Meanwhile the Democratic donkey, who naturally brays at the Social Register, finds himself becoming a society animal. His chief official trainer, Mr. Cordell Hull, causes him to lift up his voice and utter great noises against "the interests." He also causes him to utter great noises against the Republican foreign policy of "isolation."

Together the House of Morgan and the donkey pine for European travels. Together the elephant and the new farmer-labor Senators stamp upon the proposal. In the headquarters of the party of "the interests" the most loathed, the most feared, the most denounced element of our life is "the international banker." In the headquarters of the party of "the masses" the conscience of the party managers holds them true to a foreign policy which "the masses" have rejected.

Politics thus ceases to be as easy as political science; and calculations of the behavior of the elephant and of the donkey from an analysis of their diet become hazardous. Eating peanuts from the hands of saloon passengers, the elephant resolutely steers the ship away from where the saloon passengers want to go. Living on thistles in the steerage, the donkey demands a turn at the wheel in order to go to the port where he and our very best people long to be.

For "the interests" and their international hopes the donkey is a gratuitous volunteer and the elephant is a shameless ingrate absent without leave.

So God be praised who has made it impossible to explain the drama of politics purely by the box-office.

In the Driftway

THERE is something almost incredibly brilliant in the red of our autumn foliage. There is nothing to equal it anywhere in the world. We talk of "tropical" richness of color; the tropics have nothing to match an American hillside in October. Europe's beech trees flaunt a radiant orange that our beeches do not know, but neither Europe nor the Equator can rival the living red of our maples, our sumachs, our sour gum, sassafras, and dogwood, or even of our woodbine, blueberry, and—despise it if you must—poison ivy, that trail fire across our autumn clearings. Even our oaks, dull beside the flaming maples, have a glow beyond their European peers. What is it in our atmosphere that burns such thrilling colors into the hillsides and swamps?

* * * * *

NEW YORK'S soot seems to clog the pores of color. Sumach will not thrive in a New York backyard, and none of the trees that best endure soft-coal smoke turn red. Horse chestnut affects a rather dull yellow and quickly fades to brown; the ailanthus, catalpa, sycamore, and poplars are all sober autumn trees; the gingko—that curious Chinese immigrant which looks like a tree fern left from the coal age, yet thrives in our ultra-modern cities—has as brilliant a coat as any, but without a hint of red.

* * * * *

THE birds, however, make no protest. The Drifter never ceases to be amazed at the bird life of downtown New York. Somehow the migrating birds discover every tiny oasis of green amid those appalling stone canyons. The most retiring forest birds seem in migration-time to have a fondness for the busiest squares. A pair of hermit thrushes lingered in City Hall Park for a week this autumn, silent among the noisy English sparrows. Kinglets lisped in the struggling oaks, brown creepers crawled up the tree trunks, juncoes hopped about the feeble grass, catbirds, white-throated sparrows, a Maryland yellow-throat, and a flicker slipped from shrub to shrub within a few yards of hundreds of thousands of bustling city-dwellers. Did anyone notice them but THE DRIFTER?

Hero or Murderer?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: General Haller, Poland's notorious anti-Semite, has been accorded a royal welcome to these shores by President Coolidge, the American Legion, and various public officials. Directly responsible for the torture and murder of innocent Jews, he is acclaimed a hero by men prominent in American affairs. Are we to continue to kowtow to a man whose hands are stained with the blood of a people who dared remain true to the faith of their fathers? We speak of the crucifixion of Christ, but what of the Jews who were buried alive in Poland by soldiers commanded by General Haller? A traitor to civilization, he should be treated as such by the American people. Let us brand him as he deserves.

What Lloyd George Missed

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Middle West is where American dinners are served. Mr. Lloyd George should have had:

Cream of celery soup;
Channel-catfish steaks, cucumber sauce, and balls of browned mashed potato;
Roast turkey, cranberry sauce;
Succotash of lima beans and corn boiled and dried in the sun, candied sweet potatoes;
Hot biscuits;
Salad of tomatoes stuffed with shredded lettuce and picked walnuts;
Pumpkin pie, apple pie;
Coffee.

St. Joseph, Missouri, United States of America, October 30

[A symposium on the Great American Dinner will appear in a later number of The Nation. Contributions will be made by various writers of the series on These United States—among them H. L. Mencken, Maryland; Clement Wood, Alabama; E. E. Miller, Tennessee; Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant, and others.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Extinct Orphan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Are there any bona fide orphans extant? My wife and I desire to adopt an orphan of decent parentage (age 3-7) or two, if they are of the same family. We visited a home in this county where there are 110 children, only two of whom are orphans. The rest are semi- or "divorced" orphans. The majority are Italians whose parents regard the orphanage as a kind of college—probably it is. It is amazing what an enormous number of children ought to be orphans. I shall be grateful for information.

A Sailor's Offer

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your letter of September 12 received, and in reply will say that I will be unable to get any readers for The Nation on board the ship because my shipmates are not interested in anything that happens in the world so long as it happens outside of their own little world, which is limited to the deck of a steamboat. When I finish reading The Nation I leave it on the table in our quarters, and seldom do I see anyone as much as look at it, much less read it. They would, and do, spend from five to ten cents to buy the daily paper, for that is what the daily press costs on board ship when we can get it. I do not blame them for that, for I used to do the same thing. I still buy the daily paper when I can, not because I am interested in what it says, for it is mostly bunk, but from force of habit. Coming back to The Nation, I have thought out a plan that would be better from my position than getting readers. I suggest that I make a small donation of, say, $10 or $15. Probably the editor knows some workingman that he could send The Nation to, and he in turn would be in a better position to get new readers than I am. I do not know whether or not this plan would be accepted by The Nation. It is, however, the best I can do.

I do not agree with the editor when he says that America can cure the sickness across the pond. To my mind the same forces that control things there control also in America. Those forces on the other side have decayed and will soon go into history. It will only be a matter of time when this same decay will take place in America. There are plenty of straws that point the way the wind is blowing.

A Challenge to The Nation

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The most educated and intelligent political minds simply do not see the operations of a mind like Ford's. Of course I can't speak for Henry, but I just can't imagine his becoming, as your editorial, A Challenge to Henry Ford, suggests, a "dollar a year man" in the political government for the purpose of demonstrating anything. He is a great little demonstrator; but the only thing he demonstrates, so far as I can see, is that the Ford way of doing things is much simpler and much more to the point than the usual business way, and certainly much more so than the way the government undertakes to do things, limited as it is by a mass of politically devised restrictions and regulations.

Mr. Ford, so far as I know, has not the slightest quarrel with the principle of private profit. He believes that there is more profit in giving maximum service than in not doing so. If an enterprise isn't yielding a profit, he would suspect that there was something functionally wrong with it and that it is not giving the public service which it should. Challenging him, therefore, to run Muscle Shoals as some group that doesn't understand industry tells him to run it, and then to "prove his good faith" by accepting low wages for the job, when he doesn't believe in low wages either, would seem to him to have no particular point.

The Nation has already pointed out how "ignorant" Mr. Ford is. That being the case, The Nation should see that he is too ignorant to understand such a challenge; and The Nation, it seems to me, should prove its good faith by at least making its challenges intelligible to the persons challenged, especially when it knows those persons to be "ignorant."

Excuse me. I like The Nation. But I can't help riding it for its political-mindedness at a time when industrial thinking is so necessary.

New York, October 25 Charles W. Wood

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1923 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Saturday, December 1, and not later than Monday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."
2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.
3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.
4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.
5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.
6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear Feb'y 13, 1924.
7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

The Exploitation of Turkey

Turkey, The Great Powers, and the Bagdad Railway. A Study in Imperialism. By Edward Mead Earle. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

FIFTY years hence it may be that the historian will regard the Great War primarily as an acceleration of the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. Certainly, the division of Turkey into spheres of influence since 1918 is only completing frankly what was already well begun indirectly before 1914. In March, 1914, Sir Mark Sykes said in the House of Commons apropos of the Franco-German convention of 1913: "In practice, loans, kilometric guaranties, monopolies, and a financed native press must . . . pave the way to annexation. I submit that this is not the spirit of the Entente. The British people did not stand by the French people at Agadir to fill the pockets of financiers whose names are unknown outside of Constantinople or the Paris Bourse. . . . The Ottoman Empire is shaken, and the cosmopolitan financier is now staking out the land into spheres of influence. An empire may survive disasters but it cannot survive exploitation." For whatever reason Britain may have stood by France at Agadir, she immediately proceeded to secure her part of the spoils by the conventions with Turkey and Germany in 1913-1914. Whatever the "spirit of the Entente" may have been, in practice the Entente Powers had, in 1914, forced Germany, as the price of withdrawing their opposition to the Bagdad Railway, to admit them to the game of partitioning the Ottoman Empire. Then the war came, Germany and Russia were eliminated; and since the war France and Great Britain have gone on with the old arrangements, modified to suit the changed conditions.

It is the merit of Mr. Earle's book that he brings out the importance of the Bagdad Railway as a central and coordinating influence in this pre-war imperialistic scramble for the wealth of Turkey. He has carefully examined a great mass, it must be nearly all, of the available printed material, and in addition he has obtained, from persons "intimately associated with the Bagdad Railway," many records and documents not hitherto available. He seems to have mastered the material well enough to handle it with ease. Without emotion or notable bias, but clearly without any belief in the reality of the white man's burden, he has told his story in a clear, straightforward, and readable manner. The result is a reliable and an admirable study in contemporary imperialism—the best account, so far as I know, of the Bagdad Railway and its political and economic implications.

From this story it does not appear that the exploitation of Turkey was artfully or brutally imposed upon an innocent Ottoman government. Old Abdul Hamid was himself one of the first to dream of a great system of Turkish railways, and from first to last he welcomed foreign aid. Knowing well that he was mortgaging his empire, he did it because he saw no other way of developing the resources of his empire, and because he believed that only by developing those resources could his empire be held together under a single scepter or become a powerful state in the modern world. Whether the mortgage could ever be cleared was a gamble; but he, and his Young Turk successors, took the gambler's risk with their eyes open.

Nor does it appear that the Germans, with deep political design for the mastery of the world, stole a march upon the unsuspecting Entente Powers. In 1888 Sir Vincent Caillard tried to organize an Anglo-American syndicate to finance a Bagdad railway. When it failed the Germans took it up, obtained concessions, and began to build. In the negotiations of 1899-1903, French financial interests were given the same share as German. The Germans were eager to include the British interests in a scheme that would have internationalized the project. The Balfour Government approved, dallied with the scheme, but at last, on account of opposition from British shipping and other interests, withdrew. Again, in 1908-1909, during the pro-Entente and anti-German phase of the Young Turk movement, the British and French governments were given an opportunity to become the financial and political elder brothers of the Turks. They refused, and the Young Turks had to fall back on Germany again.

The truth is that in the early years—until about 1903—British and French opinion was either indifferent or favorable to the German project for a Bagdad railway. It was not until the Germans had taken the risk, begun the road, and were reaping the profits, that opposition developed in France and England. Opposition in France was partly sentimental, partly due to fear that the road would divert British trade from the Calais-Marseilles route, partly due to the opposition of Russia. In England opposition came partly from British shipping interests, and partly from British vested interests in Turkey. But in addition, there was from first to last the fear that such a road under German control, with a terminus on the Persian Gulf, would menace India and the Empire.

This opposition of the Entente Powers lasted until 1910-1914. Between those dates "bargains" were struck. The agreements reached in 1913 between French and German interests were formulated in the secret Franco-German convention of February 15, 1914. By this convention northern Anatolia and Syria were recognized as French spheres of influence in railway building, leaving the regions of the Anatolian and Bagdad railways as German spheres of influence. It was also agreed that "appropriate diplomatic and financial measures should be taken to bring about an increase in the revenues of the Ottoman Empire, sufficient, at least, to finance all the projected railways, both French and German."

Meantime, British financiers were "already joining the scramble for concessions." The result of this scramble was (1) a series of contracts between British and German financiers, "witnessed" by representatives of the governments; (2) the Anglo-Turkish convention of 1913; (3) the Anglo-German draft treaty of 1914. The substance of these arrangements was (1) interests represented by Lord Inchcape were given monopolistic privileges in Mesopotamian river navigation; (2) interests of the British-owned Smyrna-Aidin Railway were safeguarded; (3) oil rights in Mesopotamia from Mosul to Bagdad were conferred upon the Anglo-German syndicate known as the Turkish Petroleum Company; (4) the British control of the Sheik of Koweit was recognized, and the terminus of the Bagdad Railway was to be Basra, without privilege of extension to the Persian Gulf except with the consent of the British Government; (5) Great Britain withdrew further opposition to the construction of the Bagdad Railway. These arrangements, including the draft treaty, were formally ready when the war broke out.

One thing which stands out is that the scramble for Turkey was no clear-cut struggle between Triple Entente and Triple Alliance with opposing political objectives, although, toward the end, this aspect of the struggle becomes more important. It was rather a struggle between the financial interests of the different countries, backed by their respective governments, all seeking the same objective—the exploitation of Turkey for private gain. The interests of the taxpayers in Turkey and in Europe were apparently thought to be negligible. From the point of view of British "interests," Mr. Earle thinks that the refusal of Great Britain to accept the German proposals of 1903 was a "colossal blunder." The project, he says, would have internationalized the Bagdad Railway, and the "Entente of 1904 with France would have taken the control of the enterprise out of the hands of the Germans." It may be so. But this was the time, as Eckhardtstein assures us, when Great Britain was seeking a German alliance. If the Bagdad Railway project had gone through, is it not conceivable that some kind of Anglo-German entente might have been arranged? In which case the Anglo-French entente might not have come off. But the "ifs" of history are unknown quantities. CARL BECKER

A Gift to America

From Immigrant to Inventor. By Michael Pupin. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.

THIS book has been intended evidently as a record of the Americanization of Michael Pupin. Instead it turns out to be a record of the Pupinization of America, at least in the fields of invention, physical research, and study of natural phenomena. This vast, rich, self-satisfied country of one hundred per cent Americans has been compelled by the genius and persistency of Mr. Pupin to accept his methods and his conclusions and to act upon them. His observations as a boy-herdsman on the pasture lands of old Serbia are now incorporated in appliances which are used all over the world in sound transmission. It is because Mr. Pupin has contributed vastly more to America than America has contributed to him, that his book is so entirely different from similar books by immigrants who have succeeded. The latter always love America for what it has given them; Mr. Pupin loves his new country with the love of a giver. It is a fascinating story and a more stimulating argument in the debate on immigration than any other I know.

Mr. Pupin was born in the Serbian village of Idwor to a silent and sturdy peasant father and to a highly intelligent, though illiterate, peasant mother. This peasant woman whose somber picture fills the pages of her son's book knew more about the real value of science and religion than many a learned dean, and however indifferent one may be toward religion he must be impressed by the kind of religion which Olympiada Pupin transmitted to her son. This is a religion based not on dogma but on a deep cosmic yearning for the understanding of the world and of life, and when this yearning met with conditions of modern life in the surroundings of a new world and in contact with the truths of modern science, it became an active force for the study and solution of the problems of nature.

While guarding the precious oxen of his native village from the cattle thieves of a neighboring Rumanian village, the little Serbian boy observed that the best signaling is effected through the ground and that the harder the ground the more audible the signal. Most of Mr. Pupin's book is occupied with the fascinating story of how this simple observation led him to his inventions in the field of sound transmission, and, as a story of the metamorphosis of an observation, it has few equals in the biographical literature of the world. Mr. Pupin brought with him from his native land a sense of reality, a love for observation, and a devotion to truth of which he found little in the academic circles of this country. He was destined to be one of the first to establish the study of nature and nature's laws in American universities on a basis of research rather than on one of books and abstract formula. In this as in many other activities of his mind he very naturally met with the opposition of tradition and dogma. When a boy he was in danger of being declared a heretic because of his recital of Benjamin Franklin's experiments with a kite and a key for the purpose of discovering the nature of lightning. Many years later he was told by a very influential witch-hunter that his advocacy of the use of the alternating electric current in the distribution of electricity was detrimental to the interests of the electrical industry which had adapted itself to the direct current and that for this reason he had better resign his professorship. Mr. Pupin knew better and today both the direct and the alternating current are used in all electrical activities.

It would seem that the education which Michael Pupin, now of Columbia University, received as a boy in the village of Idwor and the adjacent town of Panchevo contained elements of higher value and greater worth than the education of the average boy in this country. Was it the fervent love of his mother for the eternal truth? Was it the song of the stars which watched over him during his long vigils beside the village cattle and imbued him with the greatness and sweetness of cosmic laws? Was it that he was not an average boy and that his mind had been sharpened and refined by the struggles and hardships of a peasant boy in an oppressed but not subdued fatherland? No one can tell. But we can be grateful to Mr. Pupin for proving that achievements in science are important to one's happiness and growth. Ironically enough, under the present immigration laws Mr. Pupin could never have entered this country. He had only five cents, a suit of clothes on his back, and a Turkish fez when he landed at Castle Garden in 1874. Then, too, the Serbian quota might have been exhausted.

Sea Foam

The Lookoutman. By David W. Bone. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

Sailor Town Days. By C. Fox Smith. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

HERE are two glimpses of the sea: one that of a deep-water skipper from the bridge, or as he prefers, more modestly, to phrase it, "a view of ships and seafaring as seen from the deep-water viewpoint of a man on lookout"; the other that of a salt-water enthusiast regarding the sea wistfully from the shore. Skipper Bone gives us the sea from the sea; Mr. Smith gives us the sea by way of that "amphibious country" known as Dockland or Sailor Town, which "the world over is a realm apart," one that everywhere has a certain cosmopolitan likeness because it takes its character from that universal trade which seafaring is.

"The Lookoutman" is not such another volume as "The Brassbounder," which was the author's story of his own initiation into sea life and will doubtless always remain his best writing. At the same time the new book is considerably more than the survey which it purports to be of the principal types of craft now afloat; it is a description beguilingly briny with salt air yet tempered with the restraint of professional knowledge and experience. The author of "Sailor Town Days," on the other hand, approaches his subject with a strictly amateur attitude, devoting most of his pages to lore of the sea as reflected in the marvelous waterfronts of London and Liverpool. There is affection, observation, and knowledge in his chapters, but the amateur attitude leads him, like so many others writing from that standpoint, to a too sentimental insistence upon those aspects of seafaring which are past or passing and too little appreciation of the newer forms. True, he is not so immersed in the age-long poetry of sailing craft as to deny beauty to the steamship, but he refuses to admire the ocean giants of most recent design. "Had I all the wealth of the movies," he declares, "I would not spend some hundreds of it on a suite in one of these bloated, lumbering floating hotels and paradises for profiteers, which cannot berth without a swarm of tugs to haul them about, and wallow as helplessly as stranded turtles on the slightest provocation. Of their magnificence I say nothing; as ships I maintain that they are, and always will be, atrocities."

Skipper Bone is more professional and more generous. He too deprecates the tendency so to construct the interior of the great liners that they lose their character as ships and become only an extension of the land to the sea; but in a chapter devoted especially to the world's ten biggest steamships—all over 25,000 tons—he notes that in addition to Persian rugs and ormolu fittings one finds wonderful safety devices and navigational equipment: automatic fire alarms, water-tight doors operated from the bridge, motor sounding machines, stability indicators, gyroscope compasses not subject to deviation, hydrophones bringing the warning of submarine bells from a distance, direction finders, and radio apparatus.

"We like him [the passenger] to have his electric elevators and marble baths," Skipper Bone decides, "for has he not assured us, the sailors, a comfort and safety that, without his assistance, would perhaps be overdue?" Again, viewed strictly as ships and subjected to a sailor's tests, these enormous vessels more than pass muster. "Has she good power? Does she steer well and easily? Is she reliable and tractable in the great testing seas of an Atlantic hurricane? Is there assurance of quick and precise response to a sudden demand in maneuver? Power, strength, stability—in a word, seaworthiness is the quality to arouse our enthusiasm, and our ocean sovereigns are seaworthy above all. They make their regal progress across the oceans with about the exactitude of a rail-bound express; the worst that wind or sea can do holds little to be feared by them; they come and go on their appointed schedules, dignified, precise, powerful, compelling the homage of lesser craft."

Yet for his ideal of a "pure-bred steamship" Skipper Bone deserts the Atlantic Ocean and picks the 3,053-ton Anglia of the Holyhead-Dublin cross-channel service. "To my eyes she is the most beautiful mercantile steamship afloat. . . . Her masts and funnels are spaced apart at distances that are proportionate to the height of the hull above water (a becoming arrangement that is rarely possible in the very large vessels) and she has no multiple range of decks and vertical erections to confuse the vision by a checked and serrated perspective."

Finally, Skipper Bone's professional attitude enables him to foresee (and accept) the impending passing of the steamship for the motor ship—the vessel in which oil is converted directly into power in an internal-combustion engine without the intermediary of furnaces and steam. The motor ship is already with us—destined to bring strange changes to those who go down to the sea in ships as also to those who merely regard them from the shore. The oil-burning steamship has already destroyed the tradition of ten years ago that the vessel of high pedigree must have three or four smoke-stacks; it has reduced the number to one or two. Now the motor ship is about to banish altogether the smoke-stack, with its trailing cloud of black in the heavens, removing from the sea a mark as distinctive of the age of steam as were towering masts and billowing canvas of the age of sail.

The Background of Literature

Midwest Portraits. A Book of Memories and Friendships. By Harry Hansen. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. HANSEN has written a most excellent kind of book. He is quite right in his philosophic indifference as to the ultimate literary fate of the figures he describes. These men are living deeply and characteristically and expressing a section, a country, an age to itself. Their human fates and gestures and the tale of the soil whence they sprang and the air they breathed have the perennial interest of things profoundly and articulately human. Schlogl's in Chicago is no Mermaid Tavern. Yet no one whose good fortune it has been to sit and eat and drink there but once with some of the company that Mr. Hansen describes can fail to feel that from here, too, if there has been, perhaps, too little traffic with the stars, there has been traffic with the earth and the winds and the causes of things and the eternal effort of the shaping mind.

It is well, too, that Mr. Hansen has not quite confined himself to the chief figures of his city and his movement, but has mentioned, at least, minor figures, figures related to literature sometimes only through intelligence and appreciation and a certain creative intrepidity of life. For these are as necessary to any rich literary movement as the actual writers themselves and are often, in the perspective of time, almost as significant and quite as delightful. I hope, therefore, that he will not cease chronicling with this volume and that he will be even bolder in setting down the human, even the apparently trivial. From such records as his or as F. P. A.'s imitation of Pepys or Burton Rascoe's "Bookman's Daybook" those who come after us will learn what we were like and we, in the inevitable days of age to come, will have a source of both knowledge and pleasure. We are thus getting our own Pepys's and Henry Crabb Robin-sons. And there is this to be said for our diarists and intimate chroniclers, that they are utterly without the drop of poison that often embitters the personal accounts of former periods.

Mr. Hansen's execution is unequal. His first chapter, Of an Ancient Tavern, is an uncommonly limpid and agreeable piece of writing. In his actual accounts of Sandburg and Anderson and Masters and the others he alternates between a terse simplicity of statement and vague Babbittish clichés in which he cannot himself quite believe. Thus he tells us on the one hand that Sherwood Anderson is a man "who gathered into himself all the torment of life" and, on the other, that Carl Sandburg's first volume of verse had a "clean outlook."

Of the actual portraits those of Sandburg and Anderson are not only the longest but the most interesting. We have here, as we have also in Dreiser, something in literature that is, if not new in its origin, new in its development. Sandburg once drove a milk-wagon; Anderson was, during several years, a common laborer. Artists have had such beginnings before, Keats, for instance, and Hebbel. But these Europeans strove, almost from the beginning, to rise out of their early environment intellectually and to connect themselves by instruction and reflection with the central literary and philosophical traditions of Western civilization. Keats became ardently Hellenic; Hebbel developed his dramatic theories by an appeal to Plato and Hegel. Sandburg, Anderson, Dreiser have been content to remain in the deepest sense of the American peasantry from which they sprang. They want, of course, to turn a stream of fresh ideas upon their land and people. They will sit, like Dreiser, cursing and blaspheming against the intolerable stupidity of their folk. But they do not, by an acquired and aristocratic culture, seek to remove themselves from that folk. Hating it, they remain of it. Something of the spirit of Whitman, something of a new way of conceiving of both life and literature is undoubtedly here. And it is truly an American way. A great way, too, irrespective of the momentary aesthetic perfection or imperfection of this or that product, if it can indeed be summed up in some such excellent way as Mr. Hansen sums up the basic attitude of Sherwood Anderson: "He was trying to apply his philosophy that life is not a mean thing to be tamed and held to hard and fast canons, but a beautiful wild thing of ecstasies and dreams, something that must be lived deeply to be understood." And that attitude and that conclusion is, curiously enough, nor in such very different phrasing, the attitude and the conclusion of Faust, of Goethe, of whom Mr. Anderson probably knows little or nothing. So that the spirit of creative freedom is found to be the same by men coming from different ends of both the physical and the spiritual world, and this Mid-Western peasant movement in American literature allies itself naturally and hearteningly with the wisdom of the great sages of the past.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

A Shavian Sacrifice

The Sacrificial Goat. By Ernita Lascelles. Boni and Liveright. $2.

THE most astonishing fact about The Sacrificial Goat is that it is a first novel. The virtuosity of the writing, the ease with which fullbodied characters (in a limited milieu, it is true) are made to express individuality, the witty dialogue, the easy mastery with which Miss Lascelles wields the baton over her ensemble—all acquit the writer of the offense of being a novice. Indeed, impeccable as is her craftsmanship, one misses the quickening of the tempo, the cry in the dark, the aspiration to untried heights that mark the achievement we call a promise in our younger novelists. The pains of spiritual growth, the epic struggle of youth to reconcile life to principle, the falterings on the wayside are, for Miss Lascelles, occasions only for sharp and mirthless ridicule and veiled contempt, pity being discarded as démodé in a modern novelist. She does not permit herself to sanction an uninterrupted rapture. The bubble must be pricked. Miss Lascelles is tireless in paradox, unwearied in her flashings—even if they be only in the pan—and as cerebral as only a pamphleteer turned novelist can be.

Perhaps that is why The Sacrificial Goat is called a Shavian novel. Apart from the fact that the best lines in it—Shavian to the core—are assigned to Edward Moreby, who is made to act and talk in a manner that we instinctively associate with Shaw in his salad days, the entire treatment of the novel is Shavian. It is sincerely so, for Miss Lascelles does not imitate; having naturally inhaled Shaw, she as naturally exhales him in Moreby, no inconsiderable part of the book.

The plot is based on the too familiar triangle, with Joan Candler as the wife, David Tasker the husband, and Edward Moreby the pursuer and pursued, and with a supporting cast of divergent types that would give verisimilitude to a richer and more original conception. It is in the picture she draws of David Tasker that the pamphleteer in Miss Lascelles emerges. Somewhat in the character of a feminist Shavian, she grips David and pushes him into the faces of her readers as the quintessence of male illusion and fit subject for the liberated woman's mockery. David and Joan meet as members of a provincial company and marry at the end of the tour. David, a feeble poseur, is rendered somewhat too pitiable for acceptance, and in the battle with Moreby is simply extinguished, except in a muscular conflict, to which Miss Lascelles succeeds in giving a total effect of unreality. The assumed love between Joan and Moreby seems too cerebral for credence. Joan, become a successful actress and something of a social favorite, succeeds in putting her husband out of the picture altogether. He returns, blown to London from New Zealand—whither he had gone to make a home "away from it all"—by gusts of jealousy, and finds her yet his, Moreby having virtually repulsed her. And Miss Lascelles leaves her puppets locked in embrace, with the tart and inconclusive comment: "Well, well! Poor devils."

Victoria's Laureate

Tennyson. Aspects of His Life, Character and Poetry. By Harold Nicolson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

TO admire the eminent Victorians is no longer to court reproach; to sneer at them is a slightly outmoded convention—the attitude "dates" a man. Mr. Nicolson is, as he admits, a product of "our scavenger age," and is therefore in no position to blame Tennyson for being a product of his age; yet he cannot quite forgive him for not escaping the faults of the mid-nineteenth century, when matrimony was regarded as a sacrament, the church was a divine institution menaced by atheistic or agnostic science, and the British Empire was an institution hardly less divine. In choosing this subject for the exercise of his critical talents he has made himself a Balaam, for though he apparently came to curse he has, on the whole and with certain restrictions, stayed to bless. His book would have been better had he taken to heart the wise words lately uttered by Mr. A. C. Bradley to the effect that to be incapable of enjoying poetry because the poet's opinions and ideas are not ours is "an altogether perverse attitude toward poetry, or, for that matter, any other product of imagination." Judged by such a standard where would Dante be? Where Duccio? Botticelli? Palestrina? Shelley? Perhaps the Victorian era is still too near us to permit of criticism of its greatest poet untrammeled by dislike of the characteristics of Victorianism. The act of faith by which when reading Dante we become fourteenth-century Florentines, when hearing Palestrina Tridentine Catholics, and when reading Shelley Godwinian revolutionists, is an irksome task when we turn to Tennyson. The Victorian garments sit uneasily upon us. Yet for the nonce we must adopt the poet's thoughts and emotions, must look at life—at morals and politics and science and religion—from his point of view. This Mr. Nicolson has not done; there has been no "willing suspension of disbelief." He divorces the poet from his time; blesses the one and condemns the other.

As one result of this unnatural severance his book presents us with a vast and yawning lacuna; the Tennyson of the middle years, of Farringford, of the domestic poems and the "Idylls of the King" appears before us as no more than an insubstantial ghost. Alas for this gray shadow, once a man! The critic actually and deliberately ignores the Arthurian cycle; he thinks it fairer and wiser "to leave this period for the judgment of future generations." Yet he recognizes "the magnificent poetry which the 'Idylls' contain." Surely this is the gran refuto of Tennysonian criticism. The "Idylls" are, on the whole, a failure, and are likely to be judged a failure when the age in which they were written has sunk into the remote past; but the failure is one that should be inquired into on aesthetic and poetic grounds. The mere current ideas that have been woven into the texture of the poems have nothing to do with the matter. We do not all subscribe to the doctrines embodied in St. Bernard's hymn to the Virgin; but we all recognize the supreme poetry of the last canto of the "Paradiso." Moreover this abrupt and unphilosophical dismissal of the work of Tennyson's middle period produces a curious effect from the biographical point of view, an effect which it is difficult to describe. Tennyson seems suddenly to become old. At one moment he is young, unknown (or known only to be ridiculed), introspective, melancholy, mystic, glooming upon the Lincolnshire fens or haunting dim and noisome London taverns, wreathed in tobacco smoke. We turn the page, as it were, and find him illustrious, complacent, visited by the nobility, bothered by tourists, wreathed in a somewhat tinsel majesty. How the change came about is not made very clear. In particular the "ten silent years" between 1832 and 1842 remain almost as much a blank, almost as open a field for speculation, as the "seven silent years" of another and greater English poet.

The attempt to separate Tennyson and his age results, however, in another and more welcome contrast: the contrast between Tennyson the lyric and mystic poet and Tennyson the voice and "prophet" of his period. All that is excellent in his verse Mr. Nicolson attributes to the former; all that is complacent, ephemeral, optimistic, domestic, in the nature of a compromise—Victorian, in a word—to the latter. The greater Tennyson appears in much of his earlier work; in the earlier sections of "In Memoriam"; in the songs in "The Princess"; in "Maud" (where the old genius again flamed out); and it reappears in some of the work of his old age. The lesser Tennyson held undisputed sway over the "reading public" and over his own genius during the years, roughly, between 1860 and 1880. Mr. Nicolson considers that in his views of sex and of politics Tennyson reached an unworkable compromise, characteristic of his time; whereas in his religious opinions he inquired far more profoundly and was more at one with the genius of his earlier years. For the change from "the black, unhappy mystic of the Lincolnshire wolds" to "the prosperous Isle of Wight Victorian" Mr. Nicolson blames the Cambridge group of "the Apostles" who first inculcated in Tennyson the doctrine of the poet's "mission" and convinced him that it was his business to guide and to teach. His knowledge of Shelley's failures and Keats's triumphs should have taught him better; but for better or worse the apostolic doctrine fastened itself upon him and shaped much of his later verse. When free of it he could write "Ulysses" and "Tithonus," "The Bugle Song" and "Now sleeps the crimson petal, now the white." Burdened with the Wordsworthian duty to shed benignant influence upon his fellow-men he could but accomplish such things as "Enoch Arden" and "Aylmer's Field."

Following in the steps of the late Thomas R. Lounsbury Mr. Nicolson has accomplished some admirable pages on the subject of contemporary criticism of Tennyson; it may surprise some Georgians to learn to what an extent their strictures were anticipated sixty years ago. The critic is genuinely moved to enthusiasm in dealing with aspects of Tennyson's art. He has drawn a convincing and on the whole sympathetic portrait of the solitary brooding young poet and of the majestic figure of the last years at Aldworth. The "scavenger work" has been exercised mostly upon the central period; and the scattered sneers and deprecatory remarks are generally pardonable for the neatness with which they are turned. One may forgive much in the critic who does not stoop to deride Tennyson's love for Hallam and who delights in the lyric triumphs of his inspiration. The portrait that is finally achieved is that of a great personality and a great genius; more imposing, more majestic than, perhaps, Mr. Nicolson intended or quite realizes.

Children and Gentle Beasts

A Century of Children's Books. By Florence V. Barry. George H. Doran Company. $2.

The Story of Mrs. Tubbs. Dr. Dolittle's Post Office. By Hugh Lofting. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.25. $2.50.

The Kitchen Porch. By George Philip Krapp. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Knee-High to a Grasshopper. By Anne and Dillwyn Parrish. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

MISS BARRY'S account of children's books begins at a time when Cinderella and Robin Hood and Goody Two-Shoes were names as yet unspoken. And it would probably astonish children who regard those names as somehow associated with the foundations of the world to hear how recent that time was. In the middle of the seventeenth century children's books were still moral, instructive, and grave; for example, the "Token for Children," containing "an exact account of the conversion, holy and exemplary lives and joyful deaths of several young children," or the "Wyse Chylde of Thre Year Old," who was not at a loss when asked: "Sage enfaunt, how is the skye made?" Even in those days there was the "Gesta Romanorum" and Aesop; but until "Pilgrim's Progress," "Robinson Crusoe," and "Gulliver's Travels"—none of them really intended for children by their authors—children were compelled to be quietly edified rather than amused. Miss Barry has told her story with possibly too much detail and unfortunately has omitted an index, but it is a valuable record of various theories of education and their effects on juvenile literature. She does not, however, clear up the mystery of Mother Goose, and until that is done the last, last word will not have been said on the subject.

Without apparent theory, moral purpose, or a desire to be instructive, Hugh Lofting has proceeded joyfully to the making of literature. In this third volume of the admirable Dr. Dolittle's adventures, and in "The Story of Mrs. Tubbs," a shorter story for smaller children, he has added to that rare list of juvenilia which includes Alice and her companions. Like Alice, Dr. Dolittle's friends are animals, and such animals: Dab-Dab, the accomplished duck housekeeper; Gub-Gub, the appealingly greedy little pig, and Speedy the Skimmer, the swallow who almost succeeds in annihilating time and space. Their adventure this time is a bird post office on a house-boat just off the coast of Africa, where tea is served every afternoon with cucumber sandwiches on Sundays, and where care is taken to provide the very best pens to write with because, of course, post-office pens are usually so bad. The enterprise is uncommonly successful, as anyone might have foreseen; "the post-office safe could hardly hold all the money taken in and the overflow had to be put in a vase on the kitchen mantelpiece." The book is filled with excellent suggestions for householders: pincushions served with the fish, for example, to stick your fish bones in instead of having them spread along the edge of your plate, and a speaking tube which leads to the open-air outside, into which any conversation, imperative but hardly suitable for the table, can be spoken. A thoroughly delectable book, in short, and rendered more so by the illustrations, done by Mr. Lofting himself and as merry and gentle and wise as any child could wish.

Mr. Krapp, too, has written pleasantly of animals ("The Kitchen Porch"). His Little Red Hen is the barnyard philosopher, and if at times she is a trifle smug and moralistic, she is also divertingly clever at getting herself out of scrapes after she has got herself into them. An account of a garden party, of which Little Red Hen is the only witness, is a charming and sympathetic tale of the diversions of Carrot Man and Potato Woman, neglected by the children at the end of the day, but hosts at moon-rise to as gay a company of dancers as ever stepped a measure.

In "Knee-High to a Grasshopper," Anne and Dillwyn Parrish have done a more sentimental and self-consciously pretty job. Their animals are too complicated and ornamental, their Little Man has many adventures, some of them not uninteresting, but on the whole he lies or floats in an uncertain middle ground which is neither earth nor fairyland. Children like Hugh Lofting because he is matter-of-fact and homely. Their fairyland must have smudges of reality upon it; even fairy wings become weary, and need the earth for a resting place.

DOROTHY GRAFFE

Books in Brief

Dethronements. By Laurence Housman. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

On the theory that statesmen cling to their pedestals inside the four walls which symbolize their private lives and address their wives from an invisible domestic rostrum, these three imaginary portraits "done in dialogue" are ingenious and decidedly poetic. Parnell, Chamberlain, and Wilson are the subjects of Mr. Housman's sketches, each being depicted at the moment when the full significance of his political frustration dawns upon him. They are projected vividly, and, in the case of Chamberlain particularly, with pathos and irony wisely blended.

Persian Letters. By Montesquieu. Translated by John Davidson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

"Translations," said Montesquieu, "are like copper money, which have quite the same value as a gold piece, and are even of greater use among the people; but they are base coin and always light." Mr. Davidson has not been deterred in his endeavor by this comparison, however, and has accomplished his task with care and competence. The book includes a valuable introductory sketch of Montesquieu's life, and adds another volume to the diversified—but curiously named—Broadway Translations.

Famous Single Poems and the Controversies Which have Raged about Them. By Burton E. Stevenson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A by-product of Mr. Stevenson's labors in compiling "The Home Book of Verse," this is a work of real research into the more obscure corners of common literature. With constant humor but with no condescension Mr. Stevenson has written the intimate histories of such poems as Casey at the Bat, Ben Bolt, Nothing to Wear, Rock Me to Sleep, and A Visit from St. Nicholas, reviving the almost incredible controversies that have arisen about their authorship or their value, and incidentally composing one of the best commentaries in existence upon popular taste.

The Markenmore Mystery. By J. S. Fletcher. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

There is something about the presence of a butler on the opening page of a detective story which augurs well for the breathless nature of the ensuing chapters. A butler is symbolic of leisure, and people with leisure have time to be bafflingly murdered; hence the basic elements of a good thriller. Mr. Fletcher has contributed another to his ample list of lively narratives, soundly plotted and adroitly unraveled.

A Laugh a Day Keeps the Doctor Away. By Irvin S. Cobb. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

These anecdotes are as hilarious as a pot of paste and a pair of shears can make them. Three hundred and sixty-six jokes—even when clipped in what the jacket calls Mr. Cobb's "inimitable style"—are quite enough to keep the doctor away.

Without Clues. By Jeanette Helm. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Forewarned is forearmed—everywhere except in a detective yarn. The master criminal who announces his purpose in advance merely compounds the mystery and puts a double burden upon the baffled forces. The reader of "Without Clues" is assured more than 300 pages of excitement—quite enough if he wishes to be in bed at a reasonable hour.

Cloud Castle and Other Papers. By Edward Thomas. With a Foreword by W. H. Hudson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Posthumous sketches by one of the gravest and most graceful of modern English poets. "Morgan" and "Aunt Anne's Cottage" are altogether beautiful, but most of the other pieces, especially those written as long as twenty years ago, are precious and thinly Pateresque.

Eleonora Duse

EVERYTHING was against the great Italian actress. The dice could not have been more heavily loaded. Far more heavily, in all likelihood, than she dreamed. Ibsen's frugal Norse in Italian! Two incommensurable worlds of the soul, even of nature. "Fiordi" . . . I heard the lapping of the Tyrrhene wave. "Amore . . . liberamente . . ." No, Ellida Wangel, the Lady from the Sea, knew nothing of the connotation of those words. "Amore" may be magnificent. It has neither yearning nor reverence. Those are of the North. The very gesture of an Italian hand drenches the scene in an atmosphere that turns the gray and silver and faint dawn glints of Ibsen into a rich and alien glow.

The actors who supported Signora Duse showed, with one exception, no sense even of the insurmountable difficulty that faced them. One, Memo Benassi, who impressed certain local critics, acted almost like a tenor. I expected him to break out into the famous sobbing aria from "I Pagliacci." He should have had a romantic cloak. Alfredo Robert as Wangel was obtuse in a South European and shopkeeping kind of way. The one was operatic; the other had wandered upon this scene from some Latin comedy in which he was deceived and beaten.

All this, against a most indifferent and mechanical scenic background, on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House. An intimate theater play, badly acted in a foreign language—here! The thing was preposterous. It was not art. It was a peep-show. "Ten dollars and down, ladies and gentlemen, to get a peep at the great Duse, the illustrious Italian actress whose tragic adventures have been rumored over half the world and who probably will never be seen again! Your last chance, ladies and gentlemen, positively your last chance!" No "barker" at a county fair could have put it more plainly. And the great crowd came and each paid his money to take the peep, and Mr. Morris Gest took in more dollars than had ever been taken in for a single theatrical performance since the world began. Yes, literally, since the world began.

I had said all that to myself. And it was all true. Also, I had never before seen Eleonora Duse and the unanimity of the Duse legend had filled me with cool skepticism as a unanimous legend always does. And then—then she appeared. A very fragile, almost wraith-like, quite white-haired lady of sixty-four. She uses, as is well-known, no make-up. If you sat near enough the stage you could see the wrinkles on her emaciated cheek and throat and hands. But she sat, bending forward, playing with her sun-shade as though she were quite alone—oh, immeasurably removed from that huge, gaping crowd; she smiled and the smile was a little plaintive and yet it had in it all of youth, both the bloom and the pathos of youth. She moved about; she leaned her head against a pillar; she leaned it against her arm. What was it that, against one's will or almost against one's will, irrevocably persuaded one to join those other plaudits that were given to fame, alas, rather than to art?

She unites in every gesture and every intonation the highest distinction with the utmost simplicity. If I were to describe her art in the ordinary verbiage I should say that its method is soundly realistic. And that would be quite true. Nor is there any conscious stylization. Signora Duse intends, I believe, to be delicately and soberly veracious. What she adds is her inimitable grace. It is a classical grace, a Latin grace. It is the spirit of simplicity and restraint which, without undue sadness or austerity, we find in the noblest of Latin verses. She is—I use the phrase advisedly—a tragic muse. Her mask is very human; it is not distorted by pain; it is spiritualized and grave and sometimes full of woe. It is always noble. Eleonora Duse does not yearn after beauty. That is Ibsen; that is of the North. She possesses beauty. Her acting is perfect as the verse of Vergil is perfect. And that perfection is an easy one because it inheres in her personality, in her inmost self. Her associates are florid, Italianate. If she is like Vergil, they are like Ariosto.

She, of course, does not act Ibsen either. She is not Ellida Wangel. Neither, however, is she merely herself. She has universalized her inner tragedy and I dare swear that the same essence will reach one from her whatever role she plays. She has the grace of autumn in an Italian garden. The landscape is a little somber. Laughter and love have fled. Winter is coming; youth whose very sorrows are triumphant is no more. A draped statue, severely beautiful, restrainedly melancholy, stands near a pool. Bronzed leaves cover the surface of the water. Against the base of the statue leans a figure in a simple drapery of blue. It is Eleonora Duse. The sadness, the irrevocableness, the tragic beauty of life are written on her forehead, expressed in her posture. She demands nothing, yearns for nothing now, hopes for nothing. She possesses beauty. She possesses a sovereign sadness. It is her ultimate gift.

Play-Writing

A professional Course in Play Writing is offered under the personal supervision of THEODORE BALLOU HINCKLEY Editor of THE DRAMA

Individual Instruction and Criticism

The Drama's course in play writing teaches in detail the technique of the professional play. It takes you step by step from the simplest rudiments to the actual completion of plays. Your work will receive the individual attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticisms will be directed toward your specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and your dialogue, and give you definite, constructive criticism and help.

You are encouraged to develop your own talent and individual style of expression. No attempt is made to lead you along any cut-and-dried plan. Not one form letter is used in the discussion of your plays or plots. Each piece of creative work receives the personal attention of Mr. Hinckley.

Producers Will Read Your Plays

Throughout the course, the aim is toward the completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers. If your manuscript has the endorsement of The Drama it will receive a reading by managers.

Thoughtful Plays Require Technique

As a reader of The Nation, you probably are interested in writing a play of ideas rather than a popular success. Technique is essential to the thoughtful play if it is to escape didacticism. Your play should present your opinions in such an attractive and skillful manner that the audience will absorb them without effort. Even though you scorn conventional form and dream of a style as individual as Shaw's or O'Neill's you must be soaked with technique before you can ignore it without losing your audience.

Limited Enrollment

Since the work is so carefully personalized, the enrollment is limited to people of real promise. An enrollment examination will be sent upon request; upon this will be based our decision as to your eligibility. Fill out the coupon and mail it for complete information.

Oskar Jaszi and Other "Traitors"

By EMIL LENGYEL

IT may not be known in America that among the reactionary countries of Europe Hungary furnishes the greatest number of political émigrés. Tens of thousands of professionals as well as laborers fled to the neighboring countries rather than submit to the autocracy of Admiral Horthy and Captain Gömbös. To give an idea of the number and the intellectual qualities of the émigrés it should be mentioned that in Vienna alone they have eight papers of their own, two of which are dailies. Another characteristic fact of the emigration is that the number of books printed in the Hungarian language, treating political subjects, published in Vienna, exceeds by far the number of books of the same kind published in the capital of Hungary. A glance at the names of the émigrés suffices to show that the list includes some of the representative men of science and letters, who are not unknown beyond the boundaries of their country. Foremost among them ranks Dr. Oskar Jaszi, professor at the Budapest University, Hungary's most prominent sociologist, who is at present on a tour of lecture and study in the United States. Hungary's greatest philosopher, Professor Bernhard Alexander, lives in exile, too, as well as Professor Tibor Peterfy, internationally known authority in anatomy; Louis Biro, author of the "Tzarina," Alexander Brody, author of "Liza Timar," and Baron Hatvany-Deutsch, one of Hungary's foremost journalists. Among the prominent politicians are Count Michael Karolyi, former president of the Hungarian republic, Erno Garami, former leader of the right wing of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party, Martin Lovaszi, member of several cabinets, and the Right Rev. John Hock, popularly known as "father of Hungary's bloodless revolution."

As the press is muzzled in Hungary the papers of the émigrés undertook the task of supplying reliable news about the terroristic acts of the reactionaries to that part of the Hungarian public which they could reach. As the circulation of their papers is prohibited in Hungary proper they have to be smuggled into it. But their chief circulation is among those Hungarians who are living in the territories ceded by Hungary to the Succession States.

After a successful war of extermination upon the domestic liberal and democratic papers the Hungarian authorities tackled the much harder task of silencing those Hungarian papers that are published outside of the territory subject to Hungarian jurisdiction. In order to discredit these papers in the eyes of their readers it was found convenient to proceed along traditional lines and to indict for "high treason" those Hungarian émigrés who have been contributing articles about the white terror to the Hungarian papers published abroad.

This indictment was recently drawn up by Dr. G. Strache, "royal Hungarian chief prosecuting attorney," and was returned by the "judge of investigation," as is prescribed by the Hungarian laws. The indictment includes among others the name of Count Michael Karolyi (whose estates, it will be remembered, have already been confiscated on another charge of "high treason"), Professor Oskar Jaszi, Father John Hock, Baron Hatvany-Deutsch, Erno Garami, Martin Lovaszi, and covers articles printed for the most part in the leading paper of the Hungarian émigrés, the Vienna Hungarian Gazette, edited by Professor Jaszi.

This most recent attack of the Horthy-Gömbös system on liberal thought is an eloquent example of present-day Hungarian methods and deserves special notice on account of the diplomatic complications to which it gave rise. It may be seen from the following extract from the indictment that it refers to the states adjoining Hungary as the "enemy" states, a designation which is very often found in the vocabulary of Hungary's self-appointed rulers, side by side with "high treason" and "traitor."

After speaking of the "calumnies" of which Hungary was the innocent victim during pre-war times the indictment continues:

> We [the Hungarians] did not care much that the newspapers of the world devoted considerable space to complaints that a "minority," by which they meant the Hungarian race, oppressed cruelly the "national majorities" and that it was only the Hungarian reign of terror that prevented the falling to pieces of that artificial contraption called Hungary. Thus it came about that the Allies impudently adopted as one plank of their peace platform the dismemberment of Hungary which was actually effected through the Treaty of the Trianon. It can be determined, however, that up to the reply given by the Allies to the note of President Wilson of December 19, 1916, the dismemberment of Hungary had never been mentioned by them. The propaganda along these lines was and is being engineered mostly by the Czechs. The representatives of the Vienna Hungarian press are the mercenaries of this service of propaganda which menaces the very existence of Europe and, more particularly, that of Hungary.
> As the Hungarian émigrés have not sufficient means to operate their presses they are dependent upon the material assistance of the enemies of Hungary. Therefore it is their aim to convince the enemies of the Hungarian state that they are the only depositaries of that political thought which, if permitted to be translated into action, would enable the "victors of the Trianon" to enjoy the possession of their loot. The émigrés proclaim that if they were in power the Succession States would have no reason to be afraid of any complications arising from territorial questions, because they are not extreme "jingoes" but protagonists of the idea of reconciliation, conceived in the spirit of international democracy. Consequently, the basis of the political existence of the Vienna fugitives is their hatred against Hungary. Their interests are identical with those of the enemies of Hungary.
> The aims of the Vienna Hungarian press can be summed up as follows:
> It makes every effort to represent Hungary as a country constantly engaged in military preparations and conspiracies against the neighboring states. Furthermore, it represents Hungary as a country where life is insecure, a country the very existence of which is a danger to European civilization, so that, as a logical conclusion of these premises, international intervention would be an inevitable necessity. With their malevolent accounts about the white terror, the persecution of the laborers, and the attempts to restore the Hapsburgs to the Hungarian throne, they wish to provoke the disdain of the world toward Hungary, thus depriving her of the possibility of being the beneficiary of the moral support of the foreign nations.

The newspaper articles signed by the defendants prove beyond controversy that the intention of their writers was to injure the credit and good name of Hungary abroad. That the articles were written with a view to induce foreign countries or organizations to commit hostile acts against the Hungarian nation is proved by those proclamations, addressed to foreign countries and organizations, which were published in the newspapers of the émigrés. The general tenor of these papers furnishes another evidence that they are in the service of that hostile propaganda whose aim it is to have the independence of Hungary crushed, its national existence annihilated, and to find some pretext of an armed intervention in Hungary.

On the basis of the foregoing the criminal intention of the defendants can be proved. The indictment is, therefore, justified. When considering the criminal responsibility of the defendants the provisions of the press law could not be applied, inasmuch as the validity of this law is restricted to press matters published on the territory of the Hungarian state.

The indignation of public opinion and the foreign offices of the states adjoining Hungary which were referred to as "enemy" states carrying on a "hostile" propaganda against Hungary compelled the Hungarian minister of justice to declare that he did not "identify himself with some parts of the explanation of the indictment" drawn up, by the way, by one of his subordinates, the chief prosecuting attorney. Despite this statement the wording of the indictment has not been changed so that its monstrous absurdities will form the basis of the criminal prosecution of the liberal émigrés.

As it seems unlikely that the persons indicted, who are living abroad, will present themselves at their trial, provision has been made to convict them in their absence.

How criminal processes of this type are handled in Hungary was recently illustrated by a trial which was held before the Hungarian Royal Tribunal at Budapest in the case of two "fugitives from justice," Father John Hock and Martin Lovaszi, in connection with a "criminal offense" similar to those mentioned in the indictment. Both of them contributed to the Chicago Hungarian weekly Magyar Tribuna articles about the white terror which, in the opinion of the prosecuting attorney, "were calculated to induce a foreign country to an armed intervention against Hungary." Translated into everyday language this means that the articles of Father Hock and Martin Lovaszi, published in a Chicago Hungarian weekly paper, had the purpose of inducing the Government of the United States to declare war on Hungary on account of the white terror prevailing there. The court, which apparently shared the opinion of the public prosecutor regarding America's belligerent intentions, convicted both defendants in contumaciam. The proceedings did not take more than an hour because the presiding judge declined to admit evidence on the part of the lawyers for the defendants proving the correctness of the statements of their clients concerning the excesses of the present regime. The refusal of the court was explained by the laconic pronouncement that "the assertions of the defendants are generally known to be untrue."

What happens when a "traitorous" journalist presents himself at his trial is shown by the outrageous sentence which sent Zoltan Szasz, one of Hungary's most respected journalists, to prison for four years. Zoltan Szasz, who is the author of several popular books, sprang into political prominence during the Hungarian bolshevist regime when, in a public speech, he very courageously attacked the terroristic methods of Bela Kun. Utterly dissatisfied with the equally terroristic methods of Messrs. Horthy and Gömbös he contributed a number of critical articles to one of the papers of the Vienna émigrés, the Jovo. After having been indicted for the articles, he returned from Vienna to Budapest and presented himself at the trial of his case. He was found guilty and sentenced in the first quarter of 1922 to two years in prison. He appealed to the higher court, which, setting aside the verdict of the lower court, sentenced him to four years in prison. He, too, was charged with having written articles which "might have provoked some foreign country to an armed intervention in Hungary."

This sentence, pronounced in September last, raised a storm of protest on the part of newspapers and journalistic organizations in many European countries. Scores of telegrams have been dispatched to Count Bethlen, Prime Minister of Hungary, asking him to extend amnesty to Szasz. In each case, however, the stereotype answer of the Premier has been that he cannot interfere with the verdict of the "independent" Hungarian bench. Learning from this lesson the Hungarian émigrés will keep out of the way of what is called in the succession states, "Horthy justice."

The End of Passive Resistance

THE text of the imperial proclamation announcing the end of passive resistance in the Ruhr, issued on September 26, 1923, was as follows:

To the German People!

On January 11 French and Belgian troops, in defiance of justice and of the treaty provisions, occupied the German territory of the Ruhr. Since then the Ruhr and Rhineland have had to suffer the severest tribulations. More than 180,000 men and women, old folks and children, have been driven from house and home; for millions of Germans the conception of personal freedom no longer exists. Countless acts of violence have accompanied the occupation. More than a hundred of our citizens have had to sacrifice their lives. Hundreds are still lying in prison. Justice and patriotic sentiment protest against the unrighteousness of this invasion. The population refuses to work under foreign bayonets. For this loyalty and devotion to the German Reich in its hardest days the entire German people is grateful. The Federal Government undertook to care for its suffering fellow-citizens to the extent of its resources. That has caused a constantly increasing drain upon the resources of the Reich. Last week the expenditures for relief in the Rhineland and Ruhr reached the sum of three and a half trillion marks. For the current week at least twice that amount will be required. The former production of the Rhineland and Ruhr has ceased. The life of occupied and unoccupied Germany has been thrown into confusion. There is a serious danger that continuance in the present policy will make it impossible to establish a sound currency, to maintain economic life, and to assure the mere existence of our people.

In the interest of the future of Germany as well as in the interest of the Rhineland and Ruhr this must be avoided. In order to maintain the life of the people and the state we must face the bitter necessity of ceasing the struggle. We know that this means a greater moral sacrifice by the people of the occupied region than we have hitherto asked. Their struggle has been heroic, their self-discipline unexampled. We shall never forget what those who have suffered in the occupied district have borne. We shall never forget what they have sacrificed who left their homes rather than violate their loyalty to the fatherland.

The principal task of the Federal Government is to see to it that the prisoners are set free and that those who have been deported return to their homes. The struggle for these elementary human rights stands above all economic and material considerations. Germany has declared herself ready to bear the severest material sacrifices for the freedom of her German citizens and the German soil. This freedom, however, cannot be made the object of bargaining and exchange. The President of the German Reich and the Federal Government give their solemn assurance to the German people and to the world that they will not give their consent to any agreement which detaches the smallest parcel of German soil from the German Reich. The responsibility lies upon the invading Powers and their Allies whether through recognition of this determination they will restore peace to Germany, or whether by refusing this peace they will precipitate the inevitable consequences of such a policy upon the relations of the peoples.

We call upon the German people in the coming days when their souls will be tried and they will suffer physically loyally to hold together. Only so can we defeat the efforts to destroy the Reich. Only so can we maintain the honor and life of the nation. Only so can we win back for her that freedom which is our inalienable right.

Labor in Turkey

LIBERAL labor standards have been established by law in the new Turkish republic. The following regulations regarding work in the mines were printed in the Swadesamitran (Madras) for September 16:

1. Any person or company working the mines must construct, according to plans provided by the Ministry of Economics, houses, baths, fully equipped dispensaries, kitchens, schools, and mosques for their workmen and their children. Working clothes must also be provided.
2. All forced labor is forbidden. Children under 16 cannot be employed below the surface, and children under 13 cannot be employed at all.
3. Two per cent of the amount of the total salaries must be set aside by the mine-owners for the purpose of maintaining hospitals. This 2 per cent is, however, not to be deducted from the wages of the employees.
4. Free medical attention must be given to all employees injured or sick as a result of their duties. The hospitals must be supervised by a sanitary commission. Meals must be provided by the proprietor at a uniform price.
5. The working day is fixed at a maximum of eight hours with double rates of pay for overtime, which must be worked voluntarily.
6. In cases of non-payment of salaries the existing stocks of coal, and if necessary any other assets of the proprietor, can be seized and sold on behalf of the workmen.

Mexico in Russia

THE Rosta News Agency in its Peking bulletin of September 21 prints a dispatch from Moscow describing the visit of a Mexican delegation sent by the Mexican Government to the All-Russian Agricultural Exposition at Moscow described in the last issue of The Nation. It was led by Mr. Ballesteros, counselor of the Mexican Ministry of Agriculture and Public Welfare, who is quoted as follows:

"The Mexican Government," declared Mr. Ballesteros, "regrets very much that it could not, through lack of time, send exhibits of Mexican industry.

"Mexico has passed through the same hard experiences as Russia, and foreign interventionists have striven to enslave her just as they have tried to do with Russia. This common lot of both our countries has led the Mexican people to the study of the revolution and the post-revolutionary construction work of the new Russia."

The Mexican delegate further stated that within a very short time, he felt assured, his Government would send plenipotentiary representatives to negotiate with the Russian Government for the establishment of mutual relations.

"The attitude of Mexico toward the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," remarked Mr. Ballesteros, "differs greatly from the aims and views of other countries with regard to the latter. While these countries, in their intercourse with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, pursue but their commercial aims and profits, Mexico wishes to be acquainted with the regime which has been established as the outcome of the social revolution."

Two Significant Cablegrams

THE following cablegrams to President Coolidge were recently printed in the Courrier Haitien:

(1)

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE, Washington: The Haitian people, with the Constitution of 1918 in hand, go to the polls on January 10, 1924, in order to reestablish the legislative chambers and the legal existence of Haiti. The American Government will bear the whole responsibility for any consequences that may arise in case M. L. Borno seeks to oppose the exercise of the rights of the people.

(Signed) CITIZENS OF PORT AU PRINCE

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE, Washington: Should the gendarmerie, commanded by American officers, act as the accomplices of M. Borno and oppose the peaceful manifestations of the Haitian people—parading through the streets, holding meetings in public places—by attacking and imprisoning the demonstrators, the American Government will have the entire responsibility for the bloodshed. The whole world is thus advised by cable.

(Signed) CITIZENS OF THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI

P.S.—These cablegrams have been sent to the American, French, and English press.

Now, armed with the Constitution of 1918 adopted by a plebiscite, let all the citizens go and register for the coming election.

One man cannot check a people of nearly three million.
